"In grand pianos, and indeed in all which have a great length of string, there is a difficulty in dampening or stopping the sound of the note directly the finger is taken off. This difficulty, too, has been overcome by Messrs. Steinway, for they use a damper which stops the sound as soon as the notes are raised from the keys. The American makers are generally very elaborate in the getting up of the cases for their pianos, and those of Messrs. Steinway are very rich carved work, are massive and elegant in their appearance, and are well suited to them, which makes the surface of the case look more like a piece of plate-glass than what it really is. We would advise all who have a taste for music, and are fond of hearing a good piano, to visit these magnificent instruments the next time they go to the International Exhibition. They are to be found in Class 16, United States Department. We are informed that Messrs. Steinway are to receive first-class medal for their pianos. The whole of Messrs. Steinway and Sons' pianos have been purchased by the enterprising firm of CRAMER, BEALE, & WOOD, the proprietors of the great PIANO-FORTE GALLERY in Regent Street, who, we understand, are appointed the sole agents for them in England."

The special correspondent of the New York Times writes:

"In Class 16 there are four exhibitors, two of whom receive the medal. This is the musical instrument class, and I am not wrong in saying that it has been the great feature of the American Department. In a former letter I referred to the extraordinary excitement that had been occasioned among piano-forte makers and professors by the startling power and excellence of Messrs. Steinway & Sons' instrument. The American Court was crowded with the curious in such matters; all the best players in London tried the pianos, and some of the most critical occasion even went so far as to break the instrument open to see the 'improvements' which it locked. Several weeks ago the two grands and two squares were sold to Messrs. CRAMER, BEALE, & WOOD, who were so satisfied with their bargain, and confident that a European business could be established by Messrs. Steinway & Sons, that they have ever since renovated themselves at their agents, and, as I am informed, have forwarded an extensive order for eight pianos. Four other cash applications were made for the purchase of these particular instruments, and I am confident that if a fourth 'grands' were here they would all of like fate. The jurors in this class were as follows:

"W. Sterndale Bennett, Mus. D., London; J. R. Planché, M. D., United States; Right Honorable Sir George Clerk, F.R.S., Chairman, Edinburgh; Fétis, Deputy-Chairman, Belgium; Hullmandel, France; Rev. Sir F. Gore Ouseley, Bart., Mus. D., Oxford; Ernst Pauer, Austria; William Pole, Mus. B., F.R.S., Secretary, London; J. Schiedmayer, Zoll-Vereins; Earl of Wilton, G.C.H., London; Henry Wyatt, Mus. D., London.

"And the awards are: Steinway & Sons, medal; 'Powerful, clear, and brilliant tone of piano, with excellent workmanship shown in a grand piano and a square piano of very large dimensions.' Messrs. Steinway's intonement by the jurors is emphatic, and strongest and more to the point than that of any European maker."

M. Henri Heche, one of the most competent musical critics in France, says, in the Presse Musicale of Paris:

"The firm of Steinway & Sons, from New York, exhibits two pianos—one grand piano and one square piano—both of which have particularly attracted the attention of the jury. This firm, not known among the exhibitors of the first rank, has, however, in a few years, by very short time, established a reputation. Messrs. Steinway & Sons have, to say so, the monopoly to sell pianos in America, and in New York they have considerably outstripped the other manufacturers. Undoubtedly, therefore, Messrs. Steinway may claim to be classed with Messrs. Erard, Pleyel, Broadwood, etc. Such importance naturally called the attention of the international jury to the Steinway pianos; but there were better reasons still for their attention, and the first of these reasons is the excellency of the pianos. The firm is also the only one which distinguished itself in the manufacturing of pianos by new inventions, worthy of being favorably considered."

M. Heche continues his letter by comparing the old and new method of piano making, mentioning especially that Messrs. Steinway prepare the wood which they choose with the utmost care, and only take the very left materials for their pianos. He after this praises the invention of overstringing, for which Messrs. Steinway have a patent, and says:

"I have been able to judge upon the effect of this new method, and can tell you that the square piano of Messrs. Steinway fully possesses the tone of a grand piano; it is grand in quality. The angles sound, the extension, the even tone, the sweetness, the power, are combined in this piano to no other piano I have seen, and this is the result of the new inventions which I mentioned."

About the grand piano the writer makes the following eulogistic remarks:

"The grand piano unites in itself all the qualities which you can demand of a correct piano. The character, the power, and the even tone are most remarkable. The touch is comparatively light; it is adapted for every shade of expression, and in every part the instrument will develop, according to the wish of the player, power, roundness, and especially that soft tone which is necessary for accompaniment. I do not hesitate to say that this piano is by far better than all the English pianos which I have seen at the Exhibition, including the pianos of Broadwood. Finally, I can tell you that Messrs. Steinway & Sons are going to receive the medal for sonority and clearness, brilliancy and sympathetic tone of their pianos."

THE LOSS OF THE "GOLDEN GATE."

We illustrate on page 540 the burning of the Golden Gate, which took place in the Pacific Ocean, off Manzanilla, Mexico, on 27th ult. The following description of the steamer is reliable:

The Pacific Mail Steamship Company's steamer Golden Gate was a side-wheel steamer, 1862 tons, and was built at this port by William H. Webb, in 1859. Her dimensions were as follows: length 250 feet, breadth 32 feet, depth of hold 23 feet. Her draught of water was about 16 feet.

She was one of the finest boats on the route between Panama and San Francisco, and was a favorite with the traveling public. She was launched January 21, 1850, and was built for HOWLAND & ASPINWALL. Her engines were constructed at the Novelty Works.

She was a fast vessel, and could accommodate about nine hundred passengers, besides a large quantity of freight. She was rated at the Underwriters All, and her coppering against fire were recorded "good." She had two independent fire-pumps, and one bilge-pump, with hose, etc. She had oscillating engines and two cylinders of eighty-inch diameter, with nine-feet stroke piston.

She carried from eight to twelve boats, sufficient to carry several hundred persons.

The Golden Gate was rigged in 1856, 1858, 1859, and lately she has been put in excellent order.

Manzanilla, off which it appears the steamer was when the fire broke out, is in the bay of Limon, Isthmus of Panama. The steamers from San Francisco call there to ship treasure brought from the mines of Colonia, in Mexico. It is about three hundred miles south of Acapulco and about fifteen hundred south of San Francisco.

The accident occurred as follows:

On the 27th ult., at a quarter to five P.M., when fifteen miles south of Manzanilla, while the passengers were dressing, an alarm of fire was heard. The steamer was promptly headed for the shore, three and a half miles distant, the flames meanwhile making fearful headway.

At a quarter past five the upper deck fell in.

Soon after the steamer struck the beach, and the passengers and crew who had not got into the boats jumped overboard and endeavored to swim ashore.

About one hundred, including the children, swam or were washed ashore alive.

The ship burned to the water's edge and soon disappeared.

Those passengers who reached the shore made their way four miles to Manzanilla, where they arrived on the 28th, just as the steamer St. Louis arrived up from Panama.

Some few others escaped to Manzanilla in boats. One boat, with thirty persons on board, has not been heard from, but probably made the shore south of Manzanilla.

A CORPORAL'S STORY.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

I ENLISTED as a private in Company C, Captain Black,—th Regiment, New York State Volunteers, April 30, 1861, to serve the State for two years. When I enlisted the Captain promised my friends that he would never leave his company, but take care of his men to the end of the war. The people of our town promised that they would take care of my wife and child and see that they wanted for nothing. The Government promised me good clothes, eleven and a half dollars a month, good fare, and the best of care if I was sick or wounded. In these things I did not care about. I was very poor, but I thought if I might have to my toy my name with the letter "U" which is for the Union," that he would be richer than any thing else his father could give him would make him. Every thing was new and exciting to us in a few days after we were mustered into the United States service. Much to our disappointment we were only mustered for three months, because we were two-years' men and not three-years' men. After we were mustered we got our shoddy clothes and old muskets—flint locks altered to percussion. Our Colonel was green, and our Captain was green also too much. Some of the men wanted to see all the places we marched through, and went off to look without permission and got severely punished. I thought it was not right to go off so, but I thought they ought to have been punished by their own company officers before they were punished for not knowing it. It seemed to us that as fast as the Colonel or Captain learned any thing out of the Tactics, or the Army Regulations, or the Articles of War, they ran traps for us to catch us in and punish us. We all got a good deal discouraged at first, but after a while we got a new Colonel and Captain, and he told us we could be punished orderly, decent, and do all the drudgery and suffer all the hardship of a soldier's life and not be rewarded. That to obey orders was no disgrace, but, on the contrary, to be undisciplined and disorderly made us only brutes and slaves.

Most of our officers and men were in good spirits and determination after this. We expected to have a good fight, and go home the first three months were over.

The Government had not the means to provide for us very well at first, and our quarter-master spent his time telling about for fun instead of going for us what he might have got, and the Government did not pay us any thing because we were three-months' men. All this we put up with cheerfully because it was summer time, and in three months we would be home again.

It was pretty hard sometimes. We had nothing to eat, our tents were taken away, and we slept on the wet ground just as we could lie down. Then we all got sick, and there were no hospitals except such as the surgeon carried in a wagon. Some of the men got sunstruck a good deal at first. They told them this was not manly. If we died doing our duty it was just as good as being shot in battle.

But it was pretty tough when our three months were nearly up—and we had never had a fight, and it seemed as if we never should—to be claimed for the rest of two years, and taken at our word. It's a new bargain we to be made we thought we had a right, the same as at the first, to volunteer instead of being forced. This made us a good deal of trouble; but I thought that the Government would not take us if they did not need us; and I made up my mind if this great nation needed a poor man like me it could have me in its service, and if not, besides, we had learned just what we ought to know to be good for something, and had got toughened to it. For one I felt rather proud that we was considered good enough to be kept. And if it had not been for Sally and Johnny I would have thing from the sulphurs and had a hard look for the winter coming on, I should not have cared to be any where else. Some of our officers fellows asked me how I liked being pressed away from my wife and boy. Well, I said, I should be glad to go home and see them; but if it was to sneak out and have somebody else fight for my wife and boy while I staid at home, I should be ashamed to have my John call me father at that.

After a while we got over grumbling, and began to take pride in standing hardship and keeping ourselves as comfortable and clean as possible, no matter how bad the weather and how hard the service.

One day last December, after a long march in the snow, which slipped, and slushed, and mulled out shoes, and then froze the shoes stiff, we got into our cabins at last, and as we were not to be without supper or breakfast next morning, for the roads were so bad the wagons could not get up. Well, that morning our Brigadier-General came down to see us. We heard he was coming, and every man had his musket brought in and his cabin brushed up, the snow had cleaned our shoes, and our cotton cloth-covers," as the boys called their overalls, were very clean. The General looked pleased on a frosty morning. So we were paraded in line as for drum parade, and when we presented arms as the General it went like the tick of a clock, for we were vexed, and we would have done it fine that morning if we had died. "Ah, ha, boys," the General said, "somebody has been living about you. They said you had no time for breakfast, and that your feet were frozen off you, and that you slept in a barn last night." We heard how he bragged about us afterward, and said that there was not a hay seed on our coats or a ration in the bellies of the whole regiment. The next day we went into Clear Spring, in Maryland, and that is a place for Union soldiers I wont say. The people gave us the whole town, and all they had was welcome. It is only a village town, but, as one of the girls said to Pat Maguire, that though there was not a big house, it was the right smart of folks there. Here we had a good rest, plenty to eat, and a hearty welcome.

The first time we had a scrimmage with the secesh was not a long while after this. We forded the Potomac and marched toward Martinsburg. Cold and wet was nothing new, and hungry was not to be talked of. We were at last going to fight Jackson and Co. We thought our first fight was beautiful. The secesh all ran away as soon as we began firing. They were Virginia Militia. Some of our officers wrote home flaming accounts of the fight, but our Colonel wrote a very quiet severe on us, and said such nonsense would spoil us. He ordered us and ordered us till day and night as hard as soldiers but orders. On third day's de-ploy column. Battalion by right and left flanks. Double quick. We marched a-reel on a run. We believe that we would have all skedaddled if we had not been more afraid to disobey orders. I thought it all over, and my company was in third division, and we had to stand fast while the rest formed on us and then we had to run on the rear. A cold sweat stood all over me, but I had not time to think before the other division were double-quick. I lay it through some open ground into the road, and when we were ordered to lie down till our battery came up. Pretty soon the artillery horses advanced on us down through a dip in the ground, halting occasionally and loading and firing as they came on. The shells whistled over us, and we done no harm. Our battery on our right drew the fire of the secesh artillery, and we had an open chance before us. By forming on third division we had just a slight roll of ground between us and the dip in the meadow, and the shells from the flying balls from the battery would ricochet over us, or fall short and plough without striking. A few men got hit with pieces of shell, but not many. I was hit by artillery was from the first firing. The Colonel heard looking against a tree, and when he came down of the knoll, as cool as a cucumber, watching the enemy. The surgeon, and assistant, and band were looking up the wounded and not carrying them to the rear out of fire. Every now and then the Colonel would order us to lie down on the aiming the ground, and I could see him from where I was blow his teeth with a fierce-looking kind of grin as he looked at us. The same as I could understand by me, just wait 'till I order these fellows at you. It seemed a very long time before we came on. We fired a single volley at 100 yards distance and then fixed bayonets, and down we went at double-quick charge, every man for himself as he pleased. The Georgians stood till we were twenty paces from them, and then broke and ran in a mass fence, where they tried to rally, but in climbing the fence we came up with them, and the rails flew in all sort after them as they went. I got the battery, which could not hit us without hitting them. So we took the battery and the prisoners. This is all I know about the first battle of Winchester. After we were ordered up to fire and charge I did not see my body that looked scared. I felt as much as I could think any thing about it then, though, 'till the smoke broke, men were every now and then dropping out of the ranks hit or killed.

Our Brigadier-General came down to us on next morning, and we were ordered to march after him, and he made us another short speech. Says he: "Boys, we have been just learning you how a little more, and you have done it fine. Now all I am going to take you over into McClellan's camp one of these days, and then I shall expect you to fight in real earnest. But I see your clothes look as nice as usual this morning." We had a bold talking. Sergeant in the color-guard, who was a good scholar. "That's more than yours do, General," which made us all grin. For the rest of his story I had a hole through it, and his baggage had been started toward Manassas the day before the fight, and he had no change, and the hole could only be mended with a patch; but I suppose for as cool as he would talk to us he was not much afraid of a hole in his coat. If he wasn't we was. We lay at Winchester for some days before we marched across the Shenandoah for Manassas, and while there there I went into the hospitals where our boys and the secesh wounded were together, and as well as here I saw something that made me feel pretty bad. One of our corporals had a bullet through his thigh. He was wounded on picket before the battles the battle. He had an Irishman on his picket-guard his mouth smoking his pipe through any thing and every thing. Well, the Irishman died during this night, so Pat lighted his pipe and smoked away, lying down with his wounded leg stretched out, and for it was not his relief, and as he could not sleep he made could take it out in a good smoke. This spark of fire made a good mark, and every soon a bullet struck the corporal who was standing some distance from Pat. "Bless the pipe, Sim," says Pat, "for if you had been smoking it, corporal, he would have fired at you and hit me." To guard against being by Yorc and Jackson was approached cautiously toward the place from which the shot had been fired. They found a number of secesh there, and soon came to a badly wounded man, in a farmer's dress, with a large bore rifle lying by his side. They stopped to look at him, and as they could, and turned out Pat's relief to carry him and the corporal to the nearest house in our lines. This turned out to be the farmer's own house. But it was deserted of every body except an old darkey and a little girl about nine years old. It turned out that they had been sent to the house by the girl's mother, a neighbor's wife, and when we carried them, to get some clothes, left behind when they ran away from their home, which they did on hearing that Jackson was coming back to drive us out of Winchester. They went into the mountains, just as a few days afterward Union men fled to the other had started from his hiding-place for news, when he was impressed by the secesh and made to serve as guide for placing the pickets as he knew the neighborhood. He said that he had his rifle to protect himself with, and I believed him. But when they saw Pat's pipe, knowing him to be a good shot, they compelled him to fire at the light, he purposely aimed one side and hit the corporal. Our return fire drove away their picket, but wounded him in the arm and side in a few days. The darkey went back to the mountains but the little girl would not leave her father, and he was glad of it. Pat stopped along the corporal's. She staid with him giving him water, bathing his head, and saying, "Never mind your daddy" all the while till he died." Pat got a pass to go and see the poor man buried, and the next roll call he was among the missing. I never saw any more of him.

Pat for the next four days, when he came into camp and reported for duty, was pulled to pieces by his pass as innocent as a baby. Upon being questioned about such an absurd pretense as the pass for the next days, Pat was said he had to go base with the mourner from the funeral. And the fact was, the fellow had taken the little girl home to her mother in the mountains.

I do not know if you will think what I say of my interest worthy of publication. I have given a plain soldier's account of what did happen really in this war would encourage some others to enlist just now when we want them. If you have not furnished out somewhat from what we were at first, and if our people will continue to be well regimented with names already on their flags, or get up new ones that will do better than we have, why then it seems to me we all our rebellion before the end old enough to go alone. And if they don't come soon, I don't see why a great many more will have to come by-and-by.

I am yours, very respectfully,

EZRA HYDE,

Corporal Company C.

—th N. Y. S. Volunteers.

I WOULDN'T WOULD YOU?

Who doesn't now read the paper
More than a month before
Eagerly watching the symptoms
Of our great political sore?
Some only to scoff and grumble,
To sleep and loaf and chew,
Doing nothing to ease the smarting;
I wouldn't do that—would you?

Some canvass their rulers' merits,
While they hint, with a lofty grace,
What they in their wiser wisdom
Would do if they filled their place.
They keep aloof from the struggle,
They choose to talk, not do,
While others are fighting battles;
I wouldn't do that—would you?

Some peck at our noble generals
As a cockerel would at the sun,
And understand their movements
About the same each one.
They stay 'neath pleasant home shadows,
While others dare and do,
And from lack of their aid are falling;
I wouldn't do that—would you?

When voices are calling loudly
For help in the contest at hand,
Be sure to keep out the shadow
Of their idol self-hood stand;
Willing the few brave spirits
Right the fearful strife through,
And sow the land with their ashes;
I wouldn't do that—would you?

There's many a noble woman
Would shield by her husband's side,
And face the foe bravely with him
Through the battle's fearful tide.
Others there are shrinking,
When they fain would blow too,
Their husbands, sons, or brothers;
I wouldn't do that—would you?

Some only remember the circle
That gathers about their board,
While the sick and suffering soldier
There's nothing they can afford;
Their ear is to the ground listening
That is piercing our country through,
While our bravest and best are dying;
I wouldn't do that—would you?

THE FORGED CHECK.

THE tall white pine-trees in front of the antique red brick house were motionless in the heat, and the sunshine lay in latticed gleams athwart the floor; but within the house all was coolness. The voice of the distant reapers floated down, like sounds in a dream, to the ear of Ellice May, as she sat in the door-way, her work lying idly in her lap, and her eyes fixed on the hazy August hills. Beautiful she was, indeed, with her large, delicately black, fringed with dark lashes that almost shadowed her cheek. There was something Eastern in the style of Ellice May's beauty—the olive cheek stained with rose; the small, scarlet mouth; and the serene, straight features. As for the little hands—taper-fingered and pink-tipped—they certainly seemed made expressly to beckon dark-skinned slaves and wield a fan indolently. Not a care owns no love of climate; and sometimes you are startled by finding this Eastern beauty the type of face among Down-east New England damsel, just as a few evergreens amongst the autumn blue-bells and mountain daisies on a farm-house window-ledge.

"Now, don't look off into vacancy so provokingly, Ellice!" said a tall, handsome youth, who was leaning against one of the columns of the piazza. "Do be gracious to a visitor who is driven all the way from town this broiling day just to catch a glimpse of your bright eyes!"

Ellice turned her head and smiled, but thought idly still; it was plain she was thinking of something else.

"How do you like my new pair of grays, Ellice?" he continued, presently. "I bought them with a special eye to your preference. But then those lazy rascals under the gig-house don't tell you there's blood there!"

"They are very pretty," said Ellice, quietly, "very pretty and well matched. But, Harry, Ellice, what ails you to-day? I don't believe you have half an eye for me as you used. Give me one of your old smiles, now—honest!—and tell me that you haven't entirely forgotten your old playmate for Hugh Irving. I met him just below the turn of the road as I drove over—didn't you speak, however. By-the-way, Ellice, I've done a pretty insane piece of business to-day that, I imagine, will put Hugh Irving effectually down for the present."

"What do you mean, Frazer?" said Ellice, suddenly rousing herself from her temporary abstraction.

"I mean that we manœuvred the mortgages on the old Irving farm, and foreclosed a week or two ago, and I foreclosed to-day at twelve o'clock, just half an hour after it became due."

"You foreclosed it?"

"Yes, and I defy Mr. Hugh to help himself. Of course they will have to sell the farm; and it is a prodigiously close, for I have only waited a chance to break Hugh Irving's pride, and fortunate forever after. I'll be bound he'll never in his own route this moment to give directions to that outlaws lawyer of his, blessedly unconscious! The Irving Place must go, Ellice, for it is of no use to a possibility for them to raise the money at so short a notice; and, with all the rest, it won't be a bad arrangement for me, pecuniarily speaking."

But Ellice had risen from her seat with redoubled energy, and was looking down upon Harry with angry sparkle.

"Frazer Martin, you are not in earnest?"

"Never more so in my life, my love!"

"You would not stoop to such a dishonorable, unchristian action, Frazer, as to—"

"Not at all dishonorable, Ellice; only a trick of the trade. I am sorry you look at it precisely so, but I would stretch a point or two to make Hugh Irving feel my power."

"Despicable! base!" reiterated Ellice, wringing her hands passionately. "Frazer, I never would have believed it of you!"

"Scold away, darling!" said Martin, carelessly touching her braids of shining black hair, as they swept down her cheek. "I know no kiss her sweet you look with those cheeks blazing and the great eyes dilated. I like to see you get excited!"

"If I've really any power over you, Frazer, go, this moment, and undo the work of evil. Do not let Hugh Irving suffer for your cruel and needless malice. Remember the Place is his home—his all. Hasten back to the city, for Heaven's sake!"

"Never!" answered Martin, with a look and a almost demoniac light in his eye. "I tell you, Ellice, I have the man, and I will not bate my hold upon him!"

"Then, Frazer," said Ellice, calmly, "our engagement is at an end. I will not marry a man who has taught me to despise him!"

"Now, my darling, don't be so!" said Frazer Martin, coaxingly. "You know very well that you love me—that you are my affianced wife. Tell the truth, now; own up that you only want to tease me!"

He would have passed his arm about her waist but she drew back with dignity.

"I might have loved you once, Frazer, or believed that I did; but you have killed my remember, my fickle fair one, that you can not smile me back again when you are wearied of playing the coquette. Make your choice now, or forever!"

"It is made; good-evening, Mr. Martin!" said Ellice, calmly. And calmly she stood there—her white dress fluttering in the sunset breeze, while Martin twitched the reins of his splendid grays from the post and sprang into his carriage, driving off like a whirlwind.

Noble Ellice, indeed; she was true to her womanhood, true to herself; and even at the time when Hugh Irving lost his ancestral patrimony he gained soul and body, for the chance of striking that man's cup of happiness to the ground!

Twenty years had wrought but little change in the dark beauty of Ellice Irving. One or two threads of silver had interwoven themselves in the abundant braids of ebon hair, and the peach-bloom color of girlhood had given place to

A father rose on her cheek; but Ellice was lovely still as the stood, in the frosty October twilight, shading her eyes with one fair jewelled hand, while the other pushed aside the crimson trails of the vine that touched vine which hung over the piazza pillars.

Looking for her husband. Ah! there was no loving eye to watch for Frazer Martin's erring footsteps!

At length he came, welcomed home by the glow of firelight, and the merry voices of little children, and the gentle calm of Ellice's smile! The world called Hugh living a fortunate man, because he had prospered accordingly in the pursuit of commerce; but what would the world have said could it have peered into his inmost heart, and seen there what a sad an undiscovered word to express that blue!

"But, Hugh, something has annoyed you; your face grave and thoughtful," said Mrs. Irving, when at length the noisy crew of little ones were safely packed off to bed, and husband and wife were sitting together—Hugh in a velvet easy-chair, and Ellice on a low ottoman footstool, with her head resting on his knee, as she had been used to do in the days of bridehood.

"You are a sensible witch, Ellice!" said Hugh, laughing. "I believe you know every thought that crosses my mind. Yes, dearest, I have been excessively annoyed!"

"Tell me about it, Hugh; you know you never have any secrets from me."

She put her little hand carelessly into his: he clasped and kissed it. The thought passed through her—"I have an opportunity to-day, Ellice, to pay of a very old debt—to pay it with interest. What do you advise?"

"Don't talk in riddles, you provoking fellow! Speak out plainly, or I never shall be able to comprehend you," said Mrs. Irving.

"Listen, then, my dear wife," said Hugh, suddenly grave, almost stern in his tone and manner. "You know that I have been in the habit of depositing, from time to time, large amounts of money in the hands of the —— Bank, at New York? Well, I had occasion, not long since, to send for a supply. It was duly forwarded to me, with a notice that I had slightly overdrawn my account. I knew this to be impossible, as the balancing things have rarely ten thousand dollars, and my order was but for five. On examining the statement of accounts sent on with the funds I discovered that a check for five thousand dollars, bearing my signature, had been presented and cashed some six months previously. Now I had never before in my life signed any such check."

"Well?" said Ellice, her lips apart, and her eyes fixed earnestly on her husband's grave face.

"And the name of the man who presented this check—this forged check, remember—was Frazer Martin!"

Ellice grew pale, and clasped her hands tightly together. "Good Heaven, Hugh, can this thing be possible?"

"Not merely possible, love, but certain. A fit winding up of his career of recklessness and dissipation," said Irving, bitterly.

"But, Hugh, what measures have you taken?" asked Ellice, who seemed scarcely able to realize the stupendous fraud.

"What is the consequence, Hugh?"

"Imprisonment for life!" was the stern answer.

Ellice trembled, and half opened her lips, but there was no gleam of encouragement in the dark love of her husband.

"Oh, Hugh, dear Hugh, to think that I might have been the wife of this wretched man!"

Mr. Irving passed his hand fondly over his wife's hair and drew her closer toward him, as if he would avert the unwonted thought of danger from her.

"If you please, ma'am," said a servant, putting his head in at the door, "would you please to step hall a minute? The housekeeper wants to speak a word with you."

Mrs. Irving rose and passed quietly out of the room. Hugh remained in his old position, gazing into the fire with set brow and compressed lips. In a moment his wife returned with a white, shocked face.

Hugh—husband—I have a sad story to tell you. The servants have brought in a poor, footsore creature, wearied with travel, and ill, fear, on the verge of fever. He fell on the wayside, a little way below, and Bruce found him as he came back from stabling your horses. He is now in the kitchen with fatigue and privation—shall we take him in?"

"Certainly," said Mr. Irving, rousing himself with an effort from the train of thought in which he had been wellnigh absorbed; "let the servants see that he has every care!"

"But Hugh, dearest," pleaded the wife, looking with grieved, terrified eyes into his face, "you will come and see him? We have laid him on the sofa in the anteroom."

"If you wish it, my dear, certainly," said Mr. Irving. "Why, what is the matter? You trembe like a leaf!"

"Oh, my husband!" murmured Ellice, pausing at their feet toward the threshold, as if afraid to only remember the Bible words, 'Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy.'"

Hugh Irving had not time to make an explanation of her words ere he found himself in the ante-room from which the servants had all been dismissed. There, upon the sofa, lay a wild-eyed man with tatty garb and bleeding feet, his clothes in tatters and his face shadowed by a beard of several days' growth. As Mr. Irving approached he gave a faint cry, and endeavored to spring from his couch, like one who would flee, but weakness and approaching illness overpowered him, and he sank back on the sofa, covering his face with the tattered hands. And, as he did so, Hugh Irving knew that he stood in the ghastly presence of his doubliest foe, Frazer Martin.

"Have they come to arrest me?" shrieked the poor, half-delirious creature. "I have fled long, but I was not fast enough for them. I am weak and ill. I think I am going to die. But send for me, away. Don't let him see me! I know it would be detected, but I thought I could replace the money before he knew it! I did not dream that it would all be swallowed up in that miserable speculation! Is it he, or only another troubled vision?"

"It is I, Frazer Martin," returned Hugh, coldly. "You will have yes enough to see for yourself."

"I can say nothing. I have no excuse to plead; but for God's sake do not deliver me into the hands of the law! I fled from it, and beyond its reach, but you see how weak I am! Have mercy on me! Oh, Hugh Irving, you have a heart, I know, for me! I shall soon be beyond the reach of earthly aid or pardon!"

His pleadings imploring voice—almost abject in its entreaty—jarred on Irving's ear. He turned to Ellice, who stood by his side.

"Ellice, if I pursue the plans I had arranged the officers of justice will be here at noon to-morrow; if not—"

"But you will not, dearest Hugh!" cried his wife, whose quick ear had caught the meaning change in his face. "You will forgive, as we ourselves hope, one day, to be forgiven! For my sake, dear love!"

"For your sake, sweet wife, and Heaven's!"

And Frazer Martin knew that he was safe!

The next morning the sun only entered the darkened room where lay the rival of his youthful boy-days, and found the sufferer in the grim eyes of the sick man turned wistfully toward him, as the feeble hand was stretched forth.

"Do not fear, Frazer," said Hugh, encouragingly. "I have sent a letter to the Bank, inclosing the amount of the money accused by overdrawn. Rest in peace, for no act of mine shall ever disturb your safety!"

The feeble flush mounted to the wan cheek where health's rosy tide should never mantle more.

"It is more than I deserve, Hugh Irving, and I feel acutely how little it is deserved. No revenge could cut to my heart like this. I shall not live to thank you, but you have now fixed in my days in a prison cell. Ellice—for I may call you once more by the sweet name of other times, you are glad to have married Hugh Irving. He is worthy of you—I never was!"

The sick man paused as he died, holding with his last grasp Hugh Irving's hand, and only relaxing the chill pressure when, at last, his soul passed forth into the great Hereafter, where neither friendship nor enmity could follow him.

The five thousand dollars—need we say it?—was never missed; but in its stead there came a deep peace far more precious to Hugh and Ellice Irving than heaps of Gold and diamonds from Golconda. The sun of Frazer Martin's life had not gone down upon their wrath!

HARPER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF
THE GREAT REBELLION
(IN)
THE UNITED STATES.

MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS will commence immediately the issue in Numbers of a complete HISTORY OF THE GREAT REBELLION IN THE UNITED STATES. The work has been for many months in course of preparation by a writer every way qualified for the task.

THE INTRODUCTION will contain a clear and succinct account of the Formation of the Confederacy of the States; the Formation and Adoption of the Constitution of the United States, federacy of the States; the Formation and Adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and the Establishment of the National Government; the origin, development, and progress of the doctrines of Nullification and Secession, and the various phases which they assumed until their final culmination in the Great Rebellion.

THE HISTORY will comprise a full account, drawn from the most authentic sources, of all the Events of the War; the intrigues of the Southern leaders at home and abroad; the gradual defection of one section; the great Uprising of the People for the maintenance of the National Life and Existence; the rapid creation of an immense Army and Navy; and the Battles by Land and Sea.

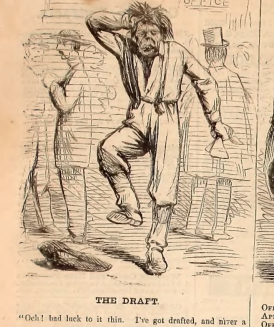
THE ILLUSTRATIONS will comprise Portraits of all those who have borne a prominent part in the struggle; Maps of the different localities; Plans of the leading actions; Views of every scene of interest, and of the most important Battles. These Illustrations are mostly from drawings taken on the spot by artists deputed for that purpose to accompany every division of our Army and Navy.

Every facility at the command of the Publishers has been employed in the preparation and execution of this work, and they confidently believe that it will form the most reliable and valuable history which can be prepared of THE GREAT STRUGGLE FOR THE AMERICAN UNION.

MODE AND TERMS OF PUBLICATION.

The work will be issued in Numbers, each consisting of 32 pages of the size of "Harper's Weekly," printed from clear type, upon fine paper, and will probably be completed in about Twenty Numbers.

The Numbers will be issued at intervals of about three weeks. They may be obtained from all Booksellers, Periodical Agents, or directly from the Publishers.



The prices for each Number, which will contain matter equivalent to an ordinary volume, will be Twenty-five Cents.

To CANVASSERS, and Periodical Agents and News Dealers, liberal discounts will be made from the retail price.

Specimen Numbers will be furnished gratuitously to any person who proposes to engage in the sale of the work, by subscription or otherwise.

For Special Terms, address the Publishers.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL MICHAEL CORCORAN, LATE COLONEL SIXTY-NINTH REGIMENT NEW YORK STATE MILITIA.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

GENERAL CORCORAN.

On page 549 we present a portrait of BRIGADIER-GENERAL MICHAEL CORCORAN, whose release from captivity has been one of the most interesting events of the past week.

General Michael Corcoran was born in Ireland, but came to this country at a very early age. He engaged in various employments here, and at the time the war broke out was employed as a clerk in the New York Post-office. He had always evinced a fondness for soldiering, and had risen, by his attention to drill and his devotion to the interests of the regiment, from the rank of private to that of Colonel of the Sixty-ninth Regiment New York State Militia. He first rose into notice when the Prince of Wales was here, by refusing to turn out his regiment in honor of the nation's guest. His conduct at the time was the subject of severe and malevolent, and he was even court-martialed for it. It will suffice to say that for that offense no one will be disposed to censure him now. For Prince Albert Edward were to come here to-morrow, there is not a Colonel in the service who would willingly or by choice be host to the throne of a country which has treated us as England has done during the past year. At the outbreak of the war Colonel Corcoran was one of the first Colonels who reported a regiment ready; and early in April, 1861, the gallant Sixty-ninth marched to the Seventy-third strong. They were stationed for some time on Arlington Heights, where they bore with substantial token of their visit in the shape of Fort Corcoran. Their term of service expired on the 30th July, and they were then mustered out, to join their homes. But a battle was imminent, and after a heart-stirring appeal from Colonel Corcoran, the entire regiment decided to see it out. At Bull Run they behaved with gallantry, and won the praise of their General. Unfortunately, in the retreat the Colonel got separated from his men, and was taken prisoner. This was thirteen months ago. During last time General Corcoran has endured privations of all kinds, in prison at Richmond, Charleston, Columbia, and Salisbury—suffering slights and insults beyond all imagination; badly fed, badly lodged, badly treated by brutal jailers, and badly treated by false promises of liberty which were always broken. And now the gallant fellow is back with us again, and ready and eager to fight once more under the glorious old Flag. At his reception at Washington he said:

SOLDIERS AND COMRADES—For this kindly greeting on my arrival I return you a my most fervent thanks. Both officers and men I have not had the honor to meet for many months; nor is it possible for such a chance to come from any other quarter than those actively and practically engaged in the service. There is not a person in the country who more than I does not love, marching, as they are, to the consummation and only guarantee of the peace of this glorious Union. The very sound of the roll of the drum is to me like the voice of a friend. They remind me of the cheering I used to hear in Fourth of July processions in North Carolina, for the maintenance of the glorious institutions which we have lived, (Applause.) Massachusetts has always done well, and taken a great part in all the struggles of her sister States. I am heart glad to see that she has come forth with redoubled vigor this time. Her children, who will, I trust, strike such a blow as will crush the miscreants that have dared to raise the fire of the infamous rebellion. Yes, I will, and cries "We will, we will!") I hope to hear a good account of the men who are now before me. I am confident I do hope that New York will not forth her fair name, will not be second to any other State in the Union that will, this heavy contest, send out their sons to battle for the rebellious. Gentlemen, I had hoped the whole matter would have been settled ere now. But it is to be regret that I am now here and shall be permitted to take my musket in my hand. But no other country will ever enjoy one more blessings our enemies. I hope the number that has been sent for by the President of the United States will come forward voluntarily and enroll themselves in their country's cause, but I think myself if none will be obliged to be drafted, for I want a few of the fault-finders, (Cheers and cries of "Good, good!") some of those who are home military critics to have an opportunity of displaying their mongrel courage. I shall not be satisfied unless I can want to see the lukewarm men, the men who are afraid of their property, the men who have no brains to receive it by cannon and the blood of their most patriotic brethren, will be the first to take advantage of every thing good in the country that is left to them, and will be willing to sustain in the hour of her need. I want those men made to fit up and march, and shall not regret if there is an order sent of getting them to draft them. (Cries of "Good, good!") I say, gentlemen, I shall do my best that the Government has adopted vigorous measures for the prosecution of the war, and that Congress has passed the most effective with ample power to do so. I trust the President implicitly. I would not have invested him with such power or to push the rebellion. The rebels have given to them with the power of their hands, and they must be done with. Now is the hour or the hour never. Now or never must the rebellion. If be broken and the Union sustained and restored. Gentlemen, I did not intend to make a speech—(Cries of "Go on, go on!" and cheers)—and will reserve any further remarks I may have to make to a future occasion.

The public learn with satisfaction that this President, in consideration of his captivity and his hereditary, has appointed him a Brigadier-General, his commission to date from the Battle of Bull Run.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 30, 1862.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

THE Army of the Potomac has evacuated Harrison's Landing without the loss of a man or a dollar's worth of property, and with its way to new fields of battle. We trust that the military critics who so highly eulogized General Beauregard for evacuating Corinth, and General Johnson for evacuating Manassas without being molested by our armies, will render to General M'Clellan his due meed of praise for having, under circumstances of far greater difficulty, accomplished this last evacuation with at least equal success.

Whether our troops ought ever to have gone to or place from which it required consummate generalship to extricate them, whether, as General M'Clellan, would not have acted more wisely in turning back from Yorktown as soon as he ascertained that the civilian commanders at Washington had upset his plans for the campaign on the Peninsula, by depriving him of the army of 40,000 men led by General M'Dowell, are questions which can safely be left open for discussion when the war is over. It is easy to understand the reasons which may have induced General M'Clellan to persevere in his expedition even against the dictates of his judgment. But this is not the time to consider it.

What we have to do now is to beat the enemy, and this, with God's help, we are in a better position to do now than we were before. The Army of the Potomac, consisting of fully 80,000 veterans, will soon be co-operating with the Army of Virginia. Regiments are pouring into Washington at the rate of seven or eight a day. By the 1st September more than the first 300,000 men will be in the field, and by 1st October the second 300,000 will likewise be under arms. We shall then have 1,000,000 of men actually fighting for the rebellion, and of fully 100,000 in camp at home to fill vacancies by death. This force, in cool, healthy weather, led by generals of tried courage and experience, must be hardy the rebellion before the end of the winter.

OUR NEW NAVY.

WE devoted some space last week to illustrations of three new iron-clad vessels which are being built for the navy. Very few persons are aware that we are building a navy which will not only be more powerful than that of any other nation in the world, but which will be equal in strength to the combined navies of the entire European world.

When the rebellion broke out our navy consisted of 88 vessels, of which 43 were sailing craft and 9 store-ships. Of the 36 steam-vessels of war, 11 were Secretary Welles made his last report to Congress our navy consisted of 42 vessels, a majority of them propelled 202 vessels, a majority of them propelled by steam. It included in this list were 23 steam-gun-boats of about 500 tons each, all of which were constructed for Government by the most approved excellent vessels for the blockade; 9 larger steam gun-boats, of about 1600 tons each, built by Secretary Welles's predecessor (seven of them iron); 10 side-wheel steamers of about 800 tons each, similar in build to the Octorara; 37 purchased steamers, unarmed except for small gun-boats; 42 purchased screw-steamers converted into gun-boats; 13 ships, 18 barks, and 20 schooners. Of these vessels the majority had a view serving either on the blockade or as mortar vessels. For naval warfare in American waters this list was admirably adapted, but useless for a foreign nation. In our waters—which are the only ones in which we are likely to engage in naval warfare—the iron-clad vessels of the European Powers could not manceuvre. Our light-draft vessels, armed with heavy guns, would be a match for them.

But the events of the past year have made it plain that naval battles hereafter must be fought by iron-clad vessels, and that wooden ships must but with iron hulls. Iron-clad gun-boats are going to win every naval battle that is won in the next generation. Hence the Navy Board has the most and the best iron-clad navy will be masters of the seas.

The Monitor has at the present time three iron-clad men of war afloat—the Warrior, the Black Prince, and the Defiance; all large vessels carrying much weight of iron armor, and mounting port except Portland, or perhaps New York at very high rates. She has twelve more vessels building, each of which will be of about 3500 tons, five of 4000 tons, and three of 3500 or 3000 tons. Of these it is hoped that four will be completed by the end of October. The first of the pirated Captain Ericsson's invention of turrets, is raveling one or two three-deckers, which will be ready early in the spring. The only vessel afloat in 1863, Great Britain will have a fleet of iron-clad vessels. Whether any of them will be able to live in a storm sufficiently severe to enable us to fulfill the threat of the London Times and the other vessels of her class, however often we may be tempted to appeal to the smooth-bore thirty-twos, would not resist the impinging force of a 100-pounder Parrott shot, or a Dahlgren 13-inch solid shot. These projectiles would go right through the Warrior. When our forts and iron-clad vessels are armed with rifled guns, therefore, it will be safe to conclude that the iron-clad navy of England will be powerless against us.

France is said to have 6 iron-clad vessels afloat, after the fashion of La Gloire, and 11 more on the stocks. These vessels are not more heavily plated than the British craft of the same class, and they have never been to sea. Besides these the Emperor has constructed a very large number of gun-boat-batteries, partially ironplated, intended to land troops on soil not far distant from the coast of France. These vessels are said to be strong enough to repel shot from old-fashioned smooth-bore guns. As, however, they are not calculated to cross the ocean, they possess no interest for us.

The United States have 14 iron-clad vessels afloat. Of these, 11 are Mississippi River boats, mostly plated with 2½ inch iron, and though very serviceable against forts or wooden boats, not calculated to fight craft like the Monitor or the Arkansas. Four of these 11, including the Essex, Commodore Porter's flag-ship, were purchased by the Government; the others, including the famous Benton and Carondelet, were built on contract for the government at St. Louis. They are good boats and have done good service, but they are not up to the times. The remaining three vessels are in the service of the Government are the Monitor, the Galena, and the Naugatuck. The latter is hardly worth enumerating, and is not likely to figure prominently in the ranks of our navy. The merit of the Galena remains to be tested. Naval officers, as a rule, have very little faith in her. At Port Darling, the rebel shot went through and through her 3-inch plating, and many men were wounded by the splinters of the bolts and nuts which fasten her bulwarks together. She rendered good service to the Union army at the battle of July 1; but we are inclined to think that her future career will not be very active. Of the Monitor it is needless to say any thing.

Besides these vessels Government is building now iron-clad vessels in every ship-yard in the country. The exact number of vessels contracted for and actually in course of construction could not be ascertained. But it is certain that the following craft are being built:

1. The Roanoke, a frigate, 18 guns, plated with 4½-inch plates, nearly ready, at Philadelphia. She will be the most formidable vessel in our navy when she is completed. She carries two most formidable 100-pound rifled guns, and is said to draw only 14 feet of water. She will fulfill the requirements of the builders, she will be the finest iron-clad vessel afloat.

2. The Roanoke, ruzeed from a first-class 40-gun frigate into a Monitor battery, plated with 4½-inch plates, with three turrets. She will not be ready for many days yet, but when she is ready, she will be very formidable craft. She will carry six 15-inch Dahlgren guns.

3. The Wiltsey Battery, a vessel with turrets, but of "low freeboard," but differing from them in being a ram as well as a gun-boat, in having its sides inclined so as to shed shot, and in having her engines placed below the water. She is only 160 feet long, and will have two turrets, with an 11-inch gun in each. She will be ready for service about the 1st September.

4. The Quintard Battery, also a turreted vessel, with two turrets and two guns in each—similar to the Wiltsey. She will be ready in two months.

5. The Mistress, larger than the vessel which pirated Captain Ericsson's with one turret containing two guns. These vessels will be 200 feet long, and will be improvements in both respects upon the original Monitor.

The first of them will be ready for service about September 10, and the last of the ten about December 10, and the latest will fulfill their engagement. They are being constructed at Boston, Greenpoint, Hoboken, Jersey City, Greenpoint, and Port Delaware. Most of them are being built under the direction of Mr. T. F. Rowland, of this city. The three which are being built at Greenpoint, will be named respectively the Passaic, Montauk, and Catskill.

6. Two Ericsson Monitors, of 320 and 340 feet in length, like the former with one, the latter with two turrets. These vessels will be the most powerful vessels in the world. They will be built so as to secure a high degree of speed, and will be very serviceable as rams, being, as Captain Ericsson says, capable of splitting an ordinary ship. They will carry 16-inch guns, which are being cast specially for them at Pittsburg. These vessels will not be in the service for some time; they would be able to sink such vessels as the Warrior in short order. They have been named by Mr. Lincoln Puritan and Dictator.

7. Ten iron-plated gun-boats for service on the Mississippi and Ohio, each carrying 2 guns, plated with 2½-inch iron, and carrying 2 heavy guns. They are to be ready in about six weeks.

8. Three river Monitors, to wit: the Catawba, 162 feet, the Indianola, 170, and the Tuscumbia, 170. These vessels will each carry two 15-pound guns in a turret, plated with 5-inch iron. They will draw from 3½ to 4½ inches.

9. A tremendous ram, 7000 tons, to be built by William H. Webb, of this city, at a cost of $1,250,000. She is to have two turrets, and to be plated all over with 6-inch iron. Her chief peculiarity, however, is a ram-bow, which purpose she is to steam 18 miles an hour.

Besides these, there is a large Monitor building for service on the Pacific coast, and one of two other large iron-clads contracted for under circumstances of great secrecy by the Navy Department. We presume we are not out of the way when we say that by 1st January next we shall have twenty first-class iron-clads afloat—vessels capable of running any batteries in the world, and sinking, in a short time, any vessels in the navies of Europe. We take for granted that, if it becomes necessary, the iron-clads which Captain Ericsson and Mr. Rowland are constructing could sail up the Thames to London Bridge with perfect impunity, sinking every war-vessel they found in their way, and could dictate terms to the British over the ruins of the House of Lords.

We are not building any iron-clad vessels on the lakes, for the reason that the treaty with England forbids any thing of the kind. An effort is being made to induce the Government to widen the locks on the Erie Canal so as to enable our Monitors to pass through into the lakes, if necessary. This will merely prove an expensive job. It would be far cheaper and more desirable to negotiate with Great Britain for the independence of Canada, which would render it unnecessary to provide for the safety of our cities on the lakes.

THE LOUNGER.

THE COMING WRETCH.

The rebels are making fresh raids. They tell us plainly and in the most contemptuous way that they come of a master race, and we Northerners, the southern emigrants of a serfish and mean race. They disdainfully declare that they have chosen and that we—that they are born masters, that they have whipped us in like hounds before, and that they will do it again; that we are peddling knaves and cowards, who would gladly accept our sole for ignores, and who instinctively cryel before the ground before the chivalrous gentlemen of the South.

Well, fellow-Northerners, they will make their words good unless we labor and fight with more loyalty as they in themselves. They have ranged their clans and clan-chiefs in a solid phalanx, and they will be irregular the scope of the contest. Their system must be annihilated or ours must. We must conquer and subdue them, or they will be absolutely overcome us. After sixteen months of war they are flushed with hope and confidence; they know to prove a stronger race than ours. They have always meant conquest of the North. They hoped it would come by political weakness, and then a peaceable surrender of the North under the name of reconstruction. But they believe now that a more practical result can be attained—disunion.

Let us there is but one thing that can help it; that is, the resolution of the North that they shall be exterminated, if extermination is necessary to the preservation of our system. More than any and inexorable determination, we shall succeed in exterminating them. They will not be able to integrate their society. We shall make the foundations of their social system quiver and shake beneath their feet. We shall make their whole success over them and the air with terror around them. Rather than submit to the Union they must share this Government and ruin the foundations of civil order, the death and horror and desolation in which they would involve the land will recoil on them. Who are they, and for what purpose is it, that they are to disturb with fire and blood the civilization of the world, the peace in which we have all living—a peace which provided every peaceful manner for different opinions and creed? They have brought the sword against us. Let them fall the edge of that sword in all its sharpness, rather than that we should perish by it.

Not a hair of their heads would we have injured. They laughed at our forbearance, our mawkishness. Gladly would we have borne and forborne. They sneered with the insolent defiance of the barbarian at which they deem a weakling. The whole value of Liberty we strained Peace almost to pusillanimity. For the sake of Slavery they struck with keen eye into the cruelest war. In the name of Justice let them have that war to the utmost.

When that is done, if this nation we shall not be troubled about M'Clellan's army, nor anxious about the Virginia campaign, nor quaking, as we are at this moment, lest Washington be taken; but the quaking and the fear will be in the hearts of which they do not dream. We shall have the fear at last the voice of the awaking wrath of Liberty—a wrath which, once aroused, they can no more resist than dead leaves in the forest can withstand the equinoctial gale.

BAT'S VIEWS.

OLD Bat, the statesman, who haunts the grocery at the corner of 36th Street, said the other day that he was a better Union man than Greeley, and he could prove it. "The President," said he, "doesn't like slavery, and wants to get rid of it; but I am for saving the Union either by carrying Liberty to the Gulf or Slavery to the Lakes."

The Bat school of statesmen is tolerably large. They blame themselves upon their peculiar policy. "I am," they declaratively they cry, "are you ready to shout save the Union, when it means Slavery?" "Are you ready to shout save it by destroying Liberty?"

When they put the question so, they put it fairly and the answer may be equally plain—as it all willing to suffer temporary deprivations of liberty for the sake of saving the Government for which sources permanent Liberty. It is upon the same principle that we are willing to suffer a painful surgical operation that we may be free from pain afterward. But when you ask us whether, in order to live, we are prepared to do that which must be done to secure personal and political liberty, we are willing to be deprived of that liberty forever, you ask an absurdity. You might as well wonder whether, in order to save his life, a man would be willing that his heart should be cut out. That would be the destruction of his life. To save the Government by destroying Liberty is equally inexplicable. Slavery means an armed force to keep it down, and their money, and means to give and take—that the end to save the Union. But what is the Union?

It is a political organization for specified purposes. They are not fighting for the Union merely because it is a Union, for it might exist for inhuman and nefarious ends. The combination of pirate vessels into a pirate fleet is a union by which more money might be made than by the separate ships; but it would be a union more despicable and dangerous in the exact degree that it was larger and stronger. The great multitude of citizens are fighting to the death for this Union because they believe with all their hearts in the objects it was founded to secure and in the certainty of its securing them. And the great end of that Union is to give every man the fairest possible chance. In its formation it supposed and intended that by this time all artificial distinctions would have been removed, and that the general equality of opportunity would have secured the general welfare.

To ask, therefore, whether you would not extend Slavery all over the land to save the Union is to ask the supremely silly question whether you would not put out your eyes to save your sight. Remember that the Union is so priceless because by its lawful operation it secures to every man the largest liberty of thought, speech, and action. And it is because the only privileged class in the country saw that the lawful working of the Union was going to secure more liberty than they thought compatible with their continued monopoly of the Government that they are now trying so hard to dissolve the Union. Let us say to them that we will willingly extend Slavery to save it and they will clasp us to their hearts. They say and believe that they are our natural masters. They will be entirely justified in saying so when Bat speaks for the country.

ENERGY NOT CRUELTY.

"You call for severity," says some doubting soul; "but was it ever found that a system of fire and sword in war was a wise system? Is there not common sense in war as in every thing else; and may you not conduct it so savagely as to drive the enemy into desperation, when a more moderate method would have induced them to surrender?"

Certainly you may. But does any body but Jeff Davis and John Bull insinuate that the Government has waged this war savagely? Read any account of the treatment of our prisoners in Richmond, Salisbury, Montgomery, or Charleston, and the filth, the poison, the foul food, the sickening inhumanity of treatment are revolting. On the other hand, do you suppose that the rebel prisoners at Camp Douglas, on Delaware Island, or elsewhere, suffer? Do you suppose Soulé is stifled in indescribable nastiness at Fort Lafayette? Do you not know that our own captains were turned out of their comfortable quarters at Fort Warren to accommodate the wretched old Mason and Slidell; and that the Baltimore prisoners in the same fort received every luxury from people in Boston? Have we boiled bones and carved skulls? Have we hung men of rebellious sympathies?

No: no man will charge upon the Government any undue harshness in the conduct of the war hitherto. It began by declaring privateersmen to be pirates, but its roaring was that of a sucking dove. It has taken thousands of prisoners—many, like Buckner, aggravated traitors. Did it try even that man, that, if found guilty, there might be an example? No; it has exchanged him. With the exception of some guerrillas shot upon the spot like other noxious vermin, has there been any solitary instance of rebel life taken except upon the battle-field? None; none at all.

Nor does any one ask for an inhuman or savage policy now. All that is asked is that we understand that we are at war, and that we use every lawful means of warfare. Having found that tufts of grass and twigs lightly thrown will not drive the enemy away, let us try stones. Having been forced to rely upon war, let us show those who have invoked it that we are more terrible in its use than they; that if they hit, we shall hit harder; that if we bleed, they shall bleed more copiously; that if we suffer, they shall endure anguish.

The severity that drives an enemy to despair is wanton cruelty. It is the conduct of the British in India and China, a conduct in war which makes them the most hated of nations. But British brutality stands alone. The magnanimous Britons alone blow men from the cannon's mouth because they do not side with heartless foreigners against their own country. They alone deliver young wives, nearly mothers, to the disemboweling knife of barbarians. The energy in the prosecution of this war which is demanded by all loyal men is neither torture nor wanton suffering, but the sternest use of every weapon of war.

NO FIGS FROM THISTLES.

There has been some question whether General Pope's order for our troops to live upon the enemy, and not to guard the property of rebels, is not an abandonment of the country to the rapine of our own soldiers. Several letters have been printed from the seat of war in Virginia apprehending the demoralizing effect of the order upon our own men, and fearing that all discipline would be destroyed.

But this fear arises from a misunderstanding. The order of living upon the enemy does not mean allowing robbery and ravage of every kind. It means simply that all property within our lines is to be occupied by the military authorities, and appropriated to our use under military regulations, and that when we move all that can not be of service to us shall be destroyed, that it may not serve the rebels. To secure this result it must, of course, be guarded. But instead of guarding it for the enemy, it will be held by ourselves for ourselves. The object of the order is to prevent the protection of property intended to help the overthrow of the Government. The result of it will be the necessity of every man's deciding whether he will take the chance of safety under our Government or under the rebellion.

Two soldiers of our army in Virginia came to a farm-house and begged for some water. The virago in charge said that if they were Confederates they might drink and welcome; if not, they might go hang. Finding the chance hopeless the soldiers went off. The next day the woman sent to our Commanding General for a guard to protect her house and property against stragglers! So when we went into Maryland, the secession districts were overrun with a vast crowd of customers, who paid for what otherwise would have had no sale at all, and paid in gold, which was immediately converted into shot and shell to kill loyal men and destroy the Government. General Pope's order is intended to make such absurdity impossible. To expect to make Union men out of Secessionists by showing them that they may rebel in perfect safety, is as wise as to try to extract sunbeams from cucumbers. It is an alchemy in which General Pope does not believe.

There is one argument, and one only, which will make Union men, and that is the lesson of hard experience that the Government is overwhelmingly powerful and superior, and respects itself enough to make its enemies suffer.

VALLANDIGHAM.

It is an interesting inquiry why Mr. Soulé is shut up in Fort Lafayette and Mr. Vallandigham is not. Mr. Vallandigham urges people to do what Mr. Soulé has done. Engaged in a mortal struggle for its existence, the Government is straining every nerve, and Mr. Vallandigham exhorts citizens to resist it passively. The friend of the rebel leaders, conspicuous in his subservience to every nod of the aristocratic faction which has brought all the desolation of this war upon the country, Mr. Vallandigham now virtually counsels surrender to their infamous insurrection.

If it be asked if he has not a right to his opinion and to the expression of it, the reply is, that the necessities of war supersede the privileges of peace. The right of absolutely free discussion upon the rights and wrongs of secession was allowed down to the beginning of hostilities by the rebels. The very day after the capture of Sumter, even, there were voices in this city in favor of yielding to the conspiracy.

But when war began debate ended. Open justification of the rebels became, under the changed circumstances, an act of rebellion. Words were things. Orators who tried to deaden public ardor, newspapers which strove to paralyze the national arm by every kind of appeal to ignorance and prejudice, were dealt with, and justly, as conspirators aiding and abetting. The man who endeavors to turn aside the officer who is upon the track of an accomplice, actually committing a murder, is not less criminal than the murderer. So the man who, by tongue or pen, aims to weaken the public mind in such a solemn and critical moment as this—and as the whole last year has been—is not less criminal than if he fought against us with arms.

If Mr. Vallandigham were detected in sending to Jeff Davis an accurate account of the number, distribution, and purpose of Pope's army, should he be sheltered from punishment by the plea that, as an American citizen, he had a perfect right to get and use information of public matters as he chose? The reply would be, whoever chooses to help our enemies does it at his peril. So, when he tries to persuade men not to support the Government against the rebellion, he helps our enemies; and he should do it at his peril.

Criticism of the causes of the war, or of its conduct, if they are made in an evident and sincere spirit of loyalty, however sharp they may be, are tolerable, for they assume the justice of the cause. But a man who thinks the war wrong, the Government tyrannical, the rebels right, even if a little irregular, is a man who ought not to be allowed to help them by his words in the desperate moment of the struggle.

This is the temporary denial of free speech. Of course it is. It is a temporary suspension of individual freedom that the very guarantee of all permanent freedom may be secured. It is the denial of the privilege to the private soldier of trying to raise a mutiny in the ranks on the very battle-field. This is the temporary limitation of free speech to which every true lover of liberty in the land gladly submits, and of which only rebels and rebel sympathizers complain. If Mr. Vallandigham thinks the rebels right, let him hold his tongue. If he says so, when their hand is on our throat, let his tongue be held.

A SUGGESTION.

The Lounger most cordially sympathizes with the suggestion of his correspondent:

"Dear Mr. Lounger,—Since the war began you have been so serious in your columns that I have not dared to write to you; but I have something to say now, which I think you will listen to.

"The other morning I wanted a few spools of thread and a piece of tape, and put on my bonnet and ran to Haberdasher & Co.'s to get them. It was a warm day and there were not many people in the street, and when I got into the shop I was quite confused by the number of young men who came politely forward and asked to serve me with what I wished. They were not the foolish, simpering fellows of whom there are so many pictures and so much fun in Punch; but they seemed to be quick, intelligent, and well-bred.

"I bought my thread and tape, and as I sauntered home, thinking of my brother Ned, who is with Pope in Virginia, I saw upon a pile of bricks a poster headed 'Recruits wanted.' Of course we all know that they are wanted. We know how much is left undone for the want of men. Yes, Mr. Lounger, and I know that if women would answer it would be left undone no longer.

"Now we women are as much interested in the war as you men. The Southern women, indeed, are said to be the main-stay of the rebellion, and the Northern women have been the chief solace and cure of our wounded soldiers. How they have worked in every way that women can, to help the great cause! And yet there is one other way. It is this. Let some of us do the work of Haberdasher & Co.'s clerks, and let them go to the war. At the Sanitary Commission rooms, and the hospitals, etc., there are as many women as can be made useful. But I—and I am sure there are plenty like me—would willingly take the places of these young men until they return. We can sell thread and measure ribbon and do up tape, perhaps not as well as they, but well enough for the purpose.

"Of course there are many of them who have mothers and sisters and families dependent upon them who could not easily go. But they ought to remember that business will revive only with peace, and if the war continues they must, many of them, lose their places. Then there are a great many who have nobody but themselves to look after, and they might surely go.

"I write to you, hoping that you will print my letter, and that they may see it. If they do, I hope they will think seriously of what I say. I can not put it in pretty language, but it means just the same. It means that I, for one, do not believe that a man hasn't a soul above buttons merely because he sells them; and I don't believe that a man can not handle a rifle skillfully because he is nimble with the yard-stick. At least, let's try, Mr. Lounger.

"Your faithful friend and constant reader,

"Lucy Lamb."

The Weather again.—Heine said (exulting in the cool gloom of a cathedral in a real July) that Roman Catholicism was a very good religion for the summer. If so, no wonder the Pope feels discouraged this year.

Charles Incledon was proverbial for the coolness with which he regarded the turbulence of an audience. He always listened to the "storm" with the utmost nonchalance, and occasionally addressed the noisy tenants of Olympus. One evening he was prevented from singing by a dire conflict in the most classical part of the house; and after pacing the stage for some time, "nursing his wrath to keep it warm," he pulled his watch deliberately from his fob, and thus addressed them: "Ladies and gentlemen, if you would contrive to finish this row in a quarter of an hour, I would esteem it as a particular favor. I'm engaged to sup with a friend at half past eleven, and I have very little time to spare." This good-humored rebuke had the desired effect, and the belligerent parties "grounded arms" immediately.

Ask a lady her age, and the information contained in her reply will probably not be reliable; but inquire the age of her dearest friend, and the answer may be implicitly believed.

A spiteful old bachelor says of the new style of bonnets: "Their only redeeming feature is, they afford room for a small conservatory on the top of the head."

A Scotch paper tells the story of a dairy farmer who, after the burial of his wife, drove a hard bargain with the grave-digger, who, bringing his hand down on his shovel, exclaims, "Down wi' anither shillin', or up she comes!"

A boarding-house keeper advertises "Board for two gentlemen with gas."

The law is a pretty bird, and has charming wings. 'Twould be quite a bird of Paradise if it didn't carry such a terrible bill.

Peace can do a good deal toward making a gentleman, but war is more likely to finish him.

Irish Advertisements.—The following is considered rather a good specimen of an Irish advertisement: "If the gentleman who keeps a shoe-shop with a red head will return the umbrella which he borrowed of a young lady with an ivory handle, he will hear of something to her advantage."

A merchant in Burlington having sunk his shop floor a few feet, announces that, "in consequence of recent improvements, goods will be sold much lower than formerly."

Old fools are more foolish than young ones; they have had much longer practice.

The farmer is a conqueror who wins victories upon important fields—at the point of the plow-share.

A man under sentence of death by hanging asked the sheriff, the evening previous to the execution, "I say, Mr. Sheriff, at what hour is that little affair of mine coming off?"

A sound discretion is not so much indicated by never making a mistake as by never repeating one.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

ORDER RESPECTING VOLUNTEERS AND MILITIA—OFFICIAL.

War Department, Washington Aug. 14, 1862.

Ordered—First—That after the 15th day of this month bounty and advance pay shall not be paid to volunteers for any new regiments, but only to volunteers for regiments now in the field and volunteers to fill up new regiments now organizing, but not yet full.

Second—Volunteers to fill up new regiments now organizing will be received and paid the bounty and advance pay until the 22d day of this month; and, if not completed by that time, the incomplete regiments will be consolidated and superfluous officers mustered out.

Third—Volunteers to fill up the old regiments will be received and paid the bounty and advance pay until the 1st day of September.

Fourth—The draft for three hundred thousand militia, called for by the President, will be made on Wednesday, the 3d day of September, between the hours of nine o'clock A.M. and five o'clock P.M., and continue from day to day, between the same hours, until completed.

Fifth—If the old regiments should not be filled up by volunteers before the 1st day of September a special draft will be ordered for the deficiency.

Sixth—The exigencies of the service require that officers now in the field should remain with their commands, and no officer now in the field, in the regular or volunteer service, will, under any circumstances, be detailed to accept a new command.

By order of the President.

Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War.

HOW TO ENROLL AND DRAFT MILITIA.

War Department, Washington, Aug. 14, 1862.

Ordered—Eighth—That in filling all requisitions for militia the quotas of the several States will be apportioned by the Governors among the several counties, and, where practicable, among the subdivisions of counties, so that allowance shall be made to such counties and subdivisions for all volunteers heretofore furnished by them and mustered into the service of the United States, and whose stipulated term of service shall not have expired.

Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War.

EVACUATION OF HARRISON'S LANDING.

The news from General M'Clellan's army is very important. The whole force has been removed from Harrison's Landing to Williamsburg without the loss of a single man or any of the Government property. The movement has been most successfully carried out, even in the face of a subtle foe.

THE ARMY OF VIRGINIA.

Major Fifield has succeeded in capturing several hundred bags of flour belonging to the rebel States, amounting to about 12,000 pounds. Contrabands report that Jackson's army has been considerably reinforced from Richmond. The Union army now occupies the line of the Rapidan from Raccoon Ford to Cave's Ford, with pickets beyond. General Siegel, who is in the advance, has driven back that part of the enemy's force which attempted to cross the river on the morning of the 16th inst. Late dispatches state that a general advance toward the Rapidan was made on 17th. All was quiet up to one o'clock in the afternoon, the rebels not disputing the movement.

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE "ARKANSAS."

United States Gun-boat "Essex," Off Baton Rouge, Louisiana, August 6, 1862.

Hon. Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy:

Sir,—On the evening of the 4th inst. I was informed by General Williams, commanding the United States forces at this port, that the enemy, in considerable strength, was moving on this place.

The rebel ram Arkansas, with two gun-boats from the Red River—the Webb and Music—were also in the vicinity of the city to support the attack of the rebel army.

I made such a disposition of the naval force under my command as I thought would give the most aid to our small force on shore.

On the morning of the 5th inst., at one o'clock, the enemy made an attack on our land forces, and drove in the left wing of our army, killing General Williams. Our men retreating, I opened fire from the Essex with shot and shell over them on the advancing enemy, and turned them back with considerable loss. It was doubtless the intention of the enemy to make a simultaneous attack by land and water, but the fire of the Essex driving the rebels back evidently disconcerted their plans.

Though not making her appearance, I had information of the vicinity of the ram Arkansas about four miles above my anchorage on the river, and this morning I determined to steam up the river, attack her, and, if possible, prevent her rendering further assistance to the land forces she was co-operating with. At ten A.M. I came in sight of her at about the distance of half a mile, and immediately opened fire. After an action of about twenty minutes I succeeded in setting her on fire, and at meridian she blew up with a tremendous explosion.

The Arkansas had a crew of one hundred and eighty men and mounted ten guns—six 8-inch and four 50-pounder rifled cannon. This vessel—the Essex—mounts seven guns, and had only forty men on duty at the time of our going into action. My First Master, Mr. R. K. Riley, was in the sick hospital, and his place was supplied by Second Master David Porter Rosenmiller, who conducted himself to my entire satisfaction.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. D. Porter,

Commanding Division of Flotilla in Western Waters.

PURGING KENTUCKY OF TRAITORS.

John F. Fiske has resigned the Speakership of the Kentucky Legislature, and James F. Robinson, a well-known Union man, has been elected in his stead. Governor Magoffin has also resigned his office, and Robinson, therefore, becomes Governor de facto for the remainder of Magoffin's unexpired term. M. Johnson, of Lexington, also a Union man, has been elected Secretary of State. These resignations and elections virtually restore Kentucky entirely to the Union, as by the resignation of J. B. Temple, Acting-Governor Robinson becomes President of the Military Board.

UNION PRISONERS IN CLOSE CONFINEMENT.

A number of Union prisoners from General Pope's army had arrived in Richmond. They were put "in solitary confinement, in conformity with instructions, and the rule, as enforced, will not be departed from under any consideration whatever." Among the prisoners was Brigadier-General Prince and thirty-four officers.

MAKING TRAITORS PAY.

General Butler, in New Orleans, is determined to carry out the order of making the rebels pay some of the expenses of the war. He has taken a list of all those who subscribed to aid the Southern Confederacy. These merchants and others agreed to pay the amount of a million and a quarter of dollars to that cause. He has therefore taxed them, and all the cotton brokers who advised the planters not to bring down their cotton so as to secure foreign intervention, to the tune of over three hundred and forty thousand dollars to help maintain the poor of New Orleans.

ARCHBISHOP HUGHES ON THE WAR.

Archbishop Hughes delivered a most important and patriotic sermon on 17th, in St. Patrick's Cathedral. After reciting his course of action in Europe, he calls upon the whole North to come out in its strength, for "volunteering to continue and for a draft to be made." He said that if three hundred thousand men were not enough, to call out another three hundred thousand. "The people should insist on being drafted, and so bring this unnatural strife to a close" by strength of might alone.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH REBEL GENERALS.

The papers publish a correspondence between the rebel commander and the General-in-Chief relative to repudiation of paroles and oaths of allegiance. The language of the rebel General Lee's communications is considered by General Halleck to be "couched in language exceedingly insulting to the Government of the United States," and he has therefore "declined to receive them." They were, therefore, returned unanswered, except as above quoted.

ELECTION IN NORTH CAROLINA.

The election in North Carolina has turned out to be a victory for the moderate men who are accused of Unionism. The ultra secesh candidates for every office have been defeated by an overwhelming majority, and Vance (Union) has carried the State for Governor against Johnson (Rebel) by a surplus of forty thousand votes.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

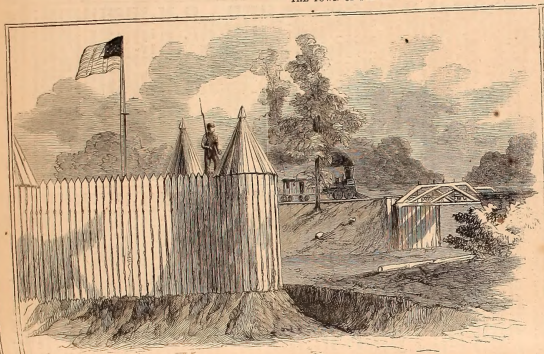
THE QUEEN ON NEUTRALITY.

The Queen, in a speech proroguing Parliament, says: "Civil war, which for some time has been raging in America, has unfortunately continued in unabated intensity, and the evils with which it has been attended have not been confined to the American continent; but her Majesty, having from the outset determined to take no part in the contest, has seen no reason to depart from the neutrality which she has steadily adhered to."

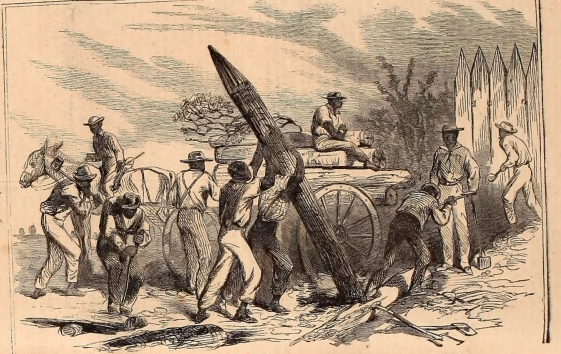
THE CONFEDERATES IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

In the House of Lords Earl Stratheden moved for the correspondence with Mr. Mason relative to the acknowledgment of the Southern States. Earl Russell said it was not expedient to produce papers. The agent of the Confederate States was not recognized, and all communications were unofficial. Correspondence had taken place with Messrs. Adams and Seward, but the British Government replied as before. He stated that no communication had been received from any foreign Power relative to the recognition of the Southern States. Earl Malmesbury suggested that the Government should communicate with other Powers, with a view of offering mediation if a favorable opportunity arises, to which Earl Russell agreed that if mediation is offered all Powers should join in it. The motion was finally withdrawn.

FRANCE.



COTTON IN ALGERIA.



It is reported that the French Council of State are trying to devise means to render France independent of America for cotton.

SERVING HIS COUNTRY.

At the breakfast-table that morning there was quite a show of guests, even so early as 7.30. The majority elderly and middle-aged men, a few matrons, and one young lady. Only one. The rest were making amends for last night's late hours of flirting and dancing. There had been a party somewhere, and the flirting and dancing went far into the night and the "Wee sma' hours ayont the twal."

But our one young lady here looks as fresh and bright as if she had gone to bed with the birds, instead of waltzing with Barry Sandford until midnight, or listening to the band with Lieutenant Morris, or talking brilliant, unsatisfactory talk with elegant, satirical Althorpe.

When she came into the dining-hall the group of gentlemen were discussing some question rather loudly, you might almost have said angrily. She came in quietly, bringing youth and health and delicate womanliness with her. The atmosphere changed. The frown cleared from old Mr. Jarvies's brow, the sharp words staid on the Hon. Tom Wilmer's heavy lips, and a gray-haised militaire lowered his lance of discussion as she passed by.

Just as she took her seat up came that smiling factotum, James, bearing upon his tray nothing edible, but a glass dish filled with water-lilies, fresh and dewy as the dawn.

He put them down without a word before the young lady's plate.

"Who sent them, James?"

"Couldn't say, Miss; one o' the bell-boys brought 'em down and said they were sent in for Miss Gaines. I didn't ask any questions."

Miss Gaines bit her lip, half in amusement half in vexation. She understood James pretty thoroughly, and guessed that he was keeping somebody's secret under his innocent manner. Of course she could ask no further questions, thus put en règle by James's finesse.

Presently saunters in Althorpe; "elegant, satirical Althorpe"—white-clad in glistening linen. Came in hiding a yawn behind the whitest hand, with one curious little old-fashioned ring on the third finger, which he said belonged to his ladye love.

He took the vacant place by Miss Gaines, bowing and smiling his "good-morning." Then he put his face down to the lilies.

"Did you go out boating on the pond after I left you last night, and are these your spoils?" he asked, with a laugh in his voice, and the voice down among the lilies, where he was breathing sweetness.

"No, I wish I had. You may laugh, Mr. Althorpe, but I am quite sentimental enough to be willing to wake through the night for a sight of the lovely things as they grow."

He did laugh, lowly, lightly, as was his way, and elevating his eyebrows.

"What youngster did you make happy with your pence then, Miss Margaret?" he asked, in a listless manner.

Miss Margaret smiled to herself. She was not to be taken in by the listless manner. So Mr. Althorpe was curious.

"I didn't buy them, Mr. Althorpe," she replied, quietly. "Some one kindly sent them in to me; and I have a fancy they have never been tied up for vending."

"No! What inner sight reveals these things to you, Miss Margaret, that are hidden from common ken?"

She parted the buds and blossoms and showed the spiral stems beneath the water.

"This is my inner sight, Mr. Althorpe; they are broken, not cut. That is unprofessional. You never see them sold except in smoothly-cut bunches."

"Oh, that is it?" with another low, light laugh. "And you like them better, I suppose, Miss Margaret, for somebody's dozing about 'tween dark and dawn, and then wading knee-deep to gather them specially for you?"

"Of course I do," she answered, with a little defiant nod at his satire.

"Of course you do," he repeated, highly amused; "but you wouldn't wet the sole of your little slipper for such as these."

"Indeed I would. Last summer, at Shell Beach, we rode over to Long Pond one morning before day had begun to dawn, and went rowing out in the summer dark. Only girls, too, not a gentleman; and we came home wet and dripping, I assure you, but with such loads of lilies," and she laughed aloud as she remembered her frolic.

Old Mr. Jarvies glanced up with a smile as he caught it, and the Hon. Tom turned quickly in the midst of—"I tell you, gentlemen, what we want is organization," turned and listened, while General Rose pledged her with a beaming look over his glass of hock.

Althorpe alone was imperturbable; asking languidly, as he sipped his coffee,

"So you don't know who sent them?"

"Oh, Charley Morris, I suppose; nobody gets up early enough for such things but Charley," she returned, as if there was no question about the matter.

"Or stays up, perhaps; perhaps playing billiards, or losing his pay over a loo-table."

"Mr. Althorpe!"

"Well, why not; why shouldn't I speak of what is so openly done. It may be all very naughty, Miss Margaret, but we do it; and why shouldn't we own it. The worst of it is its cloak, I'm thinking; a very flimsy one too. Yes we do it, Miss Margaret. I do it. I did it last night, playing far into the small hours after I left you. Fancy me, then, getting sentimental; rushing off to Lily Pond and coming back laden with purity and sweetness in the shape of pond-lilies to lay mysteriously at my lady's feet—in other words, on her breakfast-table, where she imagines me at every whiff of odor a gallant cavalier, whose devotion is only equaled by his simple habits—up with the lark, and all that sort of thing; while at that very moment, very likely, the cavalier is taking revenge by a long doze deep into the day."

A look of impatience flitted over Margy Gaines's face, and she answered,

"I shall believe you always put extreme cases, Mr. Althorpe."

He shrugged his shoulders. "My dear child, the exceptions would be extreme."

Once in a while Lawrence Althorpe had a way of speaking as if he were a dozen years your senior; a pretty sort of affectation which wasn't unpleasant.

"But what makes you talk so?" said Margy, vexatiously. "What makes you want me to know that men are so bad?"

"They are not so bad, only I don't want you to think them so good, for that's dangerous thinking. You'll be disappointed some day. If you think them rather weak and miserable sinners, to begin with, you'll not have to weep over a ruined air-castle. Suppose, now, I had believed a certain young lady—well, let us say Miss Margaret Gaines—to be the very essence of amiability, one who never scolded the maids, or got out of patience with her younger brother, or flirted with her cousin. And suppose, on closer acquaintance, I found that she committed every one of these deeds, don't you think I should be woefully cut up and chagrined by my mistake, after expecting such perfection? I only say if I had; I assure you I like Miss Gaines much better as she is."

Margaret laughed, and cast a slightly saucy look at Mr. Althorpe, which said quite plainly, "How do you dare, Sir, accuse me to my face of my misdoings (for she plead guilty to every one)?" Althorpe laughed too—a soft, hearty, enjoyable laugh—at the way she took it.

"But," she expostulated, "you do not state the case fairly. You give men such wider range of misdoing to apologize for."

"Because the world—society—gives it, Miss Margaret; and you must pardon proportionately, making due allowance."

She drew a deep breath and bent down to the lilies. Breaking one off she put it in her bosom, saying, "Well, no matter what the way was, it was good to get the lilies; and I've no doubt Charley was the better for it, even if he rushed off after such nefarious proceedings as you describe—which I don't say I believe that he did."

"And which I don't say I believe he did—I was only supposing a case. I never saw Lieutenant Charley play in my life," answered Althorpe, lazily.

By-and-by he broke silence over his third cup, by asking,

"How does it always happen, Miss Margaret, that you are down before any of the other young ladies? Come, I'm curious; will you tell me?"

"Well, it is a matter of taste. The mornings at this season are so exquisite; and then—and then—shall I tell you, Mr. Althorpe, truly and honestly, as Jimmy says?"

"Yes, do."

"Well, I can't afford to lose such beautifiers as these early morning hours are at Newport. They are balm and bloom to life and complexion. I like to feel well—in Jimmy's phraseology, "as if I could jump over the house—and I like to look well. Could there be better reasons, Mr. Althorpe?"

"Not possibly!" and he laughed outright at her candor.

Here, from his place farther down the table, General Rose called out, in his petulant voice,

"Althorpe! Althorpe! why don't you join the army? You are young, strong, and able. We want just such men as you. Come! why don't you?"

They all looked round upon Althorpe at this, for they were all curious to know why he didn't, and nobody had ever dared to ask before. Althorpe was a self-possessed fellow, certainly. Not a muscle betrayed annoyance, though he was the most excessively reticent man, and this blunt question must have annoyed him intensely. Not a muscle of his face moved; he quietly helped himself to a roll; brushed a fly from his hand in his negligent manner; then answered, with the slightest approach to a drawl in his voice,

"Why don't I? Well, General, that is just what I don't know. I should like to know, upon my word! Why don't I? sure enough. Young, and strong, and able—an idle fellow, needing occupation. Why don't I? I think it must be because it hurts. I shouldn't like to be hurt. I'm a dreadfully selfish fellow, you see!"

This was all said with the most good-humored air possible—a pleasant, dégagé manner impossible to describe; but not a person who heard believed a word of it.

Yet it was impossible for even the choleric General Rose to take offense at this answer, so easy-tempered and tinged with bonhomie did it sound. But nobody believed a word of it; for every one knew the reputation of Lawrence Althorpe was that of "the coolest fellow alive." And two years ago he had fought a duel in South Carolina under circumstances that carried conviction at least of his intrepidity. General Rose, of course, did not pursue the subject, and presently they left the table.

Margy Gaines took up her lilies tenderly; and as Althorpe walked down the room with her, he said, with that curious, perplexing manner of his, half banter, half earnest,

"'Her dress was like the lilies,
And her heart as pure as they;
One of God's holy messengers
Did walk with me that day.'"

All the time she was arranging the flowers in her own room she was thinking, "What a strange fellow Althorpe is! How he laughs, and sneers, and disbelieves in every thing and every body, even himself. A perfect disciple of Thackeray! Sometimes I think he is better than he seems; then I have no faith in him, he is so cold and heartless. Now if that wasn't positively ill-natured, not to say bad taste, my superfine elégant, to cavil at Charley Morris in the way you did. Charley, who is so generous and honest! Such a brave little fellow too, all patriotism and enthusiasm in his profession! I wonder Althorpe doesn't go. He's no coward—not afraid of the hurt by any means; but I do believe it was just as he said—he's selfish, and, though not afraid of the danger or the hurt, doesn't like the trouble. That sounds just like him. Oh, Althorpe, Althorpe! what a narrow life you lead. No wonder you see every thing through blue spectacles. Eh: who's that whistling on the piazza?"—looks out of the window—"Morris, I knew; nobody whistles the Zauberflote like that but Lieutenant Charley. He's come over from the yacht for the second time this morning! I wish he was staying here—such a nice, good fellow. I'll run down and thank him for the lilies."

So she ran; her dress, like the lilies, as pure indeed—one of those soft, white mulls that make pretty women look so much prettier.

"Oh, good-morning, Master Charley! I've found you out, Sir, though James kept faithful guard over the secret."

Charley looked puzzled.

She burst out laughing.

"You needn't put on that demure face, Lieutenant Morris. I knew at once nobody else gets up here in season for such expeditions, or cares to go if they do. I knew your tastes, you see. And the lilies are very lovely. I wear one for sign, you see;" pointing to the white flower drooping into her bosom.

"I really, Miss Margy, am entirely at sea; I'm sure I should be only too happy to own to any thing that gives you pleasure; but upon my word—

"What, you mean to say honestly that you didn't send me a dish of lilies this morning?"

"I mean to say now that I am the most miserable fellow alive that I didn't send them. Why couldn't I have done it? And to think you gave me credit when I was— Stupid! I'm certainly losing my wits, Miss Margy."

"When you were where, Sir?"

"I? Oh, I dropped in to two or three places to see the boys and smoke, etc., while somebody else was getting the lilies.

"I dropped in to two or three places to see the boys and smoke, etc." Margy thought of Althorpe's bold suggestion.

Charley colored and looked away when he said this; was he evading the truth, and was the truth—a loo-table?

Which did she like best, Charley's modest shamefaced evasion, or Althorpe's daring defiance? So perplexed was she, she hardly knew herself. Half angry too at Althorpe's possibility of right in his suggestion.

Walking up and down the piazza they by-and-by met Althorpe, who looked a little quizzically at Lieutenant Charley. "I was mistaken after all, Mr. Althorpe," Margy remarked.

The gentleman bowed.

"So Charley didn't send the water-lilies? She was so sure, Charley, that only you could do it."

"And I am mortified that she should be mistaken," Charley answered, gallantly; "though I fancy I should have swam across to the Burton's green-house and added a few of those lovely late royalist roses before I had thought my offering fit to be laid at such a shrine."

Margy laughed a little, slyly, and answered, stealing a saucy glance at the two—"I have a special weakness for pond-lilies, and for those who love pond-lilies."

Any one might have noticed the slight disconcerting of Lieutenant Morris at this, and the furtive smile of Althorpe's.

Lieutenant Charley's star was down for the time. It rose again in a moment.

It was a close morning even at Newport, and they presently ceased walking, and, turning some chairs into an angle of cool and shade, seated themselves for easier talking. "My furlough is up in another week," Morris remarked, en passant.

"No—is it? How's your leg?" asked Althorpe.

"Oh, that'll be all right in a few days—just a little inflammation which the bathing is rapidly curing. Halliday is much worse off. They have never been able to get the ball out of his leg; but he says it has settled into a safe place, and he shall go back with me any way, spite of the lameness; and he hobbles round on a stick now."

"Halliday is in your regiment, isn't he?" asked Althorpe.

"Yes, and the same company. We fought close together at Fairoaks—side by side sometimes. You know what a close conflict that was; how we pushed on through swamps, up to the waist in water, once in a while, and under a galling fire; and such a din of musketry that not an order could be heard, and only example served us. Every officer in the saddle, you see, then, had to keep ahead, in advance, to show what must be done. Ah, it was hot work, I tell you!"

Margy Gaines was leaning forward in breathless interest; and as he paused a moment, asked, eagerly, one of those peculiarly womanly questions.

"How did you feel then? what were your thoughts?"

He laughed. "Well, it was odd; but I found myself in the intervals of those action-orders declaiming aloud, though I couldn't hear my own voice scarcely, that ballad in the cavalier songs:

"'We were standing foot to foot, and giving shoot for shoot,
Hot and strong went our volleys at the blue;
We knelt, but not for grace, and the fuse lit up the face
Of the gunner, as the round shot by us flew.'

"Yes, there I was, actually screaming that forth in a sort of rhythmic order, and half unconsciously."

Althorpe smiled, saying, "Well, that was certainly a good war-cry. The ruling passion strong at the death, Charley. I remember you a small youngster at Cambridge reciting verses in your sleep; only the theme then was of some fair Dulcinea, who had subjugated your heart for the space of a week, perhaps."

"But how did you feel when you were wounded? What was the first sensation?" Margy kept on, utterly oblivious of every thing but the glorious topic of "ball and bayonet."

"Bless you, I didn't know I was hit. I was in the thick of the advance, men falling dead around me all the time, and just breathing a moment after fire, when I wondered why I couldn't move my left leg—my foot was like lead in the stirrup. I looked down, and saw a clean mark where a ball had struck, and the blood soaking through. It was a little quieter then, and I said to Marvyn, the orderly sergeant, who was near by, 'I believe I'm hit.' Then I got him to slip my foot a little to alter my position, for I hadn't any power over it. It was perfectly paralyzed for a while; luckily, though, I believe that is by no means uncommon.

"But that wasn't any thing. You should have seen Halliday in the bayonet charge. He had been wounded twice then by rifle shots; and when that order to charge bayonets came he went forward with a cheer that rung above all others, and a glance of such enthusiasm, while his face was dabbled with blood, and blood dripping from the wound in his shoulder, that I believe he was an inspiration. Who could fall back with such an example? The men on his line were wavering at first, and a panic would soon have attacked them. Jack always had a genius for seizing opportunities in the nick of time. He seized one now that told. When I saw him pressing down there was a sort of smile on his face, as if he was inviting the men to sure victory; then he waved his sword, cheered, and dashed on. Jove! you should have seen them plunge headlong after him.

"And afterward, when he came back, a sabre-cut across his cheek, but supporting poor Smythe—Lieutenant Smythe, you know, who died since at the hospital—insisting upon Smythe's receiving the surgeon's first care, and altogether overlooking himself, you'd better believe the boys shouted for him."

"And you, Charley," Althorpe suggested, "tell us how you got back to camp with that wound of yours?"

"Well, I'd got pretty faint by the time we were ready to return, and once came precious near reeling from my saddle; but one of the men near set me right, and I managed to keep on till we arrived?"

"Where was Sergeant Marvyn all the time? Was there nobody to assist you?"

"Well, the fact was, Althorpe, I was so much better off than some of the poor fellows that I couldn't stand taking the care that might save the life of another; so I made Marvyn ride on and help the rest."

An odd smile dawned on Althorpe's impassible face. "So you took the risk of profiting by a rebel surgeon instead of your own for the sake of men who couldn't live any way, I dare say. Charley, you always were a good-natured goose!"

Charley laughed over this speech, but Margy Gaines frowned.

She looked admiringly, as any woman must, at the modest, manly fellow, so unconscious of his own merits, so conscious of his comrade's.

Lieutenant Charley's star had arisen.

Just then came out General Rose from the hall, where he had been reading his paper. His face brightened as he saw young Morris.

"Well, Sir, how's the leg to-day?"

The Lieutenant touched his cap.

"Almost ready for action, Sir. I shall be off next week."

The General bowed with gracious pleasure to the young soldier, adding a word or two of graceful compliment, and passed on, casting rather a grim look at Althorpe, whom he considered, I suppose, about as useless a bit of flesh as cumbered the earth. Althorpe himself catching it, smiled satirically, and quoted in a musing tone from one of the famous old French cynics: "The world is a farce, and its favors are follies; but farces and follies are very dear to human hearts."

"When its favors are well-earned I think they cease to be follies," spoke up Miss Margy Gaines, with a fine scarlet flushing her cheeks, as she bade the gentlemen good-morning and went up to her room.

Mrs. Alayne Gaines—Aunt Alayne—wanted to know what had disturbed Miss Margy, as she appeared before her with the red in her cheeks and the fire in her eyes.

"Althorpe has disturbed me; I do think he is outrageous, Aunt Alayne." And she repeated the conversation.

Aunt Alayne was an easy-tempered body; then Althorpe was a bon parti too; so she offered, consolingly,

"Oh, well, he doesn't mean it."

Excitable little Margy blazed.

"Doesn't mean it! That's the worst of it! How can a man with any soul or heart jest over such subjects? He hasn't a spark of patriotism or feeling, the idle, selfish fellow. If he was a ninny, like Lifford, one wouldn't care so much; but with an intellect and culture such as his, it is positively painful to see only careless waste of life. Why doesn't he put himself to some use? There he goes now, riding off to his club, I suppose, and Barton driving! Why doesn't he drive himself? Why doesn't he walk?" She finished with a little fizz and flash, which was laughable when we consider that Miss Margy Gaines was by no means of the democracy who sneer at "tandems and tilburys, and jaunty grooms and footmen," but a young person of decidedly luxurious, not to say extravagant, tastes, who followed them out, too, as well as she was able. But we must make allowance for the blaze of patriotism which set fire to the combustible temper of which Mr. Althorpe spoke rather impertinently a while ago.

The patriotic flame was kept burning brightly the ensuing week. What with Lieutenant Charley, and the hero Halliday, and General Rose's frequent presence and inspiring talk, the time flew. Althorpe in the mean while laughed, and declared their talk was continually running to the tune of the Star-Spangled Banner and Yankee Doodle.

To Margy Gaines's surprise this laughing banter did not seem to offend either Morris or Halliday. The latter, in fact, appeared to regard Althorpe with admiration, and Margy used to see them driving out together nearly every day, and sometimes Halliday, poor wounded soldier, would come walking up the avenue, leaning wearily on Althorpe's arm; and then Margy would notice that the talking seemed earnest and grave, and Althorpe's face wore none of its cynic sneers. Then Margy would relent, perhaps, to return again to her belligerent position that same evening, very likely, at some irreverent satire of the incorrigible Althorpe's.

So she had gradually worked herself up into quite a little prejudice for the gentleman, which wasn't pleasant nor comfortable; for there was a curious charm about the man that held people, spite of themselves, enchained with a sort of admiring respect for his honest disbeliefs and courageous daring of speech: but Margy Gaines was not going to be misled by these brilliant qualities, when such lack of Christian charity and self-sacrifice were apparent; and it really seemed that she spared no pains to let the gentleman know precisely in what regard she held him; and actually—this was the most provoking part of it—the audacious fellow appeared to mind it no more than the buzzing of a fly. But one night Margy felt strangely sorry and rebuked.

They were sitting in a group of a dozen or so, outside one of the deep windows, and a mixture of gaslight and moon-rays lit them up, and showed faces and features distinctly to each other. In view of their coming change of life, perhaps, Morris and Halliday were unusually quiet though certainly not downcast; a little graver, that was all. Althorpe, on the other hand, was full of sharp wit and odd satire, uncommonly brilliant and gracious at the same time.

At the last of the evening the two soldiers, Halliday especially, in speaking of the next few months that were to come, dwelt with a certain yearning tenderness upon the peaceful scenes they would leave behind them, Althorpe answered, gayly,

"Yes, think of the hops and matinées, the parties and pleasurings of all descriptions. Think what entrancing polkas you lose, what waltzes you forego, what walks and talks, what boatings and bathings, all to be put against tent-life, and swamp marches, and the chance of a broken leg, from which discomforts you extract that one little sweet kernel, patriotism."

The "boys" laughed with seeming good understanding of his speech. Indeed, so great was this man's charm for some, that they never thought to question what he said or what he did; but Margy was sorely irritated, and replied sharply,

"Mr. Althorpe cares so little for that sweet kernel that he will do himself the pleasure and honor of dancing your polkas and waltzes while you fight his battles."

Honest Jack Halliday, speaking of it afterward, said that those who heard this were so amazed that they looked at the speaker in wonderment and silence; and a few moments later, when the young lady rose and bade them good-night, the little incident took place which brought her rebuke.

She had turned to go through the low open window, but her foot caught, and her head, reared rather too loftily for the occasion, struck the lower bar.

Althorpe was the first to spring forward, and his arm saved her from falling. The next instant he flung up the sash, and helping her over the sill, stood at the inner door waiting for her to pass. Lifting her eyes to thank him, she met a look, kind but with a dignity of reproach which touched her sorely. The color rose, her glance fell, and her "Thank you" came somewhat faintly.

In vain, thinking it over, she tried to justify herself, recalling his sneering satire. Remembering that look, she felt humiliated and abashed, and asked herself, "What right have I to judge him?"

Such a position isn't pleasant, and in it we are rather inclined to be unjust and inconsistent. Thus Miss Margaret Gaines found herself placed. It wasn't pleasant to feel humiliated, and she did not like Mr. Althorpe's society any the better for it. But not a whit did Mr. Althorpe change to her. Easy, brilliant, and good-humored, he went on as before, with a sort of insouciant gayety which was specially trying to her now. And in this way the week passed, and an eventful day came.

Looking out of the window in the morning she had seen Althorpe welcoming a stranger, a new-comer, just alighting from a carriage at the door. A few minutes later, in the room adjoining her own, and connected by a barred door, she heard voices, Althorpe's and another's, commonplaces about the apartment, etc. But by-and-by the little bustle of arrival was over, and the desultory talk, light and indifferent, deepened. Margy forgot herself as she involuntarily listened.

The state of the country being mentioned by the stranger, Althorpe joined him in a grave earnestness of regret and sorrow for the dark days that were upon them that Margaret had never heard from his lips before. Evidently this stranger stood in some nearer, closer relation of friendship to him than any other.

At last the new voice said,

"I shall throw up my official position, Althorpe, and join the army. I have had a commission offered me by General ——. My human nature can stand it no longer. We need men, men to save the country."

"I wish to Heaven I could go with you!" suddenly burst from Althorpe.

The other paused a moment; then lower of tone, with infinite tenderness, as it were, he asked,

"And why don't you, Althorpe? I have never asked you before; but I have wondered, knowing your feelings."

"You have wondered and never doubted, Allen; knowing me to be an able-bodied fellow, rich and idle."

"Doubt? Doubt and you can't come together in my mind, Althorpe. If others think you a cold-blooded cynic, I know they are entirely mistaken. I know the big heart underneath, Larry. Doubt you? I should think not."

"And because you have not, because you do not; and have all this time left me unquestioned by look or word, Allen, I will tell you why I do not go; but it is under a bond of solemn, sacred silence. You will keep my secret, Allen—a secret known only to one other besides myself?"

"Of course, my boy—I keep your secrets. Go on."

There was a brief pause; then, in a quiet sort of way, Althorpe began:

"You know that I am counted immensely wealthy, Allen—that my income is very large; but you do not know that the property from which I derive my income is entailed."

Margaret wondered what this had to do with the matter. Perhaps his other listener wondered as well, but it was not for long.

"By the will of my great-uncle, from whom this fortune came, the next heir is my cousin, Crawford More."

"Crawford More!" burst out his companion; "that selfish libertine, Crawford More!"

"Yes; a selfish libertine, as you say; a man careless of every thing but his own personal pleasure; unscrupulous and unprincipled to the last degree. If I should die, you can judge what use he would make of this princely fortune. You can judge if the country would gain by it." A little pause again, which the other did not break; and then again, in a hesitating voice of reluctant shyness, which no one would have suspected in Lawrence Althorpe, "I have but one life, Allen; I might lay it down on the first day I entered the field. Then my use would be all gone, and the property, over which I have no control, would be worse than useless to my country, for you well know the Southern sympathies of More. So I stay at home, take the best possible care of my life, and put my money as fast as I get it to the national use. You know what my income is; you know what my expenses were. I'll show you what they are now." A sound of a pen scratching something on a piece of paper came to Margaret's ears. Then the other's voice, exclaiming, as he read it, "Jove, Althorpe! you don't mean to say—?" "Yes; I mean to say that I am serving my country to the best of my ability. Under the circumstances I can't risk my life for it, you see, for the country would lose by it."

The old jocular tone, deprecating sentiment, was coming back again; but Allen stayed it a moment as he exclaimed,

"And here you go on—why it is more than a year—the very soul of patriotism! A soldier, too, by natural qualities, silently bearing speculation and suspicion of your inactive position, while you are learning to live on a tenth part of your income that the rest may be given to support the government! You, the proudest man alive, bear suspicion and blame, and deprive yourself of the very life you long for—for I always knew you were a born soldier, Althorpe—that you may serve your country to the best of your ability! Althorpe, you are a hero! But, my dear boy, you will pardon me for saying that you are morbidly modest. Why not give your motive?"

"No, no, Allen; it would sound Quixotic, sentimental, and all that sort of thing. Besides, the world would get it wrong some way. I should be no better for it. Then what does it matter? I hate to be talked over in that way. You know what I have suffered from ostentation and display. My poor father, you know—it was his one folly; and perhaps that has made me morbid. But let us say no more about it. Remember you are to keep my secret."

"Of course; but, Larry, I wish I could be delirious, and let it out innocently."

A laugh followed this. But Margy Gaines waited to hear no more. Impulsive little enthusiast! she looked upon herself as an instrument of deliverance; and any one could have caught glimpses of her meaning if they had heard her as she flew about softly from toilet to table in her hurried dressing, saying lowly to herself, "The splendid fellow! To think I have so misjudged him! I'll atone for it, though! Let it out innocently! They little think who—oh dear!" jerk, and away went a shoe-lace. "If Justine wouldn't chatter so I'd ring for her; but they'd—there goes another string! I never shall get ready!"

But she did, and in a few minutes was speeding away on her self-imposed mission.

By night of that day the reason of Lawrence Althorpe's apparent inaction was no longer a secret among those who had wondered and speculated there.

Lawrence himself, sauntering out upon the piazza that night, was met with hearty hand-shakes and compliments; and General Rose, gouty old veteran, almost embraced him in his fervor of apology and praise.

What did it mean? Embarrassed and annoyed as he could not help being, even in the natural gladness of being understood, he turned with a look of reproach to Allen. Could it be that that old friend had betrayed him?

But just here a little hand goes winding across his arm; a sweet voice pleads in its prettiest way,

"I've got something to tell you, Mr. Althorpe; will you come and listen?"

Do you think, Stoic as he tried to be, that he could resist that? No; and, walking up and down there, Margy made her confession. Told him how she had played eavesdropper, and then spread her knowledge.

Would he forgive her? Stealing a look at the grave, quiet face bent thoughtfully down. Would he forgive her? He drew her off upon one of the side piazzas.

"Forgive you, dear child!" he said, wistfully. "I have much to be forgiven; but now you know I am not quite so bad as you thought, do you think you could take the rest on trust, Margy?"

She started, colored. What! did she understand him? He gathered hope from her shy warmth, and went on:

"Margaret; Margy; don't you know that I've been in love with you all the time? Do you think you could like me a little, Margy?"

There was no sneering now, no lightness, only deep, honest tenderness.

And Margy? If you have not guessed that out of her unacknowledged interest in this "cold-blooded cynic" had sprung her fierce resentment, you are not so wise as I thought. Perhaps Lawrence Althorpe read something of this in her naïve confession, and so took heart of faith to proffer his suit.

He did not proffer it in vain. And walking there, she suddenly asked,

"Mr. Althorpe, did you send me those lilies?"

"I did, Miss Gaines," he answered, with mock gravity. "I dazed about from dark to dawn, and waded knee-deep to please a small person, who immediately attributes my sentimentalism to another man;" and once more he glowed with the old wit that Margy was never more to misunderstand.

But a trial and test was coming to Margaret Gaines which would prove her patriotic enthusiasm. That very week came intelligence that changed the plans of Lawrence Althorpe.

Crawford More was dead.

The property in this event was, according to this strange will, to remain without reservation in the possession of Lawrence Althorpe and his heirs, or legatees, according to his own disposition. When Margaret was apprised she well knew what to expect. Her heart sickened as she contemplated probable consequences; but lifting her eyes to the face of her lover, she had no words of discouragement or of discontent to offer. That face with its shade of bondage forever lifted from it, free to wear no masks, but follow out its destiny. He would fight for his country after all! That was what she read there.

The vast property left to him now without "reservation, according to his own disposition," was most generously disposed. A portion set apart whose yearly income was to be applied to that "sacred use" he had so faithfully kept in view, whether he lived to fight for the cause or laid down his life on his first battle-field.

Going, he drew from his finger that curious little ring that had often excited question in Margy's mind. The ring he had avowed to be his ladye love's.

"It was my mother's betrothal ring, Margy," he said, "and dearer to me than any token I could bestow: will you wear it for yours, dear?"

And Margy's last misgiving was removed. She would never more doubt or misunderstand this loyal, tender heart—no matter under what masks it might hide itself, either in seeking her love or serving his country.

THE LATE GENERAL ROBERT L. M'COOK.

On page 556 we publish a portrait of the late General Robert L. M'Cook, who was brutally murdered on 6th inst. by a band of Southern banditti, near Salem, Alabama. Our portrait is from a card-photograph, kindly furnished us by Messrs. Robert Clarke & Co., Cincinnati.

Robert L. M'Cook was a native of Jefferson County, Ohio, and thirty-five years of age at the time of his death. As a boy he was very manly, and attracted considerable attention. He studied law, and opened an office, when he came of age, at Columbus, but subsequently removed to Cincinnati. Though a Buchanan Democrat, Robert L. M'Cook was one of the first men at the West to denounce the imbecility and treason which marked the close of Buchanan's administration; and as soon as the first call for troops was issued he raised a regiment of Germans.

We take the following account of his glorious career as a soldier from the Cincinnati Commercial:

His regiment was detained in Camp Harrison and Camp Dennison from April until the middle of June (1861), during which period it was drilled into a state of extraordinary perfection, and it was characterized by General M'Clellan as the best regiment he had ever seen, whether in Europe or America. This distinguished compliment was iterated and reiterated after it entered the field. On the 18th of June, last year, Colonel M'Cook landed at Parkersburg, and his regiment was immediately attached by General M'Clellan as his vanguard; and it accompanied him to Grafton, near which point it went into camp on the night of the 22d June. The next day it marched to Phillippi, at which point an attack by the enemy was expected. The troops which were then holding that position were encamped upon the mountains. Colonel M'Cook conceiving that the valley was more desirable, moved his men directly down, against the suggestions of the officers, who regarded his movement dangerous. Said M'Cook, "We came to fight, and if the rebels think they can drive my Dutchmen out of the hollow, let 'em try it." During a few days he was in command at Phillippi, by virtue of seniority; but when General Rosecrans moved down toward Buckhannon, M'Cook was ordered to advance; and he took the van, moving into Buckhannon at the head of the column. He had now been in the field but three weeks, but he had already established a reputation for daring, and was reported the most reliable and valuable reconnoissance officer in the army. When General M'Clellan joined the column at Buckhannon M'Cook was again placed in advance, and he led the van thenceforth as long as General M'Clellan was in Western Virginia.

At Rich Mountain his regiment was selected to make the armed reconnoissance on the 10th of July, and it was so admirably managed that it won the applause of the whole army. Five of his "Bully Dutchmen" fell in the enterprise. But for green troops their steadiness and mobility was considered astonishing. Veterans could not have behaved better. After the battle of Rich Mountain (11th), General M'Clellan moved rapidly on beyond Cheat Mountain, M'Cook being still in advance; but the campaign was soon closed. General M'Clellan was then called to Washington, and General Rosecrans assumed command of the Department. M'Cook was now sent up the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to New Creek, where he saw much severe service; and before the middle of August he had crossed and recrossed Rich Mountain with his regiment six times. When General Rosecrans perfected the plan of his Gauley River campaign M'Cook was again required, and at Sutton he was assigned to command the Second Brigade.

On the 10th of September, at the battle of Carnifex Ferry, his command was held in reserve several hours, but at last an order to advance was received. A scene of enthusiasm, inspired by the gallant M'Cook, ensued which beggared description. He inflamed the men with fiery ardor by the most passionate appeals to their patriotism, and, under the direction of the gallant Hartsuff (now Brigadier) they marched in splendid order into the fight. Unhappily, the order of combat was such that they were not hurled immediately upon the breast-works of the enemy, but by orders of the superior officer they were held under a sharp fire without being able to return it effectively—M'Cook begging for an opportunity to carry his "Bully Dutchmen" over the "sticks and dirt" which protected the enemy. Here again the bold, determined character of our townsman was displayed, and his heroes came out of the fight more devoted to him than before.

After the retreat of the enemy, M'Cook's brigade was dispatched in pursuit, and he followed vigorously until halted by orders. At Sewall Mountain, and on New River, he was engaged in severe skirmishing, losing men on each occasion. After the escape of Floyd from Cotton Hill, he was finally, after six months of extraordinary service, in which he exhibited courage, enterprise, and judgment of a high order, ordered to Kentucky.

His subsequent career—so recent that it must be familiar to all—need not be detailed. He was not long in Kentucky before he gave the rebels a taste of the quality of his "Bully Dutchmen." They will never forget Mill Springs. The General commanding, and the troops alike, award that victory to Colonel M'Cook. It was one of the most glorious and most important of the war, because it broke the chain of defeats, and inaugurated a series of brilliant triumphs. It was memorable, also, as the first in the war in which bayonets were used effectively, and it was Colonel M'Cook who ordered cold steel into requisition. It was here that he was wounded, and although most men would have taken advantage of such a circumstance to enjoy a long furlough, he remained away from his post only long enough to recover sufficient strength to ride on horseback, and he returned to duty long before the wound healed—setting an example of devotion to duty eminently characteristic of himself, but of few other officers in service. After the evacuation of Bowling Green he moved forward with General Buell's command, but we believe was not in any engagement after Mill Springs. For his conduct in the latter the President promptly promoted him to a Brigadiership, and the Senate confirmed the appointment unanimously; but on account of the mutual attachment existing between himself and his splendid regiment, and on account of some dispute relative to his successor, which could not be amicably arranged, he never accepted his new commission.

Colonel M'Cook was a hardy, muscular man, of medium height. He so scorned display that he steadfastly refused to wear the uniform of his rank. He was frank and rugged, with stern decision of character, and was remarkable for his devotion to his regiment. Indeed he carried his disposition to provide for it to such an extent that he frequently had the field-officers of the whole army of Western Virginia protesting against his determined and successful efforts in securing the comfort of his command.

We gave an account of his murder in last week's paper. The following, from the Commercial, is another version:

The General was not riding in advance of his whole brigade, as the first accounts led us to suppose, but between the several regiments composing it. The 18th Regulars and a part of the 1st Ohio Cavalry had passed over the road ahead of him. The rebel assassins lay in waiting in brush adjoining the road all the morning, and managed to remain undiscovered by the advance body of the brigade. It is supposed that they were fully apprised by citizen spies of the General's helpless condition and mode of traveling, and formed an ambush for the special purpose of his assassination. They were about one hundred and fifty strong, and partly composed of Forrest's Cavalry, and partly of residents of the vicinity. The individual who shot the General is known to be one of the latter. The cowardly murderer goes by the name of Charles Wood.

The General was accompanied by his usual escort of twelve of the 1st Ohio Cavalry on the day of his death. Unfortunately, just before the guerrillas commenced their work, he sent three of these with orders to different portions of the brigade. At the time the attack was made three others were off the road looking out for a camping-ground. The escort was thus reduced to six. Of this corporal's guard five started to run after the first shot from the rebels. In vain did the remaining one call upon them not to act like cowards, but stand and defend their General. In vain did the latter himself order them to rally in the road between the guerrillas and his vehicle, so as to give him time to get a start. They followed their craven instincts, and sacrificed their General. The brave sixth man stood alone, and was wounded and captured. The General was riding in a spring-wagon and lying down.

Captain Hunter Brooke, formerly of this city, was riding with the General, who, owing to his feeble condition, was lying in the bottom of the box. When the guerrillas opened fire upon the conveyance, General M'Cook at once exclaimed, "The bushwhackers are upon us!" ordered the driver, his negro servant John, to turn quickly around, and rose to his knees to assist him in holding the frightened horses. The team was just fairly started when the murderer of the General came up and ordered it to halt. It being impossible to check the spirited horses at once, the team kept moving, when the guerrilla again ordered it to halt, but almost instantaneously fired the fatal shot from his carbine, although Captain Brooke begged him not to fire upon a sick man. Another rebel rode up at the same time and aimed his gun, when the General told him reproachfully, "You needn't shoot, I am already fatally wounded." The bullet passed entirely through his body, fatally tearing the intestines.

The main body of the rebels pursued the flying escort, and but three or four remained with their victim. The General was driven to and taken into the house, at which he died, by Captain Brooke and John. He stated afterward that when the party came up to the house the occupants, men, women, and children, clapped their hands in approbation of the rebel achievement. In a few minutes those that had gone in pursuit came tearing back, and hurried off with Captain Brooke. John, upon the advice of the General, had previously managed to escape out of the house and through a corn-field. Shortly afterward Captain Burt and party arrived.

The General lived about twenty-four hours after being wounded. He was conscious to the last, although frequently unable to speak from the dreadful pain he was suffering. Whenever able he uttered words of advice, gratitude, and consolation to those around him. The last moments found him as firm and calm as ever he was in the face of death.

Retribution—terrible retribution—is being dealt by the 9th Ohio. The hands of the men that cheered rebel murderers will clap no more. With fire, and sword, and bayonet the scene of the foul assassination was reduced to a state of desolation from which it will not recover until time will have swept away the remembrance of the death of Robert L. M'Cook.

The M'Cook family, as we have before intimated, appears to be pretty full of fighting qualities. The following is a list of the members of this family, all near relatives of Dr. George M'Cook, Sen., of Pittsburg, who have entered their country's service. They are as follows:

A. L. M'Cook, Surgeon.

Colonel George W. M'Cook, served during the three months.

General Alexander M'Dowell M'Cook.

General Robert L. M'Cook, Colonel Ninth Ohio.

Daniel M'Cook, Jun., Adjutant-General in General M'Cook's staff.

Edward M'Cook, Captain in Colonel Logan's Illinois regiment.

Charles M'Cook, killed at the battle of Bull Run.

Judge M'Cook, his father, also had a fight on his own hook at Bolivar Heights under Colonel Geary, and was paymaster at Corinth.

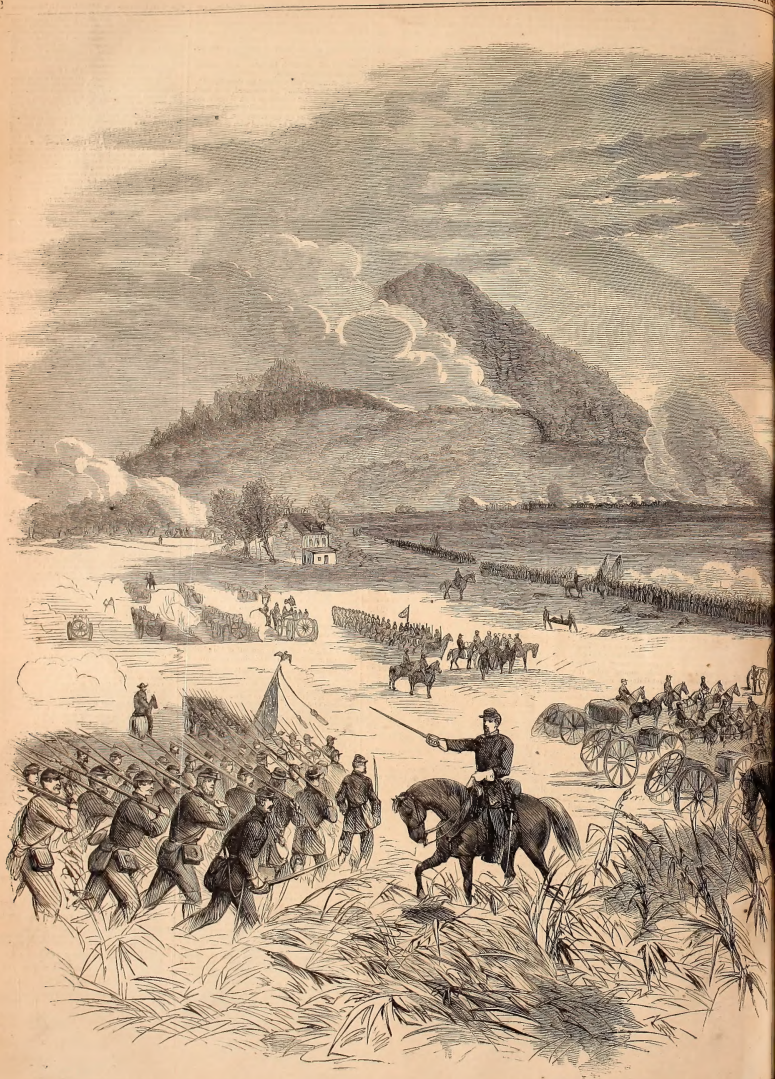
Edward S. M'Cook, Lieutenant in the Regular Army.

Major Anson M'Cook, Second Ohio.

Captain Henry M'Cook, in an Illinois regiment—number not known.

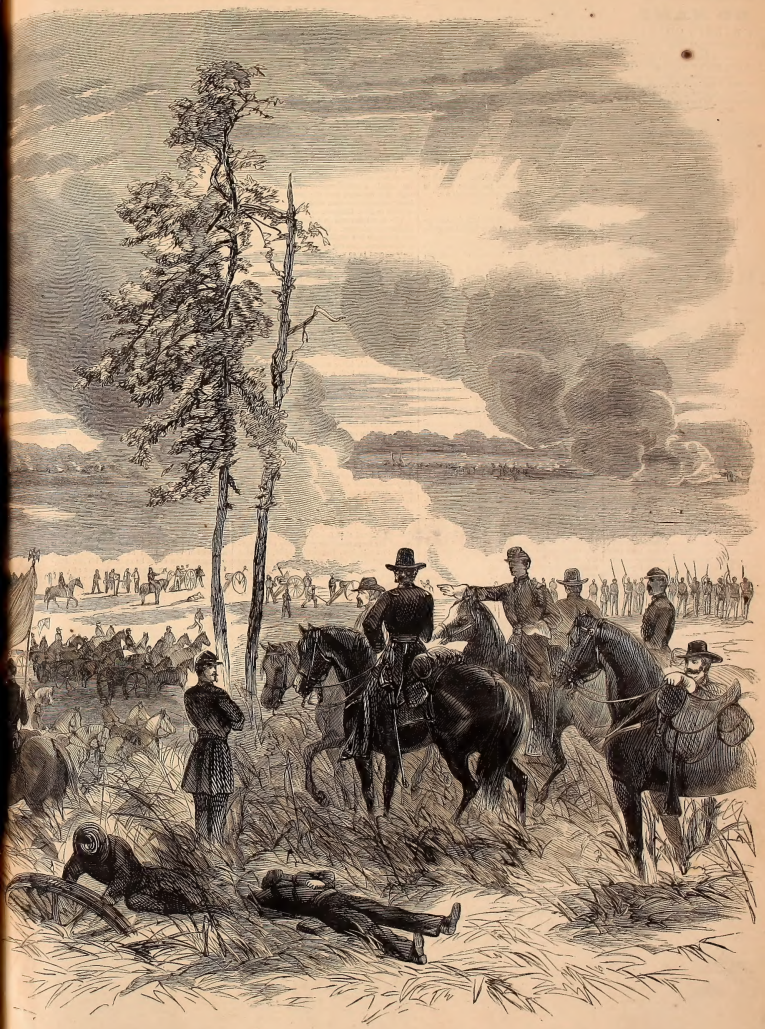
Sheldon M'Cook, Lieutenant in the Navy, on the flag-ship Minnesota.

John M'Cook, Quarter-master in a Virginia regiment.



Major Anson M'Cook was in the battle of West Liberty, Kentucky.

Captain Edwin M'Cook, of Colonel Logan's regiment, lost thirty men in the battle of Belmont, Missouri.



Captain Henry M'Cook was taken prisoner at the battle of Belmont, Missouri.

Lieutenant Sheldon M'Cook is on board the flag-ship Minnesota, and consequently was at the capture of Port Royal and Beaufort.

Members of the family were in the following battles: Bull Run, Phillippi, Rich Mountain, Carnifex Ferry, Hatteras, Wilson's Creek, Belmont, Port Royal and Beaufort, West Liberty, and Bolivar Heights, Virginia.

CHAPTER VI.

ALL human penetration has its limits. Accurately as Captain Wragge had seen his way hitherto, even his sharp insight was now at fault. He finished his cigar with the mortifying conviction that he was totally unprepared for Mrs. Lecount's next proceeding.

In this emergency his experience warned him that there was one safe course, and one only, which he could take. He resolved to try the confusing effect on the housekeeper of a complete change of tactics before she had time to press her advantage and attack him in the dark. With this view he sent the servant up stairs to request that Miss Bygrave would come down and speak to him.

"I hope I don't disturb you," said the captain when Magdalen entered the room. "Allow me to apologize for the smell of tobacco, and to say two words on the subject of our next proceedings. To put it with my customary frankness, Mrs. Lecount puzzles me, and I propose to return the compliment by puzzling her. In the course of action which I have to suggest is a very simple one. I have had the honor of giving you a serious moral attack already, and I beg your permission (when Mr. Noel Vanstone sends to inquire to-morrow morning) to take the further liberty of laying you up altogether. Question from Sea-View Cottage: 'How is Miss Bygrave this morning?' Answer from North Shingles: 'Much worse; Miss Bygrave is confined to her room.' Question repeated every day, say for a fortnight: 'How is Miss Bygrave?' Answer repeated, if necessary, for the same time: 'No better.' Can you bear the imprisonment? I see no objection to your getting a breath of fresh air the first thing in the morning or the last thing at night. But for the whole of the day, there is no disguising it, you must put yourself in the same category with Miss Wragge—you must keep your room."

"What is your object in wishing me to do this?" inquired Magdalen.

"My object is two-fold," replied the captain. "I wish for my own enjoyment, and in fact I cannot see my way plainly to Mrs. Lecount's move, if I feel sure of it, but for the purpose to make another attempt at opening her master's eyes to the truth. Whatever means she may employ to discover your identity, personal communication with you must be necessary to the accomplishment of her object. Deny her that, if I stop that communication, I put an obstacle in her way at starting—or, as we say at cards, I force her hand. Do you see that now?"

Magdalen saw it plainly. The captain went on:

"My second reason for shutting you up," he said, "refers entirely to Mrs. Lecount's master. The growth of love, my dear child, is, in one respect, unlike all other growths—it flourishes under adverse circumstances. Our first course of action is to make Mr. Noel Vanstone feel the charm of your society. Our next is to drive him distracted by the loss of it. I should like to expound a few more maxims, with a view to furthering this end, but for our present position we must return toward Mrs. Lecount. As it is, we must trust to the effect you produced yesterday, and try the experiment of a sudden appearance rather sooner than I could have otherwise wished. I shall see Mr. Noel Vanstone, though you don't —and if there is a raw place established any where about the region of that gentleman's heart, trust me to hit him on it! You are now in full possession of my views. Take your time to consider, and give me your answer—Yes or No."

"Any change is for the better," said Magdalen, "which keeps me out of the company of Mrs. Lecount and her master! Let it be as you wish."

She had hitherto answered faintly and wearily; but she spoke those last words with a heightened tone and a rising color—signs which warned Captain Wragge not to press her further.

"Very good," said the captain. "As usual, we understand each other. I see you are tired, and I won't detain you any longer."

He rose to open the door, stopped half-way to it, and came back again. "I am sure me to arrange matters with the servant down stairs," he continued. "I dare say she can't abide her own bed, and we must purchase the girl's discretion when she answers the door—without taking her into our confidence, of course. I will make her understand that she is to say you are ill, just as she might say we are not at home, as a hint at keeping unwelcome acquaintances out of the house. Allow me to open the door for you. I beg your pardon, you are finishing Mrs. Wragge's work-room instead of going to your own."

"I know I am," said Magdalen. "I wish to remove Mrs. Wragge from the worst room in the house and to take her up stairs with me."

"For the evening?"

"For the whole time, if you please," said the captain. "Take Mrs. Wragge, by all means. I don't want her." Having resigned the partner of his existence in those terms, he discreetly returned to the parlor. "The weakness of the sex!" thought the captain, tapping his sagacious head. "Only a hint on the female intellect—and the female temper gives way directly."

The strain to which the captain alluded was not confined that evening to the female intellect in North Shingles. After a long day's writing and toilet at Sea View. For nearly two hours Mrs. Lecount was at the window—now pacing, and writing again, before she could produce a letter to Miss Vanstone the elder which exactly accomplished the object on which she aimed. When the rough draft was completed to her satisfaction, and she had a fair copy of it forthwith, to be posted the next day.

Her letter thus produced was a master-piece of ingenuity. After the most unexceptionable references the housekeeper plainly informed Norah of the appearance of the new name and style of Vauxhall Walk; of the conversation which passed at the interview; and of her own suspicion that the person claiming to be Miss Bygrave was, in all probability, the younger Miss Vanstone herself. Having put this view before her, Mrs. Lecount next proceeded to say that her master was in possession of evidence which would justify him in refusing to see his wife's sister, if he knew the conspiracy with which he was threatened; that he had, in fact, received a letter from Captain Wragge, and that he only hesitated to protect himself in deference to family considerations, and to the wishes of his wife. Captain Wragge might so influence her sister as to render it unnecessary to proceed to extremities.

Under these circumstances (the letter continued) it was plainly necessary that the disguised person in Vauxhall Walk should be instantly identified—for if Mrs. Lecount's guess proved to be wrong, and if the person in question was a stranger, Mr. Noel Vanstone was positively resolved to prosecute in his own defence. Events in Aldborough would write back again to report abroad, would enable Mrs. Lecount in a few days to gain sight of the suspected person, in her own character. But as the housekeeper was entirely unacquainted with the younger Miss Vanstone, it was obviously desirable that some better informed person should, in this particular, take the matter in hand. If the elder Miss Vanstone happened to be at liberty to come to Aldborough herself, would she kindly write and say so? and Mrs. Lecount would write back again to appoint a day. If, on the other hand, Miss Vanstone was prevented from taking the journey, Mrs. Lecount suggested that Norah herself should contain the fullest description of her sister's personal appearance—should mention any little peculiarities which might exist in the way of marks on the face or hands—and should state (in case she had written before) what the address was in her last letter, and failing that, what the postmark was on the envelope. This information to help her, Mrs. Lecount would, in the interest of the misguided young lady herself, accept the responsibility of privately identifying her; and would write back immediately to acquaint the elder Miss Vanstone with the result.

The difficulty of sending this letter to the right address gave Mrs. Lecount very little trouble. Remembering the name of the lawyer who had pleaded the cause of the two sisters, in Michael Vanstone's time, she directed her letter to "Miss Vanstone, care of —— Pendril, Esquire, London." This she inclosed in a second envelope, addressed to Mr. Noel Vanstone's solicitor, with a line inside, requesting that gentleman to send it at once to the office of Mr. Pendril.

"Now," thought Mrs. Lecount, as she locked the letter up in her desk, preparatory to posting it the next day, with her own hand, "Now I have got her!"

The next morning the servant from Sea View came, with her master's compliments, to make inquiries after Miss Bygrave's health. Captain Wragge's bulletin was duly announced—Miss Bygrave was so ill as to be confined to her room.

On the reception of this intelligence, Mr. Noel Vanstone's anxiety led him to call at North Shingles himself, when he went out for his afternoon walk. Miss Bygrave was no better. He inquired if he could see Mr. Bygrave. The wife's captain was prepared to meet this emergency. He thought a little arresting suspense would do Mr. Noel Vanstone no harm; and he had carefully charged the servant, in case of necessity, with her answer: "Mr. Bygrave begged to be excused; he was not able to see any one."

On the second day inquiries were made as before, by message in the morning, and by Mr. Noel Vanstone himself in the afternoon. The morning answer relating to Magdalen was, "A shade better." The afternoon answer (relating to Captain Wragge) was, "Mr. Bygrave had just gone out." That evening Mr. Noel Vanstone's temper was very uncertain; and Mrs. Lecount's patience and tact were sorely tried in the effort to avoid offending him.

On the third morning the report of the sufferers by young and by sex favorable—"Miss Bygrave was still very poorly, and not able to leave her bed." The servant, returning to Sea View with this message, met the postman, and took into the breakfast-room with her two letters addressed to Mrs. Lecount.

The first letter was in a handwriting familiar to the housekeeper. It was from the medical attendant on her invalid brother at Zurich; and it announced that the patient's malady had latterly altered in so marked a manner for the better that there was every hope now of preserving his life.

The address on the second letter was in a strange handwriting. Mrs. Lecount, concluding that it was the answer from Miss Vanstone, waited to read it until breakfast was over, and she could retire to her own room.

She opened the letter, looked at once for the name at the end, and started a little as she read it. The signature was not "Norah Vanstone," but "Horace Holmcroft."

Miss Garth's letter announced that the elder Miss Vanstone had, a week since, accepted an engagement as governess—subject to the condition of joining the family of her employer at their temporary residence in the south of France, and of returning with them—then their course back to England, probably in a month or six weeks' time. During the interval of this necessary absence Miss Vanstone had requested Miss Garth to open all her letters; her main object in making that arrangement being to provide for the speedy answering of any communication which might arrive for her from her sister. Miss Magdalen Vanstone had not written since the middle of July—on which occasion the post-mark on the letter showed that it must have been posted in London, in the district of Lambeth—and her elder sister had left England in a state of the most distressing anxiety on her account.

Having completed this explanation Miss Garth then mentioned that family circumstances prevented her from traveling personally to Aldborough to assist Mr. Lecount's object, but that she was provided with a substitute, in every way fitter for the purpose, in the person of Mr. Pendril. That gentleman was well acquainted with Miss Magdalen Vanstone; and his professional experience and discretion would render his assistance doubly valuable. He had already consented to travel to Aldborough whenever it might be thought necessary. But as his time was very valuable, Miss Garth specially requested that he might not be sent for until Mrs. Lecount was quite sure of the day on which his services might be required.

While proposing this arrangement Miss Garth added that she thought it right to furnish her correspondent with a written description of the younger Miss Vanstone as well. An emergency might happen which would allow Mrs. Lecount no time for securing Mr. Pendril's services: and the execution of Mr. Noel Vanstone's intentions toward the unhappy girl who was the object of his forbearance might be fatally delayed by an unforeseen difficulty in establishing her identity. The personal description, transmitted under these circumstances, had been followed. It omitted no personal peculiarity by which Magdalen could be recognized; and it included the "two little moles close together on the left side of the nose," which had been formerly mentioned in the printed hand-bills sent to Vienna.

In conclusion Miss Garth expressed her fears that Mrs. Lecount's suspicions were only too likely to be proved true. While, however, there was the faintest chance that the conspiracy might turn out to be directed by a stranger, Miss Garth felt bound in gratitude toward Mr. Noel Vanstone, to assist the legal proceedings which would, in that case, be instituted. She accordingly suspended her own formal denial—which she would personally repeat, if necessary—of any identity between herself and the person in disguise who had made use of her name. She was the Miss Garth who had been the situation of the late Mr. Andrew Vanstone's governess; and she had never in her life been in, or near, the neighborhood of Vauxhall Walk.

With this declinature—and with the writer's fervent assurances that she would do all for Magdalen's advantage which her sister might have done if her sister had been in England—the letter concluded. It was signed in full, and was dated with the business-like accuracy in such matters which had always distinguished Miss Garth's character.

This letter placed a formidable weapon in the housekeeper's hands.

It provided a means of establishing Miss Bygrave's identity through the intervention of a lawyer by profession. It contained a personal description minute enough to be used to advantage, if necessary, before Mr. Pendril's appearance. It presented a signed exposure of the false Miss Garth, under the hand of the true Miss Garth; and it established the fact that the last letters received by the absent Miss Vanstone from the younger had been posted (and therefore probably written) in the neighborhood of Vauxhall Walk. If any later letter had been received, with the Aldborough post-mark, the chain of evidence, so far as the question of localities was concerned, might doubtless have been more complete. But, as it was, there was testimony enough (aided as that testimony might be, by the fragment of the brown alpaca dress still in Mrs. Lecount's possession) to raise a shrewd which hung over the conspiracy, and to place Mr. Noel Vanstone face to face with the plain and startling truth.

The one obstacle which now stood in the way of immediate action on the housekeeper's part was the obstacle of Miss Bygrave's present seclusion within the limits of her own room. The question of gaining personal access to her, was a question which must be decided before any communication could be opened with Mr. Pendril. Mrs. Lecount put on her bonnet at once, and called at North Shingles to try what discoveries she could make for herself before post-time.

On this occasion Mr. Bygrave was at home, and she was admitted without the least difficulty.

Careful consideration that morning had decided Captain Wragge on advancing matters a little nearer to the crisis. The means by which he proposed achieving this result made it necessary for him to see the housekeeper and her master separately, and to set them at variance by producing two totally opposite impressions relating to himself on their minds. Mrs. Le-cousin's visit, therefore, instead of causing him any embarrassment, was the most welcome occurrence he could have wished for. He received her in the parlor with a marked restraint of manner for which she was quite unprepared. His ingratiating smile was gone and an impenetrable solemnity of countenance appeared in its stead.

"I have ventured to intrude on you, Sir," said Mrs. Locust, "to express the regret with which both my cousin and I have learned of Miss Bygrave's illness. Is there no improvement?"

"No, ma'am," replied the captain, as briefly as possible. "My niece is no better."

"I have had some experience, Mr. Bygrave, in nursing. If I could be of any use—"

"Thank you, Mrs. Locust. There is no necessity for our taking advantage of your kindness."

This plain answer was followed by a moment's silence. The housekeeper felt some little perplexity. What had become of Mr. Bygrave's elaborate courtesy, and Mr. Bygrave's many words? Did he want to offend her? If he did, Mrs. Locust then and there determined that he should not gain his object.

"May I inquire the nature of the illness?" she persisted. "It is not connected, I hope, with our excursion to Dunwich?"

"I regret to say, ma'am," replied the captain, "it began with that unfortunate affair in the carriage."

"Ah, so!" thought Mrs. Locust. "He doesn't even try to make me think the illness a real one; he throws off the mask at starting!—It is a severe illness, Sir?" she added aloud.

The captain answered by a solemn affirmative inclination of the head.

"Then you have two nervous sufferers in the house, Mr. Bygrave?"

"Yes, ma'am—two. My wife and my niece."

"I.at is rather a strange coincidence of misfortunes."

"It is, ma'am. Very strange."

In spite of Mrs. Locust's resolution not to be offended, Mr. Bygrave's manner, and especially his sensibility to every stroke she aimed at him began to ruffle her. She was conscious of some little difficulty in securing the self-possession before she could say any thing more.

"Is there no immediate hope," she resumed, "of Miss Bygrave being able to leave her room?"

"None whatever, ma'am."

"You are satisfied, I suppose, with the medical attendance?"

"I have no medical attendance," said the captain, composedly. "I watch the case myself."

The gathering venom in Mrs. Locust swelled up at that reply, and overflowed at her lips.

"Your smattering of science, Sir," she said, with a malicious smile, "includes, I presume, a smattering of medicine as well?"

"It does, ma'am," answered the captain, without the slightest disturbance of face or manner. "I know as much of medicine as I do of chemistry."

The tone in which he spoke those words left Mrs. Locust but one dignified alternative. She rose to terminate the interview. The temptation of the moment proved too much for her, and she could not resist casting the shadow of a threat over Captain Wragge's partner.

"I defer thanking you, Sir, for the manner in which you have received me," she said, "until I can pay the debt of obligation with some grace. In the mean time I am glad to infer, from the absence of a medical attendant in the house, that Miss Bygrave's illness is much less serious than I had supposed it to be when I came here."

"I never contradict a lady, ma'am," rejoined the incorrigible captain. "If I, in your pleasure, when we next meet, to think my remarks quite well, I shall bow resignedly to the expression of your opinion." With those words he followed the housekeeper into the passage, and politely opened the door for her. "I mark the trick, ma'am!" he said to himself, as he closed it again. "The trump-card in your hand is a sight of my niece, and I'll take care you don't play it!"

He returned to the parlor and composedly awaited the next event which was likely to bring him a visit from Mrs. Locust's master. In less than an hour results began to appear. Wragge's anticipations, and Mr. Noel Vanstone walked in.

"My dear Sir!" cried the captain, cordially seizing his visitor's reluctant hand, "I know what you have come for. But, before you open the box of her visit here, and has no doubt declared that my niece's illness is a mere subterfuge. You feel surprised, you feel (if you possess the use of trifling with your kind sympathies—in short, you require an explanation. That explanation you shall have. Take a seat, Mr. Vanstone. I am about to throw myself on your sense and judgment as a man of the world. I acknowledge that we are in a false position, Sir; and I tell you plainly at the outset—your housekeeper is the cause of it."

For once in his life Mr. Noel Vanstone opened his eyes. "Locust!" he exclaimed, in the utmost bewilderment.

"The same, Sir," replied Captain Wragge. "I am afraid I offended Mrs. Lecount, when we came here this morning, by a want of cordiality in my manner. I am a plain man, and I can't assume what I don't feel. For be it from me to breathe a word against your housekeeper's character. She is, no doubt, a most excellent and trust-worthy woman; but she has one serious failing common to persons at her time of life who occupy her situation—she is jealous of her influence over her master, although you may not have observed it."

"I beg your pardon," interposed Mr. Noel Vanstone; "my observation is remarkably quick. Nothing escapes it."

"In that case, Sir," resumed the captain, "you can not fail to have noticed that Mrs. Lecount has allowed her jealousy to affect her conduct toward my niece?"

Mr. Noel Vanstone thought of the domestic storm at arm's length between Mrs. Lecount and himself when his guests of the evening had left Vere View, and failed to see his way to any direct reply. He inclined on the upon. Politely declaring that he was always an early man when the morning presented any special attraction to him, he awaited the explanations for seven o'clock, and rose soon afterward to take his leave.

"Understand a parting," said Captain Wragge. "This conversation is entirely between ourselves. Mrs. Locust must know nothing of the impression which has produced on my mind. I have not mentioned it to you to account for my apparently unfriendly conduct, and to satisfy your own mind. In confidence, Mr. Vanstone—strictly in confidence. Good-morning!"

With those parting words the captain bowed his visitor out. Unless some unexpected disaster occurred, he now saw his way safely to the end of the enterprise. He had gained the most important steps in advance that morning. He had sown the seeds of variance between the housekeeper and her master, and he had given Mr. Noel Vanstone a common interest with Magdalen and himself in keeping a secret from Mrs. Lecount. "We have caught our man," thought Captain Wragge, cheerfully rubbing his hands—"we have caught our man at last!"

Leaving North Shingles, Mr. Noel Vanstone walked straight home, fully resolved on his place in his own estimation, and sternly determined to carry matters with a high hand if he found himself in collision with Mrs. Lecount.

The housekeeper received her master at the door with her mildest manner and her gentlest smile. She addressed him with downcast eyes; and replied to his contemptuous assertion of independence a barrier of impenetrable respect.

"May I venture to ask, Sir," she began, "if Mr. Wragge has left Magdalen his leg on view for the same conclusion as mine on the subject of Miss Bygrave's illness?"

"Certainly not, Locust. I consider your conclusion to have been both hasty and prejudiced."

"I am sorry to hear it, Sir. I felt hurt by Mr. Bygrave's misconception of me—but I was not aware that my judgment was prejudiced by it. Perhaps he received you, Sir, with a warmer appreciation?"

"He received me like a gentleman—that is all I think it necessary to say, Locust—he received me like a gentleman."

This answer satisfied Mrs. Lecount on the one doubtful point which had perplexed her. Whatever Mr. Bygrave's sudden coolness toward her self might mean, his polite reception of her master implied that the plot of detention had not daunted him, and that the conspiracy was still in full progress. Her task was therefore clearly defined.

"You will probably visit Mr. Bygrave again, Sir?"

"Of course I shall visit him—if I please."

"And perhaps see Miss Bygrave, if she gets better?"

"Why not? I should be glad to know why not? Is it necessary to ask your leave first, Locust?"

"By no means, Sir. As you have often said (and as I most entirely agree with you), you are master. It may surprise you to hear it, Mr. Noel, but I have a private reason for wishing that you should see Miss Bygrave again."

Mr. Noel started a little, and looked at his housekeeper with some curiosity.

"I have a strange fancy of my own, Sir, about that young lady," proceeded Mrs. Lecount. "If you will excuse my fancy, and indulge it, you will do me a favor for which I shall be very grateful."

"A fancy?" repeated her master, in growing surprise. "What fancy?"

"Only this, Sir," said Mrs. Lecount.

She took from one of the neat little pockets of her apron a number of note paper, carefully folded into the smallest possible compass, and respectfully placed it on Mr. Noel Vanstone's knee.

"If you are willing to oblige an old and faithful servant, Mr. Noel," she said, in a very quiet and very deferential manner, "you will kindly put that morsel of paper into your waistcoat-pocket; you will read it, for the first time, when you are next in Miss Bygrave's company; and you will say nothing at what has now caused business to stir in your memory, from this time to that. I promise to explain my strange request, Sir, when you have done what I ask, and when your next interview with Miss Bygrave has come to an end."

She curtsied with her best grace, and quietly left the room.

Mr. Noel Vanstone looked from the folded paper to the door and from the door back to the folded paper, in unutterable astonishment. A mystery in his own house, under his own nose! What did it mean?

It meant that Mrs. Lecount had not wasted her time that morning. While the captain was casting the net over his visitor at North Shingles, the housekeeper was steadily mining the ground under his feet. The folded paper contained nothing less than a carefully-written extract from the personal description of Magdalen in Miss Garth's letter. With a daring ingenuity which only a woman's resources might have equal, Mrs. Lecount had found her instrument for exposing the conspiracy, in the unsuspecting person of the victim himself!

I am aware, is an unusual one—but later in the day my niece may be resting on the sofa, and may not be able to see visitors."

Having made this proposal, purely for the purpose of enabling Mr. Noel Vanstone to escape to North Shingles at an hour in the morning when his housekeeper would be probably in bed, Captain Wragge left him to take the hint, if he could, as indirectly as it had been given. He proved sharp enough (the case being one in which his own interests were concerned) to close with the proposal on the spot. Politely declaring that he was always an early man when the morning presented any special attraction to him, he awaited the explanations for seven o'clock, and rose soon afterward to take his leave.

"Understand a parting," said Captain Wragge. "This conversation is entirely between ourselves. Mrs. Locust must know nothing of the impression which has produced on my mind. Her task was therefore clearly defined. She had expressly calculated on this result. After a moment's thinking she addressed her master without further preface:

"You will probably visit Mr. Bygrave again, Sir?"

"Of course I shall visit him—if I please."

WRITTEN IN SAND.

THE thrifty western wind swept warm
Down all the slopes of the silent shore;
The light was failing fast; and my arm
Held the woman whom I adore.

She has a stately Juno-like face
Who has promis'd to stoop to be my wife;
A calm, unfaltering voice, and the grace
That comes with knowledge of life.

And as she look'd on the dark'ning sea,
And as I look'd in her eyes divine,
I "my own" write on the sand," she said,
"The name that will soon be mine."

The night was warm, and the honey-breath
Of the flowers on the cliffs was on my cheek;
But across me there swept even of the coldness of death,
And my tongue refused to speak.

For full on my ear, with a sudden rush,
There fell the sound of a distant shore;
And before we there rose the delicate blush
Of a cheek that shall blush no more.

And all the wealth of my present bliss,
The stately Juno-face at my side,
The half-caressant, half-careless kiss
Of her who shall soon be my bride—

Pass'd into darkness . . . and we stood,
My love and I, by the little bay
Sheltered over with fern-wood,
And then I remember'd a story,

And as I read her eyes' soft shame,
And as I held her trembling hand,
Slowly I wrote again a name
That was straight with ours in sand!

"Ah, not for me!" said a childish voice;
"That hope is all too high for me.
I am not worthy to be your choice:
Blot it away, O sea!"

And as the tide rose high, a wave,
Sudden and cold, swept the sweet name over;
And then I remember'd a grave,
And that I had forgot to love her.

But still, wherever we walk'd that night,
My bride and I, through the twilight gray,
Written in letters distinct and white,
Her name went before me.

And not for thrice her father's land,
And not for thrice the charms of my bride,
Could I have written a name i' the sand,
Save the name of her who died.

THE GUERRILLAS IN THE WEST.

ON page 548 we publish an illustration of the SACKING OF A CITY IN THE WEST BY THE GUERRILLAS under JOHN MORGAN. This shameless miscreant boasted of it when he returned from his raids in East Tennessee, that he had destroyed $2,000,000 worth of property during his raid into Kentucky. He did not enumerate the murders or the many outrages committed by his men; but we know from many sources that they did not perpetrate a thousandth part of crime. Guerrilla warfare involves, as a matter of necessity, almost every other horror in the calendar —murder, rape, robbery, and arson. The band which unites members of a guerrilla band together is love of plunder, lust, and violence. War, as carried on by civilized armies, has no attractions for them. It would not pay them. To reward them for the risks they run and the hardships they encounter without pay, they must make free with life, female virtue, and property. Wherever Morgan has penetrated shrieks of agony have gone up to Heaven from outraged matrons and maidens, butchered children, and sacked households. Parson Brownlee's book informs us of the degree of humanity possessed by the ruffians who ride with Morgan. Such God-forsaken wretches can not be found out of the purlieus of hell and the Feejee Islands and the Southern Slave States. The day will come when the West will exact a fearful retribution for the savage acts it endures at the hands of these creatures of slavery. Meanwhile they go on, ruining one of the finest regions of the world, without the poor credit of helping their bad cause one single hair's-breadth.

THE ARMY OF VIRGINIA.

WE publish on page 557 a couple of pictures of the ARMY OF VIRGINIA, one representing a REVIEW OF GENERAL FREMONT'S ARMY IN CENTRAL POPE, from a drawing by Mr. Anton Kellner; the other, opposite, the RECEPTION OF COMMANDANTS AT COLONEL CLUSERET'S HEAD-QUARTERS, from a sketch by our special artist, Mr. Davenport.

General Siegel commands the army lately commanded by General Fremont. He is said to be a high condition of efficiency. He is considered is known to be one of the ablest and most skilful of the foreign officers in our service. He left, we his native in Germany in 1848, and here he distracted general of brigade volunteers. Since by his conduct at the Battle of Pea Ridge, in Arkansas. When the right time comes General Siegel will be heard from.

Contrabands are flocking in to the army of Virginia in very large numbers. From the reports of the rebels themselves it appears that the able-bodied slaves in the northern counties of Virginia are rapidly disappearing. Well they may. We offer them freedom and work at good wages in exchange for slavery, for death, and for the prospect of being sold South. By-and-by we shall have enough of them on hand to build all our fortifications and do the work of laborers for the whole army.

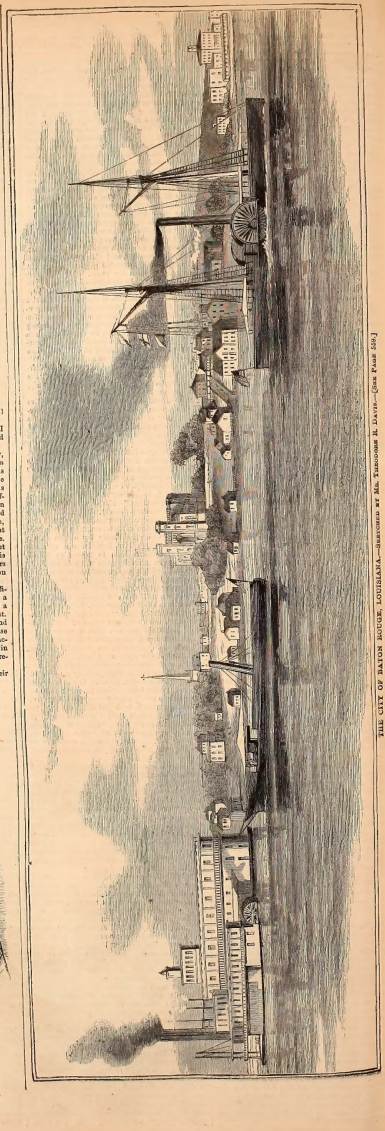
THE REBEL GENERAL STONEWALL JACKSON.

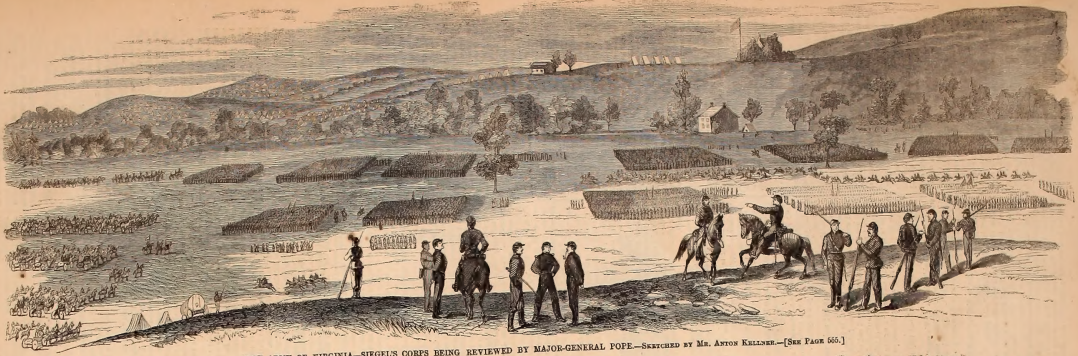
We publish on this page, from a photograph by Brody, a portrait of the famous rebel General Thomas Jefferson Jackson, better known as Stonewall Jackson.

Thomas J. Jackson was born in Virginia about the year 1825, and is consequently about thirty-eight years of age. He graduated at West Point in 1846, and in the following year accompanied Magruder's battery to Mexico. At Contreras and Churubusco he distinguished himself so highly on the field that he was brevetted Captain for gallantry. At Chapultepec he again won laurels, and was brevetted Major for gallant and meritorious conduct. On his return from Mexico he was for some time in command at Fort Hamilton; but in 1852 he resigned his rank. At the outbreak of the rebellion Major Jackson was one of those Southerners who were greatly embarrassed to discover the true line of their duty. He had married a Northern wife, was an honorable and conscientious man, and long hesitated what course to pursue. It is stated that his father-in-law, a Northern clergyman, visited him, and urged him to remain faithful to his country and his flag. They spent several hours in prayer together, and Jackson confessed that the struggle was sore. But finally the pernicious doctrine of State Rights, which, Jackson, like so many other gallant Southrons, had imbibed early in life, won the day: "I must go with Virginia!" he cried, and plunged headlong into the vortex of treason.



As a rebel officer he has been energetic, lucky, and skilful. At Bull Run he won his spurs as one of "Stonewall" by promising Beauregard that his brigade should stand like a stone wall before the enemy; the promise was kept. He fought Shields near Winchester, in March last, with rather indifferent success. But his pursuit of Banks down the Shenandoah Valley was very successful, and infused some heart into the rebel cause. Again, in June, his attack on M'Clellan's right wing at Mechanicsville helped his fame among his people. At Cedar Mountain his design showed skill, but the steadily courage of Banks's troops foiled his purpose. He will shortly come to close quarters with a General who is fully his match—John Pope.

Stonewall Jackson is by all odds the ablest officer in the rebel army. Beauregard, who was a year ago considered their crack leader, evinced a sad lack of capacity in the contest in the West. He was completely outgeneraled by Halleck, and had the mortification of seeing his army disperse and leave him without a command after the evacuation of Corinth. He is now said to be living in retirement in Mississippi, overwhelmed by remorse.



Neither Lee nor Johnson have fulfilled their promise.

MY PHILIP.

THERE was the quick, sharp rap of the postman at the door. Our postman always seemed to sympathize with his bundle of letters; and he knew us all so well, that he knew the contents or subjects of our letters almost as well as if he had been clairvoyant.

I was expecting my brother on that day; and, instead of him, there came a letter.

"Good news from William, I don't doubt," said the postman, as he gave me change.

"There generally is good news from brother," said I, smiling.

"William is a fine fellow," said he, tightening the string on his bundle of letters, and then he went on his way.

I remember thinking, what if he should lose one of those precious letters? What if he had lost mine? Why did he not carry them in a bag? How could he risk losing such precious things? But they all risk losing letters just the same way, for no letter-carrier in city or village ever uses any security for his parcel of letters but a string while he is distributing them to their many owners.

I went in to read my news from brother, whatever it might be. My mother was in the large front-room, that looked toward the south, with my invalid father. He was taking his dinner, and I would not disturb him even with my treasure. So I stopped in the room, which was dining-room, sitting-room, and library, in our cottage. I opened my letter eagerly. I had not then learned to wait patiently, and least of all where letters were concerned. I turned blind and faint when I saw where the letter was dated.

"MEDWAY JAIL."

For some moments I in vain essayed to read. My head swam, and darkness veiled my eyes. At length I recovered, and read:

"MY DEAR SISTER,—You will be surprised when you see where my letter is dated. Since I last wrote you, I have had fair success in collecting the debts due to father; and I began to be encouraged, and to think I saw daylight for us. Three days ago I called on Mix, who keeps the tavern by the steamboat-landing. You will remember that his was the largest debt owing to father here. At first he said he could not pay me any thing. Then he said he supposed the night's receipts would be pretty good, as the night-train on the railroad would bring a good many for the morning boat; and they must stay with him, for the other house was bad at best, and was being painted now. He said he would give me something on the debt in the morning. I had intended to be at home on the twenty-first, and it was hard to be detained; but I staid. In the morning he gave me one hundred dollars, in five twenty-dollar notes. I made my calculations, and found that by giving up my stoppages at two other places I could still be at home on the twenty-first. I was so glad of the prospect of so soon seeing you and mother, and our dear helpless father, that I trembled with joy. I trembled so much when I was shaving that I cut my chin. After I was again on my way the blood kept oozing, and I stopped at an apothecary's to get a piece of court-plaster. It was near the station, where I was to take the cars, and a mile from Mix's tavern. I had bought the court-plaster, when I saw some surgical instruments lying on the counter. They pleased me very much; and as father had told me I should have a set for collecting, as soon as I had received a hundred dollars, I bought them.

"I had a sort of misgiving about the money I had got of Mix; I did not believe that it was bad, but I wished to be better satisfied than I was about it. I asked the price of the instruments. They were sold. There was a turnkey and a lancet, valued at three dollars, that I could have. I bought them, and tendered one of my twenty-dollar notes in payment. It was taken without question. I put the change and my instruments in my pocket, very glad to be set at rest about my money. I then went over to the station; the cars started in an hour, I was told, and I sat down to wait as patiently as I could. Before half an hour had elapsed I was arrested for passing counterfeit money. I was searched, and eighty dollars, of the same kind I had passed, were found upon me. At first I was horrified; but I sent immediately for Mix, scarcely doubting that he would say he had paid me the money. He refused to come, declaring that he had paid me no money; but saying that I had paid him a bad twenty-dollar note for my night's lodging, supper, and breakfast, thus cheating him out of eighteen dollars good money. He said he would meet me at the right time and place; that I was in good hands now; and that he was busy.

"I am in prison, sister dear, and I don't know what will be my fate. All my money was taken from me by the officer who arrested me, and I can do nothing but let you know the facts. If father were not helpless he would be able to help me; as it is, he can think; and some kind soul, I trust, will be able to carry out his suggestions. Keep up your courage, Clara dear, and tell father and mother that I am cheerful in my affliction. Write at once, and tell me what father says.

"Your loving brother,

"WILLIAM BENTLEY."

I waited for my father to finish his dinner, and then I called mother and showed her the letter. Grieved and alarmed as she was, she endured all till my father had slept his usual hour after his dinner.

Before I tell my readers what my father said to the letter I must say something of our conditions. My father had been a merchant in Medway for many years. He was ruined by the credit system. After losing almost every thing he came to the village of Rosalba, where we now lived. He bought the cottage in which my mother was born. He paid one half its value, and depended on collecting the debts due to him in Medway and the vicinity to pay the other half. My brother wished to study to be a physician, and our uncle was considered the best medical man in Rosalba, and in our poverty he could very greatly assist us by helping my brother in his education. We had lived two years in the cottage. The first year we rented, the second we bought it.

We had let the garden belonging to the cottage for half its produce, and I had taught school in summer; and thus, with a very little money that my father had collected, we were supported. We lived in a hard, grudging economy that no one knew of, not even my uncle. He was doing what he could for my brother; more than we would have been willing to accept from any other. The spectre always before us was the half payment for our cottage, which remained to be made. And we lost all if we did not pay the remainder at a time specified, and which was drawing near. We looked to the success of my brother's efforts in this collecting tour to secure us the shelter of our cottage home. Food we trusted would come. The ravens are fed; and we hoped and looked forward to the time when my brother should be a successful physician, as our uncle was now.

What a terrible blow had fallen on our devoted heads! Our sole hope, our idolized William, was in a prison, accused of a crime that, if not disproved, might consign him to a penitentiary for years, and blast his prospects forever.

My mother and I were wild with grief. My father was quiet, but very sad. His disease, which was palsy of the lower limbs, caused by a fall from his horse, had left his mind clear as when he was in health.

"We must do what we can," said he, "and be comforted that we know William is innocent. Now, Clara, you must go to Judge Bixby. I will write a note to him. He will come here and consult with me, or he will advise me in some way. I have notes against Mix for three hundred dollars, besides the one William had with him, which was for two hundred and fifty. These notes are so many probabilities against him. We must have some person to go to Medway."

I wanted to say that Philip Melvin would go, but I dared not speak his name. He was a student, reading law with Judge Bixby. He had paid me the attentions of a lover till my parents forbade me to receive them. My parents were proud of their ancestry. They were proud of the former position, and prouder than all of the Puritan principles and practices of their progenitors.

Now Philip Melvin was disgraced from his birth. He was an illegitimate child. His mother was a simple country-girl, who had died of a broken heart soon after his birth, and she had never revealed the name of Philip's father. She had died in the alms-house, and there her boy remained until he was seven years old. A lady visited the house when he had just reached his seventh birthday, and asked for Philip. She wept bitterly, it was said, over the beautiful child, and then she went to Judge Bixby, and from that time he became as one of the children of the good and wise Judge. Philip proved worthy of all the care and education which were bestowed on him with liberal as well as paternal kindness; but notwithstanding all, he was regarded as one who before his birth had "fallen into a pit of ink,

From which the wide sea could not wash him clean again."

I believe I loved Philip all the better because every body seemed to keep the bitter fact of his birth in their memory. He was nearly twenty-one years old. I was seventeen. I had never disobeyed my parents, and I regarded my mother as a superior being. I was required to treat Philip as a stranger; and I could give him no explanation without wounding him more than I could ever bear to wound him. Poor fellow! I did not doubt that he regarded his birth as the mark of Cain upon him. How could I ever allude to the terrible fact? He saved me from my trouble by a manly frankness, which greatly increased my respect and love for him. One day I met him in a lonely road, in the neighborhood of the village. He stopped me.

"Clara," said he, "I have a word to say to you."

The blood rushed to my face, a burning flood.

"You have said that you loved me," said he.

"I have," I whispered, hardly so as to be heard.

"Have you changed?" asked Philip.

"NO," said I, aloud, and with energy.

"Do you shun me of your own free-will?"

"No, Philip."

"Your parents require it of you, and—your brother also wishes you to shun me?"

"Yes," I said, bravely, and yet with trembling.

"Because—" He could not utter the words.

He looked at me appealingly. I answered his thought.

"Yes, Philip; but I love you better for your great sorrow. I love you better for all the affliction Providence has permitted to come upon you."

"I thank you," said he, solemnly. "Clara, if we are faithful to our love our time will come. We shall be happy together some day."

I was silent.

"Do you not believe it?"

"I hope for it," I replied.

"Do not go yet," said he, as I was about to pass on; "do not go till you have promised me to be faithful to this love."

"I can be faithful only to my parents," said I, bursting into tears; "but I will never love any one but you, Philip, unless you forget me. Now let me go."

"Our time will come," said he; and I went on my way.

I never saw him again, to speak to him, till the day I went to Judge Bixby with my father's note. I met him on the way, and I stopped and told him our great sorrow. I could not do otherwise, for my heart turned to him with the hope of help.

"Go to the Judge," said he; "I will be there by the time he has read and considered your father's note."

Judge Bixby read the note, and was very much disturbed by it.

"This is very bad," said he. "We must send some one at once to Medway. William must be released; Philip will go to him. There he is now," said he, as he saw him through the window. Philip came in presently.

"Melvin, will you go to Medway to-night?" said the Judge.

"Certainly, if you wish it," said Philip.

Judge Bixby took his pen and wrote for some minutes; then he folded and addressed his letter without sealing it. Then he wrote a note to my father. He then turned to Philip, saying,

"You will go to Mr. Bentley, and get the notes which he has against Mix. Show this letter to him, which I have written to a legal friend of mine in Medway. If Mr. Bentley thinks of any thing more that he wishes me to write, you can return to me; otherwise, you had better go on to Medway to-night. I think you will do well to stay at Mix's tavern, and when you pay your bill offer him this note." He took a fifty-dollar note from his pocket, and handed it to Philip. "He has been so successful of late he may give you one of those twenty-dollar notes in change for this, if you appear to be a stranger merely passing over the road. Rascals are very often fools."

Philip and I went out together. At the door he said, "I will bid you good-by, and hasten to your father. You can come at your leisure. You may be sure I shall do my best, and you know for whose sake I do it."

His words comforted me in my great sorrow. I went home slowly, not wishing to arrive till Philip was gone. I met him at the door. He took my hand, pressed it in silence, and went away. My parents said little, and did not allude to the fact that Philip had gone to Medway.

I retired early, but spent the night in sleepless agony. I prayed for my poor brother in prison, and for all other prisoners. I felt sure that Philip would do William no good. I was glad to find in the morning that my father hoped that much good would result from his efforts. It was Tuesday evening when Philip left. He would arrive in Medway at two o'clock the next morning. By Friday we ought to hear from him. The day came, but no letter. I was indescribably miserable, and my father and mother were very anxious. I could not speak freely to my parents. The night previous I had passed through an experience strange to many, but the like of it had happened to me several times. I could not speak of it at home, and my heart seemed like to break that I could not. Finally I determined to go to Judge Bixby with my secret. As there was no news from my brother, I asked leave to go to the Judge, ostensibly to make inquiries.

Judge Bixby seemed to pity me very much when I came into his office.

"Have you heard any thing from my brother?" said I.

"Yes, dear," said he; and then he seemed sorry he had made the admission. "The fact is, Miss Clara, we have been quite put back in our proceedings; but we hope to have good news for you by Monday, or Tuesday—certainly by Wednesday."

I wished so much to tell him my experience, but I feared he would think me crazed, or untruthful. But the necessity to unburden my heart to some one constrained me, and I said,

"I want to tell you, Judge, what I saw last night. As I lay in my bed, looking into the darkness, I saw Philip. I shut my eyes and put my hands over them; but still I saw Philip Melvin. He was in a large room, in a kind of hotel; there was no lock on the door, and he tried to fasten the door with his knife; but I saw he had failed to do it effectually. The knife-blade broke nearly off, but the handle did not fall away. He could not see this, but I saw it. And I saw through the door, and saw a man on the outside of the door, in the hall. It was half-past two in the morning, as I saw by Philip's watch. He took off his coat and hung it beside a chair, and then lay down in his clothes. Presently he fell into a heavy sleep. I felt perfectly sure that a cup of coffee he had taken when he came in had some kind of sleeping-powder in it. As he slept, I saw a bad-looking man come into the room; he had a complexion almost like a mulatto, and only one eye. It was perfectly dark in the room, and yet I saw him come in as plainly as I had seen Philip before he put out his light. He took Philip's coat and examined the pockets; he took out the pocket-book, laid the coat again across the chair, and then he went out. 'Ah!' thought I, 'my poor brother is ruined now;' for I knew that your letter was in that pocket-book, and I supposed the notes given to my father by Mix were there also. I was in despair, but I followed the man from the room; he had left his light outside the door. He took up the light and went to a distant room, and locked himself in; I saw him take that fifty-dollar note from the pocket-book; I read 'Merrimac Bank' on it with perfect ease; then he took your letter to that lawyer in Medway, and read it, and then, holding it in the candle, he burned it; he took out several other papers, but I did not clearly see what they were. All this may seem false and foolish to you, Judge, but I am sure it all really happened. Something within me assures me that it is all true—that it has happened to Philip Melvin, and if you ever see him, I believe he will tell you so."

The Judge was reputed a skeptic in religion, and I feared very much I should get only his contempt for my relation. When I had finished he said very kindly,

"All this is very strange and curious. Mix has but one eye, and he has had fever and ague till he looks like a mulatto. Young Melvin was here yesterday; he had lost his pocket-book containing my letter to my legal friend, also he had lost the fifty-dollar bank-note, which was on the Merrimac Bank. Fortunately he had put Mix's notes, and some memoranda, in the lining of his hat. He came back for another letter and further instructions. He did not see any one in Medway but the one-eyed tavern-keeper and a servant. He took the morning-train back, and I expect to hear from him on Tuesday. I had marked the bank-note, so it is probable the miserable man has stolen a rope to hang himself in taking it. Now, my little girl," said the Judge, pleasantly, "if you see any more wonders to-night, I hope they will be pleasant ones. I have had abundant evidence of the truth of the facts claimed for clairvoyance, even to the breaking of Philip's knife, which I happen to know was broken as you said. Tell your father that I have heard from Melvin; that there is some unavoidable delay; but that I shall expect to hear good news by Tuesday."

I was not again clairvoyant; but on Wednesday evening my brother and Philip Melvin came. We were all overjoyed; but my joy was greatest, I am sure, for Philip had brought him. Brother asked Philip to stay to supper, and my father and mother begged him to do so; but he said, cheerfully, that he must go directly to the Judge and give an account of himself; and he left William to tell us his own story.

My brother said, "Mix would have given us much trouble; for he gave out that the notes against him were forged. But the rascal had stolen Philip's pocket-book. It had a marked bank-note in it for fifty dollars. Our lawyer set one of Mix's creditors to dun him very sharply, and at last he told him that he would take fifty dollars for a debt of a hundred. This drew forth the marked note, and Mix is now shut up in my place. Search has been made in his house, and in a false back to his writing-desk some thousands, in bills of the same kind that he gave me, have been found."

Our great trouble was past; my brother had been honorably restored to us. But poverty was upon us like an armed man. The little money that William had been able to collect would do very little toward paying for our home; and besides, we were obliged to take it for our present support. It seemed sure that we must lose our cottage, which we had named "Sunny Home." My parents and William were greatly afflicted, but I had a presentiment of coming help. Only the day before our home must be paid for, or lost, Judge Bixby came to see my father.

"I have been very sorry, Mr. Bentley," said he, "that no one has been able to loan you the money to save your place. It is hard to be poor, and have all one's friends poor. I am happy to tell you now, at the eleventh hour, that one has come forward to advance you the money."

My father uttered an exclamation of surprise; my mother said, "Thank God!" fervently.

"But who will do this, Judge?" asked my father.

"Our young friend Philip Melvin, who has just come into possession of his father's property. When Philip was seven years old his father died. On his death-bed he told his mother of Philip, and willed his large property to him; I was appointed the boy's guardian; and as Philip was twenty-one yesterday, I delivered up my trust. Philip will be admitted to the bar soon. He has fine ability, an irreproachable character, and a larger property than any one in Rosalba. If I had a daughter to give in marriage," said the Judge, regardless of my blushes, "I would sooner give her to Philip Melvin than to any man I know."

A spasm of mental pain passed over my father's countenance. "Thank Heaven, we are saved!" he said, "and only at the expense of a false and wicked pride. Judge Bixby, will you ask Philip to call here?"

"I will," said our friend.

That evening Philip came and sat alone with my father for a while. Then my mother was admitted to the conference. "They both asked me to forgive them for their pride," said Philip to me. "I have always regarded them more in pity than in anger. I have borne my lot as patiently as I could, and Providence has been kind to me at last. Our time has come, darling Clara."

"Thank Heaven!" said I.

"You have loved me for myself, Clara; and we shall be happy. Your brother has treated me like his own brother since the day we met in Medway Jail; but he has often said to me, 'Only much affliction can ever conquer my parents' pride of family, and prejudices about birth.' And then William said, 'As if an infant were to be cursed for the sin of those who gave it life.' I replied, 'So far as such a prejudice can be made a preventive of crime it is just, and I bow to it for the sake of the innocent.' Now, Clara, since we can leave your parents comfortable, and in William's care, I wish to go where no man will ever ask who were my parents."

I respected his sorrow; and I said, "I will go to the end of the world with you, my Philip." And thus it is that our graves will be far from those of our kindred.

STEVENSON, ALABAMA.

ON page 549 we give a picture of the town of STEVENSON, ALABAMA, now occupied by our forces. The sketch from which our picture was taken was drawn by our artist, Mr. H. Mosler.

Stevenson is the junction of the Memphis and Charleston, and the Nashville and Chattanooga railroads, and is therefore a strategic position of considerable importance. Battle Creek, where Buell's advance was stationed early in the month, is ten miles from there. Stevenson itself lies in a valley encircled by the Cumberland Mountains; the Tennessee flows about three miles east of the place. In the event of any attempt being made by the Southern rebels to regain possession of Tennessee, Stevenson would be one of the first places attacked.

On the same page we illustrate the ERECTION OF STOCKADES FOR DEFENSE BY NEGROES. Under the new Act of Congress all negroes who come into our lines are set to work at once on fortifications, and paid wages and freed as a reward for their labor. At and near Stevenson very extensive works are being erected; some 400 negroes are employed. John Contraband takes kindly to the work.

THE BATTLE OF CEDAR MOUNTAIN.

WE publish on pages 552 and 553 a large picture of the BATTLE OF CEDAR MOUNTAIN, from a sketch by our special artist, Mr. Alfred R. Waud. We subjoin General Pope's official account of the battle:

HEAD-QUARTERS, ARMY OF VIRGINIA, CEDAR MOUNTAIN, Aug. 13—5 P.M.

To Major-General Halleck, General-in-Chief:

On Thursday morning the enemy crossed the Rapidan, at Barnett's Ford, in heavy force, and advanced strong on the road to Culpepper and Madison Court House. I had established my whole force on the turnpike between Culpepper and Sperryville, ready to concentrate at either place as soon as the enemy's plans were developed.

Early on Friday it became apparent that the move on Stadium Court House was merely a feint to detain the army corps of General Sigel while Longstreet and the whole attack of the enemy would be on Culpepper, to which point a direct forward march of Generals Banks's and Sigel's corps. Brigadier-General Buford, with part of the corps of Major-General Pope, who was in the advance, on the Rapidan, fell slowly back, delaying and embarrassing the enemy's advance as far as possible, and joining some of his men.

Meantime, of General Banks and Sigel, and one of the divisions of General McDowell's corps, were rapidly concentrated at Culpepper during Friday and Friday night, and at Culpepper also during Friday night, two other corps, Banks' corps being part of the division of McDowell's corps, came into the same position.

Meantime General Sigel, which had marched all night, was halted at Culpeper, to rest for a few hours.

Soon after the enemy advanced rapidly to Cedar Run, the scene also of which Jackson and Pope's former battle. General Banks was instructed to take up his position on the left, extending to Crawford's Summit, on the road to Orange, which had been thrown out the day previous to observe the enemy's movements. Banks's line of battle was in a curve facing that point, and of about two miles in length. The enemy's line of battle was nearly parallel to Banks's, but it was my desire to bring as many men as possible after their forced march, and to bring Pope's army of the Rappahannock.

The artillery of the enemy was opened early in the afternoon, from a battery on an advance ridge. Nine rebel batteries in all these skirmishers were thrown forward on each side of the road, and the battle of the day was fairly commenced.

The enemy pushed forward a strong force in the rear of my skirmishers, and General Banks advanced to the support.

The engagement did not fairly open until after six o'clock, but the heavy mass of the enemy was then advancing.

Throughout the surrounding, which at first was desultory, and directed mainly against the rear guard, the reports of musketry from General Banks that no attempt to overlap his left was made, and that the enemy's line was approximately of the same length.

Two of our batteries, the batteries in the artillery firing line, battalion me an engagement might be at hand, Major Schoonmaker, the battery conducted the fire of General McDowell to advance Ricketts's division to support General Banks, and directed that the corps be kept not more than the ground as soon as possible.

I arrived personally on the field at about six, and found the action raging furiously.* The infantry firing was incessant and terrific.

I found General Banks holding the position he took up early in the morning, in the best order possible.

Ricketts's division was directed to support General Banks, the brigades of General Hatch, the brigades of Generals Duryea and Gordon being ordered to the front, and were themselves in the center.

Before this division could be brought into action, dark, when the artillery fire continued at short range without intermission.

The artillery fire at night, by the Second and Fifth Maine batteries of Ricketts's division, of Major Hudson's 1st corps, was most destructive, as was readily observable by next morning in the dark and the enemy's dead and wounded—carriages of the enemy's battery which had been advanced against it.

Our troops rested on their arms during the night in line of battle, the heavy skirmishing kept up by both sides until midnight.

At daylight the next morning the enemy fell back two miles from our front, and still higher up the mountain side, where the artillery fire continued at short range without intermission.

The fatigue of the troops, from having gone without rest for a night, made it impossible for either side to resume the action on Sunday. The men were, therefore, allowed to rest and recruit the whole day, our only active operations being of cavalry on the enemy's flank and rear.

Monday was spent in burying the dead and in getting of the wounded.

The slaughter was severe on both sides, most of the fighting being hand to hand.

The dead bodies of both armies were found mingled together, in masses, over the whole ground of the engagement.

The burying of the dead was not completed until dark on Monday, the last being on the ground that evening at the wounded.

The wounded of the enemy fell from the field, leaving many of their dead unburied, and were generally removed by the enemy to the Rapidan, over which he passed with his rear-guard by ten o'clock in the morning.

The behavior of General Banks's corps during the action was very fine. No general officer could have been more gallantly by any troops.

I am not aware, too highly of the coolness and intrepidity of General Banks himself during the whole of the engagement. He was in front and exposed to the fire of the enemy.

Brigadier-General Roberts, Chief of Cavalry of this Army, was with the advance of my corps during the whole Saturday, and was conspicuous for his gallantry and for the skill he manifested in the management of the cavalry force.

Our loss was about fifteen hundred killed, wounded, and missing, of whom two hundred and seventy were taken prisoner. As might be expected from the character of the engagement, a very large proportion of our wounded are slight.

The enemy's loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners, we are now satisfied, is much in excess of our own.

A full list of casualties will be transmitted as soon as the returns, which are now being collected, can be made.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN POPE,

Major-General Commanding.

The following account from a Herald correspondent, who was an eye-witness of the fight, will also be found interesting:—

EARLY IN THE MORNING

General Pope had sent General Banks's command to the front, and the divisions of General Crawford and Augur were placed in position about a mile and a half the side of the general field had been the scene of the conflict of the previous day.

SUBSEQUENTLY, IN THE AFTERNOON,

Crawford's brigade, of General Williams's division, composed of the Twenty-first Pennsylvania, Fourth Maine, Fifth Connecticut, and Third Pennsylvania, New York regiments, with Best's battery, Fourth regular battery, had occupied a piece of high ground lying between Cedar Creek and Cedar Run, which was the extreme right of the point where the Culpeper and Gordonsville turnpike crosses the Rapidan River. Cedar Run creek is a mile south of this point from the Cedar Mountain, a spur of the Blue Ridge range. Cedar Run was from the slope of this eminence that the enemy first opened their fire upon the Union troops.

THE FIRST INTIMATION OF THE ENEMY.

The first intimation our advance received of the presence of the enemy was at the moment when, after emerging from the timber on the north, it began to cross Spring Creek. As the head of the column of Crawford's brigade, with Best's battery in the middle of the column, reached the bottom, both shot and shell, while another battery of artillery came at the foot of the mountain, and opened the reception from the cover of some timber about three-quarters of a mile in the rear.

in command of our forces, was killed, a rumor which has not been completely of. But he was about 180 is killed and wounded, including several officers of rank.

The rebel loss is said to be greater than ours. We captured a number of prisoners, among them Captain Blount, an artillery officer, and a member of Breckinridge's staff. Blount has been brought to this city. The prisoners state that Breckinridge was badly hurt in the arm. Lovell was killed, and Captains Allen and Chalm, of Baton Rouge, and a lieutenant were killed. It is reported that we lost two guns and captured three. The last report is that we have lost no guns. Our force is much smaller than the enemy's.

MR. T. F. ROWLAND.

We publish on this page a portrait of Mr. THOMAS FITCH ROWLAND, who is building most of the new Monitors and turrets. Mr. Rowland was born at New Haven, Connecticut, on March 15, 1831, and is consequently thirty-one years of age. While yet a lad he drove an engine on the New Haven Railroad; and subsequently, on the occasion of some great racing which took place on the Sound boats, he became an engineer on board of one of them. Feeling, however, that he was fit for something better than driving an engine, he entered the Allaire Works in this city as an apprentice some ten years ago. In that extensive establishment he found free scope for his ability, and after two years' work in the shop and two more years in the drawing-room he became Superintending Engineer. Under his superintendence the engines of the Harriet Lane and several other well-known vessels were built. In the year 1859 Mr. Rowland took a ship-yard at Greenpoint, Long Island, and commenced the construction of iron vessels. He built several well-known vessels, and took a high stand among ship-builders. When the war broke out business came to Mr. Rowland with a rush. He prepared several of the vessels employed on the Hilton Head expedition, and likewise the mortar-schooners which sailed under Commodore Porter. It was he who built, under Captain Ericsson's supervision, the first Monitor. He is now engaged in building three of the new 200 feet Monitors, and, as soon as room can be found in his ship-yard, will commence the construction of the great Monitor Puritan, which is to be 340 feet long. Mr. Rowland is building, besides these vessels, three turrets for Monitors whose hulls are being constructed elsewhere.

Mr. Rowland commenced life as a poor boy, and never had any help from any one but himself. His own industry and energy have raised him to the proud position which he occupies. His career contains a useful lesson for young men.

THOMAS FITCH ROWLAND, ESQ., BUILDER OF THE NEW MONITORS.

THE "IRONSIDES."

We publish herewith a picture of the IRON-CLAD FRIGATE "IRONSIDES" IN FIGHTING TRIM. She left Philadelphia on 23d with sealed orders, but we shall probably hear from her in a very short period of time.

Before sailing all her spars were taken out, so that she presents nothing but a bare hull with smoke-stack, pilot-house, and two pivot 100-pounder rifled guns on her spar deck. She is 240 feet long, 58 feet beam, 3200 tons register, and draws 14 feet of water. Her armament is the heaviest ever sent to sea on a single vessel. On her gun-deck she carries sixteen 11-inch Dahlgren guns, and on her spar deck two 100-pound Parrott guns. All of these are pivot guns, and can be trained to bear on any point of the compass. It is expected that her sides will withstand any shot which may be brought to bear on them. They consist of two feet of solid oak, plated with 4-inch iron. If shot penetrate this the builders will be surprised. The Galena is a very different and much less substantial vessel.

The Philadelphia Inquirer of 23d says:

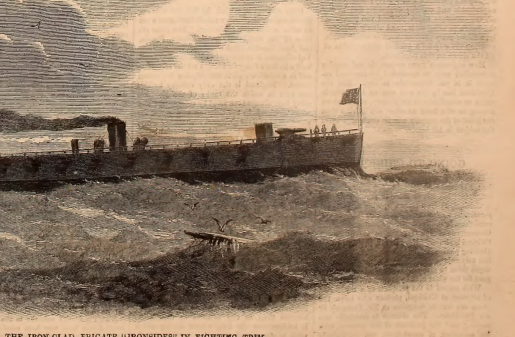
This unsocial vessel, which has been in course of construction at this port for six months at the yard of George Sons, and others, at the yard of Merrick & Son, at the foot of Bond street, has been entirely completed, and yesterday left this port.



As the tide changed, and as soon as it turned her bow southward, the anchor was weighed with great enthusiasm by the crew, and at a quarter past 6 o'clock P.M. she commenced to move down the stream. Yet somewhat later her propeller began to revolve, and she steamed down the river at the rate of six knots an hour, with forty revolutions per minute. As she moved, the sailors in the rendezvous-ship Princeton manned the masts and rigging, and gave three hearty cheers for her success. Large numbers of persons assembled to witness the departure on the various wharves in the vicinity and at the Navy-yard. She was accompanied by a steamboat as far as the Breakwater.

The Powhatan has gone to sea with the Ironsides.

IMPROVED ORDNANCE.

A CORRESPONDENT, who takes exception to some of our statements in regard to the Dahlgren and other new guns, writes as follows:

"In Bidman's last gun—the 15-inch for the iron-clad—his model has been modified in some respects, especially by shortening, and the guns will be cast on Rodman's 'circulating water-core.' All his other guns—the 9-inch, 11-inch, and other sizes—are cast solid. The peculiarity of a 'Dahlman' gun is the hollow casting, with a stream of water running through the two barrel during the process, and, in fact, until the gun is almost cool. The 15-inch guns ('Lincoln,' and others) at Fortress Monroe and Columbiads. Of these large Columbiads four have been made; one is lured to a 15-inch rifle—the 'Union.' Of the 13-inch Dahlgrens none half-dozen have been cast—guns are finished. One will be ready in a week or two, and the rest will probably furnish two per week afterward until their contract is filled. Larger guns—24 and 30 inch—have been talked of, nothing more. The 15-inch throws a solid shot of about 400 pounds; the 20-inch of about 1000 pounds; the 30-inch, if such could be made, of 3000 pounds. The 20-inch will probably be made; the manufacture of a 30-inch gun is quite unlikely."

THE IRON-CLAD FRIGATE "IRONSIDES" IN FIGHTING TRIM.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 6, 1862.

THE PRESIDENT AND SLAVERY.

THE President has taken advantage of a rather imprecisent and very injudicious letter addressed to him by Mr. Horace Greeley, to state to the public his position on the slavery question. We publish his letter in another column. While distinctly avowing his personal wish that "all men every where could be free," the President declares that his sole exclusive aim is to restore the Union, without reference to slavery; and that while he would not hesitate to proclaim emancipation if he were satisfied that that would restore the Union, neither would he scruple to save the Union with slavery. He thus takes issue on the one hand with the proslavery half-and-half Union men of the Border States who object to the restoration of the Union at the cost of their peculiar institution, and, on the other, with the fanatical utterers of the North who object to the restoration of the Union unless slavery be destroyed.

In this position Mr. Lincoln will undoubtedly find himself supported by the bulk of the people of the country. What we all want, first, is to put down the rebellion. When that is done, we can deal with slavery and its antecedents as our necessities may dictate.

Nothing can be falser than to assume, as some of the followers of Mr. Wendell Phillips do, that if we restore the Union without destroying slavery, our work will be only half accomplished, and it will be left to another generation to complete it. Whatever be the issue of the war, slavery has already received a death-blow from which it can never recover. There is no State in the Union in which it can ever be again a thriving or even a safe institution. That iron despotism of the master class, and that rigid system of municipal law, which alone could render it safe for white men and slaves to labor in vast plantations surrounded by negro slaves, have been utterly shattered by the events of the war. Even where the blacks have had courage, or sense, or opportunity to escape to the Union lines, and claim the privilege of freedom offered him by our laws, he has been utterly demoralized, and rendered forever unfit to resume the patient toil of past years.

It is known, probably, to nine out of ten slaves in the South that every Slave State now contains a safe refuge whither fugitives may flee for emancipation, and where no overseer or blood-hound can follow them. That these fugitives thus far have come into our lines only by hundreds instead of tens of thousands is mainly due to the fact that the entire white population of the South is armed, and all general movements of the negroes are at once repressed by wholesale massacres. But neither the rifle nor the stake can expel from the mind of the slave the knowledge that freedom is near him, and that he can obtain it when he chooses to make the effort; and with this thought in his brain, he is worse than valueless as property.

This great fact is ever present to Mr. Lincoln's mind. In conversation with a leading banker of this city, who is also a prominent member of the Republican Party, he lately observed that, in his opinion, it was "much easier to do a thing than to talk about it." Frémont and Hunter talked—in proclamations. The President, or rather the war, is doing it by merely the instrument of events—is "doing the thing." Sapping the foundation of slavery; rendering it unprofitable and unsafe; exploding one by one all the delusions which induced the people of the South to cling to it; and slowly but surely, without noisy proclamations of any kind, clearing the way for a general emancipation of all the slaves on this continent.

How and when these systematic and regular approaches may be succeeded by the final assault it is yet impossible to say. But the President has by his acts won an indisputable claim to confidence in his honesty, and all those among us who have no other aim in view than the good of the country will be content to leave the subject in his hands.

GOING TO CHIRIQUI.

SENATOR POMEROY, on behalf of the President, has issued an appeal to the colored population, inviting 500 of them to accompany him to Chiriqui, in New Granada, in order to form a permanent settlement there. The Senator assures them of the good-will and protection of the Government of New Granada, in which country Chiriqui is situate. He, like Mr. Lincoln, draws pleasing pictures of the prosperity which the exiles may enjoy in their new home, and earnestly urges them to give one more proof of their regard for the white man by getting out of his way.

With regard to the prospects of a settlement of negroes at Chiriqui, persons who know the place are not so sanguine as Mr. Pomeroy or the President. The climate is described as very healthy, and the products of the country, with the exception of cocoa'nuts, not particularly varied or valuable. There is coal there, certainly; but it is tertiary coal, not of the least use for maritime purposes, and only serviceable for the manufacture of gas. There are harbors, good ones, at Boca del Toro on the Atlantic side, and David on the Pacific; but there is no road between them: it will cost a large sum to build or cut one; and when it is made, there will be no use for it. There are a few people in the Province of Chiriqui; a few dozen whites, and the rest mongrel negroes and Indians, largely called "greasers." There is nothing but ite the sun and sleep. Wild fruits, fish, and tortles supply them with food: a population of this kind is living in an old Panama hut with a cock's feather stuck in it. Whether Mr. Pomeroy's five hundred intelligent and virtuous negroes can be induced to leave the civilize these greasers than the greasers are to degrade their new neighbors to their own level, is an open question. Probably will make a serious inroad upon the ranks of peaceful labor, and will cause a large advance in all Hood wages. This will naturally lead to a copious immigration from Europe. We are glad to learn that the Government has discovered the project, and that steps have already been taken to encourage immigrants. This country, it has been estimated, gains $1000 by every able-bodied immigrant who comes here from Europe. We presume that the high prices which all kinds of labor will shortly command will suffice to invite an unprecedented begging from Germany and the British Isles, especially as the new tariff offers remarkable inducements to foreign workmen to come here and set up their factories on American soil. But if anything further were needed, the United States would well afford to pay a bounty of every able-bodied man who chose to come here with the intention of settling among us.

A CORRECTION.

IT gives us pleasure to learn that we were entirely mistaken in stating that Lieut. Jos. Bowman, United States Ordnance Corps, the inventor of the Rodman Gun, had proved a traitor and gone over to the rebels. Captain Bowman has, ever since the outbreak of the war, devoted his entire energies to the service of the United States Government, and is now, as he has been for three years, in command of the United States Arsenal at Watervliet, Massachusetts. He has never harbored a disloyal thought. Captain Rodman is second to no officer in the army in scientific attainments, zeal, and industry; and we extremely regret to have been betrayed into doing him a temporary injustice.

THE LOUNGER.

THE REAL CONTEST.

The rebellion is the effort of the only aristocratic class in the country to destroy popular institutions, because they had learned by experience that under those institutions their power became too wise to submit to an aristocracy. The aristocratic class, whose prosperity depends upon the cheap labor, and that a laboring man has no more rights than a horse or an ox, hid governed the country for their own interest for many years. Seeing at length that the natural increase of population was filling up the Territories of the United States with men who lived by labor, and who, and fearful lest they should be deprived of extending the system of slavery, upon which their political power depended, they tried to occupy the Territories with slaves under the protection of the Government.

What was the consequence of this movement of labor? It was to increase the value of unoccupied shareholder the immediate rival of every free laborer in the land. You, for instance, are a shareholder in a railroad or a farmer. You are out-door men sent to the West. What did you find? You found a great many people, who could not afford carpenters and blacksmiths and farmers, occupying an immense domain, and trying to forestall you in your rights. However it may be, they have taken wife and family to maintain by your labor, but the rival workman had none, and was run by his owner at starvation wages—at what you, forsooth, could not compete and live. You had your children to educate on the dignity of labor and a citizen to maintain. But your rival was treated as a brute, was kept ignorant and degraded, and was sold like a dog. Every time, therefore, there occupied the ground which a free laborer might have had, and the man who brought him brought not only a rival to your trade, but distress to it, poverty and a hard fight to you, and ignorance and debasement to your children.

The people of the land saw the trick and scorned it. They shortly routed the party that supported this policy. They did not sit vote for Mr. Lincoln, but the friends of Mr. Douglas refused the Governmental protection of slavery in the Territories. So the aristocracy, beaten at the polls, began to secede from the United States. What for? To maintain their power over the free laboring interest of the country. They despise the laboring class. They hold that labor is not the object political power. They declare that they are the rightful masters, and that the mud-sills shall be whipped in. It is a contest of human rights against class privileges—of all the people against a few men—of the democracy against an aristocracy.

THE PRESIDENT'S PLAN.

The President and the committee of colored men have now been carefully considered by all who understand the importance of the subject. That his scheme of colonization is impracticable and unwise does not detract in the least from the honest good-will with which he urges it, and that a President of the United States should say to colored men that the treatment of their race in the country had been most unjust and iniquitous is something that three or four years ago was the most hopeless of all possibilities.

With the President the question, as with all sensible men, is a practical one. What is the best thing to do under the circumstances? is what he asks. He says in effect, that the white man's dislike of the dominant race in this country is a fact, and it is better that the latter should withdraw and settle elsewhere.

That they are as much native here as most of us whites, whose fathers, grandfathers, or ancestors came from Europe—that they are an essential and immense part of the laboring force of the country—that they are a singularly inoffensive, docile, and amiable people—that they are fondly attached to the region in which they were born—these is only because of the brutal slavery in which they are held—that they form a very insignificant proportional number of all the criminal offenders in the land—that they are a cheerful, affectionate, flexible race—that, if left entirely to that way have injured them—that the prejudice against them is as idle, wanton, and wicked hatred, cherished among the most violent and ignorant of our foreign population—by the most dangerous and unprincipled of political demagogues—that the mere fact—that the emigration of four millions of people in their condition is a practical impossibility, and if it were feasible, that it would be a most fatal measure for the prosperity of the country at a time when it needs every man—these are all considerations of no weight in the President's mind. He is of the fact that a great many white people in the country don't like the colored people.

But such dislikes are a very common spectacle in history. The Jews were universally hated in the Christians of the Middle Ages, and they were abominably treated. They are tolerated now, but they are still viewed with a general repulsion, and in the European cities they occupy certain quarters which are half regarded as lazarettos. Until very recently they were not let in to the British Parliament. But is a grave recognition and determination in this spirit to be made a public policy?

In old Britain the Normans, Danes, and Saxons did not love each other. But they did not propose to colonize. Alfred the Great united form the English nation. The English to-day do not like the Scotch, and they hate the Irish. Is there any valid reason why the Irish should be enslaved or exiled by white men that would not equally apply to the existing and long Celtic bar by the SAXONS? If we are to talk of troublesome and dangerous and unpracticable races, what will our Celtic brethren say to the Saxons?

There is a bitter prejudice against the colored race in this country. It should not be made wrongs is out of the question. That they should is established beyond impossible. They must remain. They must be elevated as fast as possible into good citizens. And how fast ignorance, degradation, and stupidity are raised to what we call the level of citizenship the history of every year shows. The most brutal, besotted, wretched, superstitious European, the most abject race we write, whose body and mind have hitherto served in subject want, hands upon our shores, and in a very few years they are fit to vote for the Governor of New York, and is held to be quite good citizen enough to express the unfortunate colored natives of the country.

The prejudice against the colored race is not the way to overcome. To indulge it is to stab our fundamental doctrine to the heart. But if ignorance, degradation, and stupidity are a place of law are to be held to condemn men to servitude, it is to be understood, and let it work equally. In every town in the country, the Irish—American, Englishman, Irishman, Scotchman, Frenchman, German, Spaniard, Italian, Swede, Norwegian, Greek, Syrian, Asian, African, or Polynesian—take his chance.

The President's convictions and hopes are honorable, and just, and noble. But his method is impracticable. It is simply a shirk, not a solution. The "Conservatives" who praise it do not share his feeling of the deep injustices of slavery, or its effect upon the whole country. They praise it because they think his policy separates him from his friends. They do not love him more; they only hate him less.

COROBRAN AND HIS COUNTRYMEN.

GENERAL COROBRAN has returned and has been most fatally received. But it will always be a matter of surprise that he ever returned to his home. He knew him, indeed, to be brave; and he knew how warmly his fellow-Irishmen regarded his valor. It was very natural that he should be surprised that he did not try a great stroke of bluvery for the precious Constitution.

When, after the day at Bull Run, he discovered who his prisoner was, he might have said to him: "Sir, you and I, Colonel, have made a common take. We can not be enemies. You and your countrymen and my countrymen have been deceived, as we are contending, against a haughty, domineering, foreign power. Our sympathies are not with secession, but with the people. You have been, most of you, our political allies in the past. We inquire not now what you have done, but we create rivals for your labor, is one that you can not support. Go home, then, dear Colonel. Present my compliments to your noble fellow-countrymen, and tell them that a brave people struggling for their rights desires and demands their hearty sympathy and co-operation."

This would have been an extremely pretty piece of gag. It would have been a desperate bid for the alienation of the Irish population from the Government. That it would have been successful we do not believe; but it was worth trying.

As it is, the simple fidelity through a year of suffering of General Corcoran—the purely patriotic odor of General McClellan's Monday letter—and the just guarantee of the conduct of the intelligent part of their countrymen. They see clearly that they have nothing to gain, and every thing to lose, by the success of the rebellion. Many of them belong to the hard-working population, and that is a class with the leaders of the rebellion despise. In the Confederacy, were it established, they would see but all political privileges, while the labor by which they lived would be brought into disgrace by the system of slavery. In the Southern States, from which their insurrection sprang, there is already a property qualification for voters which would effectually exclude the immense majority of true Irish citizens who live by their own labor.

And this is the spirit of the rebellion. The men who believe in that exclusion are the men who lead this revolution. It did not begin with the poor—it had no working class, but with men who foolishly declare that they were born to rule other men. It is exactly the spirit of the British aristocracy, and due to which our Southern aristocracy is most allied in sympathy. It is by that sympathy also that the governing classes in England so ardently wish the success of the rebellion. For it would be the triumph of the aristocratic system and the ruin of democracy.

THE CONDITIONS OF WAR.

THERE are accounts of various persons arrested for discouraging enlistments by wishing well to the rebellion, and ardently desiring that our soldiers may be captured, beaten, and killed. It would seem, as a general rule, that the expression of such sentiments by private persons might be left to the contempt which they naturally excite. But if they are addressed to those about to enlist, or who are considering the subject, then the question may fairly be referred to the discretion of the Government.

For it must be constantly borne in mind that, when we accepted war, we accepted the conditions of war. When the rebellion announced itself at banner there were but two methods before us. One was to yield to it, and avoid war by surrender and the destruction of the Government. The other, or war to take up arms. Instinctively the nation chose war. But war is totally inconsistent with our civilization and the existence of many of our personal and political rights. We were obliged to descend to it to save that civilization, and we must abide by its rules or we are beaten by those who do.

The discipline of war being the severest despotism, we were and are all submitted to it. It compresses its ends by brute force. It must have unity of sentiment, or, that language, it fails. It must are freedom from hostile criticism. It must suppress the ordinary processes of law. It must have a hero measure which, to our ordinary habit, would seem most threatening. And it must do all these things, because not to do them when we go to war is to expose yourself to mortal peril.

But what is our secrecy against the absolute destruction of those rights which war suspends? Nothing but the character of the men in whose hands the authority lies, and in whose name they command. In our country at this moment, if the President were disposed to abuse the enormous power confided to him, the country and the people would be a restraint upon him. If the generals, or any one of them, were disposed to be the Cæsar of Napoleon or Cromwell, they would find themselves deserted by the army, which is not their tool, but in the case of a fatal military success. If the army itself could be supposed to play the tyrant, then, they have but to desert to the enemy. But the army is the people, or the representative of the people.

The talk of the loss of our liberties, then, in which the foreign and domestic enemy so loudly indulges, is really absurd. War, whether accepted, is the willing renunciation of rights for a certain time and for a particular purpose. The existence of those rights thus threatened is, therefore, not by the nation. It is to save the fundamental guarantees of those rights that they are temporarily suspended, as, when your eyesight is threatened, you are doomed to temporary darkness in order to escape permanent blindness.

RETALIATION.

THE rebels have pressed Union men within their lines with the fiercity of wild beasts. They have seized their property and peasants; they have tortured and hung them at their mad pleasure. The story of Parson Brownlow's book inspires a feeling of the extremest sympathy for those men in whom a blind rage at their own chimeras has extinguished humanity.

General Pope issued an order, in accordance with the universal usage of war, that his army should be subsisted upon the enemy; that is to say, that the rebels should help pay the expense of suppressing their rebellion. There was nothing unusual in the order in the least. The enemy and the world have the right to laugh at our feebleness, that it was so long delayed.

Jeff Davis has undertaken to retaliate upon what he calls this barbarous plan. He has denounced General Pope and his officers as fiendish in purported authentically to have confined the brave men taken at Cedar Mountain and to feed them upon bread and water.

The instinctive wish of every generous mind is that our Government should brush this, in the only way by which he can be taught, that his ferocity must be somewhat restrained. The rebels can not be dealt with as honorable men, for their conspiracy began in perjury, and they laugh honor to scorn. If they have more prisoners of rank than we, it would be folly in us to resort to extreme measures, for they would only sacrifice our own men. But if we have the most, Jeff Davis should be plainly informed that his men in our hands answered for ours in his. Every degree of severity in connection with the duty of protecting our brave boys from his ferocity.

If it be said that this would begin a war of extermination, there is but one answer—that the responsibility must rest where it belongs. Our first duty is to our loyal fellow-citizens who have braved death for us, and have now fallen into the enemy's hands. If they are well treated by them, well. If not, let them feel it in the only way they can be made to.

If it be said that it is terrible to think of every officer of ours who falls hereafter into the enemy's power suffering a retaliatory doom, the answer is, that they do not suffer it. They are in command, they are suffering it, and the sole question is, whether they are to suffer it more widely. General Buckner, the meanest of traitors, was pleasantly confined in Fort Warren. We treated the rebels' word, sent him home for exchanging, and he was cured. They have nobly men of ours now, and they are threatened to treat them as the worst criminals; and if we subtract our troops upon the enemy, and shoot spies and secret foes, they will treat them as honorable captives.

That they will do so there is no doubt. Therefore we must determine nothing that we do except General Pope's order should be rescinded, that the prisoners of Cedar Mountain may be treated like the others, or unless Jeff Davis shall promise to Davis and his men that the treatment of their prisoners taken in battle shall be exactly graduated by their conduct toward ours.

FAITH THE SOURCE OF GOOD WORKS.

IT is reported that one of our Generals said that he did not exactly understand why he was fighting, for our side professed to be Christian, and the rebels could not honestly say that he knew what the war was about.

The General is doubtless belied, but the words imputed to him describe what was, beyond question, the feeling of many good soldiers in the Army of the Potomac. The notion of many of them unconsciously show it, however honest they may be. The inconclusiveness of the campaign, the constant check, the disappearance from the scene of men distinguished for going ahead; the victories lost by not having vigorous pursuit, the long delays and illusory advance so constantly remarked—all these are signs of a want of faith. A soldier who doesn't exactly understand why it is fighting for the flag instead of against it.

No man can be victorious who does not believe in his cause. The great and successful Generals have been all men of faith. Such was Cæsar if in nothing else. Julius Cæsar and Napoleon Bonaparte meant success at all hazards. They knew they were well up to their work, and they did. They had no sympathy or toleration for the enemy. They never said a word about it. The enemy was something to be destroyed in the most rapid and overwhelming manner.

In this instant we need no further for a lesson than Jeff Davis and the rebels. They believe fully in their cause and in themselves. They will stop at nothing to secure success. Bred in a feudal and barbarous and ignorant society, they are personally brave and unscrupulous. Cæsar is nearer to them. The condition of the mass of their soldiers is better in the camp than at their own homes. They have less ignorance and more intelligence than the mass that delights in brutality. They have proved themselves in the field equal to the best troops in Europe.

Now if you send against such men a leader who thinks that they are half right, that they have been misled into rebellion by a fair outcry of irregular but very natural, he is beaten before he marches, and his army is demoralized. He has believed the enemy to be wantonly, basely wrong; if he appreciated the utter woe and desolation and ruin that attend the success of the rebellion, he would, if he understood the occasion and the purpose of their fighting, have pushed on with swift and vast terrible that if he were beaten it would be because victory was impossible for him.

A leader of such faith has a sense of military etiquette, and not from the profound conviction of the justice of his cause, may scrupulously obey his orders and execute it by proper rules. But he will not win it against odds and the laws of the art. It is not to be supposed that he will be beaten by a single man gravely think about the philosophy of the war; and doubtless upon the field any good General does his own work on the day. But the whole character of the campaign will be determined by the leaders' faith. A sense of military duty is our own war, that the rebels are half right, his campaign will be half wrong. It will lack nerve and rapidity and energy, and will be marked with dull and delay. It will encourage the enemy and disheaten his own men. But if he rates the rebels at their true value as enemies of his country, of his race, and of civil society, he will smite them every where and continually. He will feel that they will know that they have to deal with a resolution as honorable as their own.

It is for this reason that it is essential for every leader of the national arms to be as true a patriot as he is a faithful soldier. It is this sense of conviction of the justice of his cause which will make the campaign successful. In our Revolution General Lee was doubtless a more accomplished military man than Washington; but the cause would have been lost had he been Commander-in-Chief, for he did not especially care about it. So it was chiefly faith in the cause, not military ability, that established the English Commonwealth.

This nation believes with all its heart in the justice of its cause. It will have for leader any man who equally believes, and the work will be done speedily and done well.

LAMB.—An ambitious young lady was talking very loud and fast about her favorite subject, which a literary dog had been for a long time to her. With a look of deep disgust she answered her interlocutor that she cared very little about what she sat composed with knowledge.

A country clergyman, who, on Sundays, is more indebted to his manuscript than to his memory, called unceremoniously at a cottage while his sermon, a pious performance, was engaged in daily exercise) in pressing a package of tea. "Come, my good man," said the preacher, "I suppose you have heard the current volume," what's the use of my reading it?" replied the man, with perfect simplicity. "Perplexing!" exclaimed the astounded divine; "I doubt you've not understood a word of it." "Oh," argued the religious rustic, "of course, I'm not a preacher, but I'm a reader, you know."

A Presbyterian minister, in the reign of King William III., preferred a complaint to the Privy Council of Edinburgh, and this remarkable expression in his prayer: "Lord have mercy upon all fools and idiots, and particularly upon the town council of Edinburgh!"

When the regulators of West Boston Bridge were drawing up by two lawyers, one carries via white, the other negative, and now stands thus: "And the said projectors shall meet annually on the first Saturday of June, provided the same does not fall on Sunday."

AN Englishman in Philadelphia, speaking of the President, George Washington, remarked that a wish to an American to behold him. While this conversation passed, a Yankee got up and left the Assembly, pointing to a tall, erect, dignified personage passing on the other side of the street. "There," said Washington, "goes a specimen of the gentleman. "Where is his guard?" "Here," replied the American, striking his breast with emphasis.

In a cathedral, one day after service, the fellow-blower said to the organist, "Sir, you played the organ very badly." "Sir?" said the organist, in no small surprise at the freedom of the remark; "how can you presume to have any merit in the performance? Never let me hear you say such a thing again." "Sir," said the blower, astonished at the time, but when they were next playing he would accompany the task of inflating the organ. The organist rose in wrath to order him to proceed, when the fellow, throwing down the bellows behind the curtain, asked slyly, "Shall it be so, then?"

A farmer was elected to a corporship in a million company. He was a plain man, and had his own views on the advantage which the family would derive from his promotion. Speaking to a doubting boy, "Hezekiah, will it be proper for us to let our children play with the neighbors' boys?" "Why, father, what do you mean?" asked he. "Are we not all corporate?" "Tut," said the mother, "your father means that we are as one corporal boy and the other myself."

A barrister observed to a learned brother in court that he thought his whiskers were very unprofessional. "You are right," replied his friend; "a lawyer can not be too barelaced."

In the newspaper account of an inquest held on the body of a glutton, who died by devouring part of a pie, the verdict sufficient was printed, with more truth than wit, "Died by indigestion."

A parson who had a scolding wife one day brought home a brother clergyman to dinner. Having gone into a separate apartment to converse about the prayer, she attacked and abused him for bringing a parcel of idle fellows to eat her victuals. "Why, my dear," answered the husband, not daring to speak loud tone, "if it were not for the victuals, I would give you a good drubbing." "Oh!" cried the vixen, "I beg you will make no stranger of me."

A sponger was reproached one day for dining so often among his friends. "What would you have me to do?" he answered he; "I am pressed to do it." "True," answered Monk Lewis, "there is nothing more pressing than hunger."

An exquisitely-dressed young gentleman, after buying sealer wax at a stationer's, asked for delicate pomatum for the jessine that "he would-ah like to have-ah something perfumed on the wax." "Sir," said the shop-man, "certainly; I will put a ciphon on it." And so he did.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ARMY OF THE POTO-AC.

GENERAL MCCLELLAN left Fortress Monroe with a large portion of the army on the 31st inst. He established head-Aquia Creek, where he arrived on 2d with a portion of his force. The remainder of the army landed at General Hartsen's Landing some time since, with Gen. Porter. General Burnside and his army are at or near Fredericksburg.

THE ARMY OF VIRGINIA.

General Pope has fallen back from Culpeper to the Rappahannock, destroying the railroad bridge. The enemy in hand hot pursuit. On Wednesday, Aug. 27, a battle was fought at Kettle Run, Fauquier County, all along the Rappahannock from where the railroad bridge crosses to Waterloo and Sulphur Springs, and thence eastward to Warrenton and Warrenton Junction. On Wednesday morning, at the single skirmish, the rebels driving back our pickets at the railroad bridge. Gen. Pope with his army five rebel regiments had a contest with Siegel's advance guard, which proved severely. On Friday they began to work in earnest, and the fight raged hotly all day along the center and left, Siegel's army on the right being attacked. The loss of life is of course unknown, but estimated at 5,000 on both sides. Gen. Pope and his men claim victory. The prisoners on either side can not be very numerous. The prisoners on our army have arrived at Washington. Among them are Colonel Corcoran, Colonel Lamar, and Stuart's cavalry upon Catlett's Station, where they succeeded in capturing General Pope's papers and money. At latest dates all was again quiet along the lines.

THE PRESIDENT ON THE NEGRO QUESTION.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, Aug 19, 1862.

Hon. Horace Greeley:

DEAR SIR.—I have just read yours of the 19th, addressed to myself, through the New York Tribune. If there be in it any other statements of fact which I know to be inaccurate, I do not now and here controvert it. If there be any inferences which I draw from the facts believed to be inaccurate, I do not now and here controvert them. If there be any purposes avowed contrary to any wish or suggestion of mine, I only say that, so far as I have power to know, I shall attempt to correct it. And now, to the only point of which I have any knowledge, what I would do with slavery and the colored race, I will say briefly.

My paramount object in this struggle is to save the Union, and is not either to save or to destroy slavery. If I could save the Union without freeing any slave I would do it, and if I could save it by freeing all the slaves I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing some and leaving others alone, I would also do that. What I do about slavery and the colored race, I do because I believe it helps to save this Union; and what I forbear, I forbear because I do not believe it would help to save the Union. I shall do less whenever I shall believe what I am doing hurts the cause; and I shall do more whenever I believe doing more will help the cause. I shall try to correct errors when shown to be errors, and I shall adopt new views so fast as they shall appear to be true views.

I have here stated my purpose according to my view of official duty, and I intend no modification of my official duty, and I intend no modification of my oft-expressed personal wish that all men everywhere could be free.

A. LINCOLN.

THE MEETING OF THE REBEL CONGRESS.

The rebel Congress met in Richmond on the 18th instead of the 4th, according to the proclamation of the usual message. He leads off in his usual hypocritical style, and then alludes to the Federal Government as "tyranny" and "assassins," etc., of individuals. He next speaks of and recommends the confiscatory measure to meet the debt, recently passed by the Federal Government; recommends the issue of treasury notes and treasury drafts, and refers to the inability of rebel war records "at home and abroad" to do justice to the valor of the rebel army. He then alludes to the significance of the future policy of the rebel government.

THE NEW GOVERNMENT OF KENTUCKY.

Hon. James F. Robinson was inaugurated Governor of Kentucky on the 18th inst., by the Secretary of State, Frankfort, on the 15th inst., the Senate and its officers being present. Mr. Robinson made a speech, in which he recognized the entire confidence of the Union party of Kentucky in the President, and in the wisdom of his State and James W. Tate is its Assistant-Secretary. The Senate is Democratic vote, two majority; John F. Fisk Speaker of that body.

THE REBELS AFRAID TO PUT DOWN.

Energetic measures have been adopted in the West to put down the rebels. Guards of the mountain passes and bonds of rebels in Kentucky and Tennessee. Ten Indiana regiments have been ordered to Louisville. Troops have gone into Kentucky, the infantry having practised 8-day marches, setting an example to apparent rebels. The citizens of the West are no longer to be put into a constant state of terror by the bold movements of a few guerrilla parties.

HENDERSON, KENTUCKY.

The Mayor of Henderson, Kentucky, is said to have gone over to the rebels, and taken with him the funds. His property has been seized, and a new election ordered. All the members of the City Council were arrested for refusing to take the oath of allegiance, but they were subsequently released on taking the oath. Contracts to the value of several dollars each not to aid or countenance the rebels.

THE REBEL RESOURCES IN TENNESSEE.

From St. Louis it is stated that General Rosecrans, with 20,000 or 30,000 men, has entered Eastern Tennessee, and toward the southwest, with a prospect of having a brush with the rebels under Price at Vicksburg, Memphis, and Mobile and Ohio Railroad. Corinth is still strongly protected.

THE "NIAGARA" TO BE RAISED.

It has been determined to raise and convert the Niagara the war steamer Niagara.

GENERAL CORCORAN AT HOME.

General Corcoran was united in this city, and met with a most enthusiastic reception. The streets were thronged with people, and the ladies waved their flags so that the assemblage greatly outnumbered the crowd that was gathered together on the occasion of the Atlantic cable or at the reception of the Prince of Wales.

The General was escorted to the residence to receive the proffered bouquet of the Common Council of New York, and he addressed them at both, as also from the balcony.

THE RHODE ISLAND LEGISLATURE.

Governor Sprague convened the extra session of the Rhode Island Legislature, to convene on August 28. The session was also engaged in the passage of a prohibition. Whereas, the large bounties given by the several citizens and towns in the State for volunteers, for the purpose of availing a draft, is producing dissatisfaction in the State, and as the draft is about to be made, the system of enrolling by each town, in its basis to relieve itself from a draft, by paying a bounty to men, and having a large debt which is equally divided among the people of the State, the cause for which it is to be resorted is that of all its citizens, for the preservation of their common country, and that the expense of the draft should be manifested by some of our people for their patriotism exempt under the foregoing military duty.

AN INDIAN MASSACRE OF WHITES.

A dispatch from St. Paul, Minnesota, states that the Indians in Meeker County, in that State, have attacked the whites in the town of Acton, and killed several persons, including men, women, and children. Several persons are also reported to have been murdered at the Lake Agency. The cause alleged is exasperation at the nonpayment of their annuity due from the Government.

CITIZENS OF NEW ORLEANS DISARMED.

The Commanding General has issued an order in New Orleans, by which all the inhabitants of that city have been disarmed. Rebel private property was destroyed at the battle of Baton Rouge it was demarcated that numbers of the inhabitants of the city, and that Mrs. Breckinridge set the stain on the battle-field. They had joined the rebel army.

ARREST FOR TREASON.

Charles Ingersoll has been arrested for treasonable or discouraging remarks, made at the Democratic meeting in Philadelphia on Saturday last. Mr. Ingersoll, in his speech, denounced President Lincoln and the Government in pretty strong terms, and went so far as to disregard the Constitution, and of being the most corrupt of any in the world. He also stated that no one was more base than that of any other nation, and one that had the least protection for life and property.

FOREIGNERS NOT TO BE DRAFTED.

Secretary Seward has written a letter to the British Charge d'Affaire to the effect that foreigners who have not taken out their full papers are not subject to draft.

THE DRUMMER OF THE ILLINOIS TWENTY ——TH.

THE DAY BEFORE THE BATTLE.

Rat-a tat-a tat! rub a dub! rub a dub, dub a dub, dub a dub dub!

"Here, little What's-your-name, come help me up with a hand at eschew?"

Rat a tat tat! tat a tat tat! rat a tat, tat a tat, tat a tat tat!

"The dence take the boy! is he dead? Hallo! I say, drummer, come here, help us with a hand!"

Rat-a-tat! rub a dub! rat a tat a, tat a tat, tat a tat o, tat!

"Confound your drum! do you want to deafen us all with its infernal clatter? How your own ears stand it is more than I can tell."

"It let the boy alone, Thorsuby; how can you go on beating him in this way?"

"Tooting, indeed! why, confound the fellow! he minds me no more than if I were an empty powder-flask. I doubt if it's in the power of shot to tear that boy!"

"So much the better; he's right not to mind you, and is more of a man than you are, sir, this he is. Come, attend to your own business, and let the boy alone."

"No, I won't; he's a funny chap, and I intend to have some sport out of him. Come here, little What's-your-name, I command you on your life, sir, you won't play. What's the use of being so decently respectable, eh?"

"Don't call me What's-your-name; my name's Bags." Rub a dub, a dub, a dub!

"Oh! Bags, I'll be, by, by, be! ha, ha, ha! why, where in the world did you come by such a funny name?"

"It's a very good name." Rat a tat a, tat a tat!

"Very good, is it? Oh, to be sure, bags are well enough in their own place: but who ever heard of a boy being christened Bags? Tell me how did you come by it, little one? Was your father Bags too?"

"No, Father Jack gave it to me." Rub a dub a, dub a dub!

"Oh! Father Jack gave it to me." Rub a dub a, dub a dub!

"Oh! Father Jack gave it to you! and who now may 'Father Jack' be?"

To this question the little drummer vouchsafed no reply, and continued to ply his sticks vigorously as before. No one could hear Bags's performance without being delighted: he had "an ear for music" and a soul for rhythm.

"So here, little Bags!" presently resumed his examiner, "you know you're going to fight to-morrow: now don't you expect to be decently scared when you see the balls and shells flying around you?"

Rat a tat! r-r-r-r-r-a-t tat! tat! tat! tat! went the drum. It was evident that Bags's thoughts were moving with even more than ordinary energy.

You won't relish the first scuff of powder, I promise you: you'll wish yourself and your drum a good thousand miles off when that comes on."

"I only wish I could fight!" suddenly exclaimed the boy, pausing in his operations and making a grand attempt with his left hand to "roll." "You can't; I'm too little to shoulder a musket. But never mind, I can play for the men all the same, and that's the next thing to it!" And rub a dub a, dub a dub! again went the drum, with a roll and a rattle like that of the body of Irish bagpipes under the bend to his knees.

"Hurrah for you! why, Bags, you're a trump! I didn't think you had so much pluck in that little carcass of yours! Tell us, now, who taught you to play the drum?"

"Taught myself." Rub a dub a dub! etc. etc.

"You did? Well that was smart of you! And where did you get the drum to teach yourself?"

"Didn't have any; practised on an empty barrel till I joined the Twenty ——th. Rat a tat a tat! etc. etc.

"Practised on an empty barrel! Well done for you, I say again! Why you play as though you'd been born with a drum-stick in your hand! Some babies are said to come into the world with silver spoons in their mouths. It's to be hoped you'll keep your hands steady to-morrow, Bags; the fight's the thing that'll show what sort of stuff you're made of, sir, the ring-fire-ordeal, you know, and another drumming on the battle-field, as it's likely you'll have to march before a second one goes down behind yonder old Blue Ridge."

AFTER THE BATTLE.

"Well, what do you think of our little drummer now?"

"What do I think? Why, I say there's not a better man among us all!"

"Considering all things, you might say there's not a good a one. Except our Colonel himself, I don't know as we stood the steadier fire of any yesterday with the coolness of little Bags."

"Well, the Colonel noticed him, I can tell you that. But how could he help it? Why, the boy never knew, escapes him. I heard him saying to Lieutenant Somers how right glad he was that the boy came by no hurt—that it would have troubled him more than a little if he'd been brought down. Well, and so it would me, and some of the rest of us, perhaps. Give the devil his due all the world over, say I! Bags has done nothing to be ashamed of time out, and would do him a good turn if I could; not that I think it makes any difference to him though, for of all the independent chaps I ever came across that young Bags is the greatest."

IN THE COLONEL'S TENT.

It was true that Colonel H—— had noticed the little drummer. Indeed the remarkable coolness and self-possession of the boy, as displayed during the recent engagement, together with his habitual reserve and taciturnity, so singular in one of his years, his orderly conduct and his fond devotion to his drum—the only companion (with exception of a few well-worn books over which he was sometimes seen to pore) in which he took delight—had attracted no little attention among the officers of the regiment, as well as the men. The interest awakened in Colonel H—— aroused the desire to know something more of him, and it was with this object that the evening following the foregoing first fight he directed the little drummer should be sent to his tent.

Bags came, his drum on his breast, and the sticks in his hand; for he had been busy with them when summoned to the Colonel's presence, and was too much of a disciplinarian himself of these implements of his office. As he entered the tent the Colonel, who was sitting by the table where he was writing, shaded his eyes from the light for a better view of the little fellow, who paused, saluted with military grace and made his best military salute. His cap withdrawn displayed to view a profusion of short, thick curls, which gave him not a good keeping with the sun-burned tint of his face; but the expression of gravity and thought-fulness—unusual in boyishness—in every feature was strongly out of keeping with the rounded cheeks and dimpled chin. It was a look indicative of acquaintance with his years—it was that of the bereft or prematurely taught the self-reliance of the man.

Colonel H—— could not have well defined his own feelings at that moment. Was it but natural pity for the child who lived on military fare in the thick of the battle, or some mysterious sympathy that so strangely aroused him, and awakened in his heart the wish to know the world around itself the apparently friendless boy? Whatever it was it kept him for a while silent in contemplation of the serious figure of the little drummer. "Come forward, my lad," he then said, "I wish to have some conversation with you." Bags advanced one or two, and this brought him directly before the Colonel, where he stood, his eyes fixed on the countenance of the officer, his countenance betraying neither surprise nor embarrassment under the novel position in which he found himself.

"I have sent for you to say how much I am pleased with your conduct of yesterday, and am more commendable from the fact that you are unusually young and small for your position," continued the Colonel.

"Thank you, Colonel; I only did my duty. Sir, may be my duty for that, though I am small."

"You might have the wish without the ability, my boy. Were you not alarmed when the engagement opened?"

"I might have been, Sir, if I'd let myself think about it; but I kept my mind upon my drum, and it goes in to fury for the men—it was that I volunteered for—and I said to myself, 'Don't trouble yourself about that don't concern you, Bags; you've to do your duty, and stand by your drum.'"

"'Stand by the ship?' why that's a sailor's talk," said the Colonel, somewhat surprise for Bags's feelings to let his countenance betray his inward amusement at this quaint thing.

"It's a very good saying, Sir," rejoined little Bags.

"That it is, and I'm pleased to find you can make so proper an application of it. Let the same be taught you in your duties through life, and you will gain the love and respect of all good men."

"Yes, Sir; that's what Father Jack told me to be taught to say to myself when I felt afraid."

"Father Jack? Your father was a sailor, then?"

"No, Sir; I never had a father. Father Jack was the sailor who brought me up."

"Father Jack brought you up? said the Colonel to himself; then to Bags. "Ah! Father Jack was the name you gave him, was it? Come, my brave lad, come, tell me your story; I feel inclined to befriend you, my boy."

"Very much obliged to you, Sir; but I have no story to tell."

"Oh, but you should tell use all you know of yourself; where you were born—where, how, and with whom you have lived, and so on."

"Born at sea, were you? Well that is a very good commencement for your story. Your life so begun has doubtless had a good many changes and adventures, I dare say, my little man."

"No, Sir, I've had no hardships," replied Bags, decisively. "I've always had a pretty good time of it. It was a great thing for me that I fell in with a man like Father Jack to take care of me when I was a child, and such a man, too, for my mother died when I was only a week old."

"That was sad, indeed! But how did Father Jack come to take such a good care of you? I think he must scarcely prove so good a nurse as a babe of such tender age must require."

"Oh! he did very well with me, Sir; he fed me on goat's milk, and kept me in a tog, sowing me to his jacket over his breast, because, he said, the log kept me very cozy, for I swung with the ship, and so I was not at all cold, and he could have me alone for hours. It was because of the tog that he called me Bags, Sir."

"Ah! I understand now another name than Bags?"

"No, Sir; Father Jack said it would do very well alone till I found my other father, who, of course, would have a name ready for me."

"Then you have to find your other father, do you? But you must explain to me how this is; you know you are to tell me all you know of yourself."

"Yes, Sir. I will have to tell you the first as I heard it from Father Jack. He was coming home from France in a merchant ship for Boston, where my father was living. But when the ship was well out to sea a great storm rose and drove her on rocks, where she split and filled, and all hands had to take to the boats. They had a terrible time of it, for the storm kept up a long while, and beat them about so dreadfully that they quite gave themselves up for lost. But at last they were taken up by a ship bound with a cargo for Liverpool. The captain would have nothing more to do with them, and gave them clothes, and some money, too; for they had lost every thing in the wreck but the clothes they had on. They got safe to Liverpool; but my mother wouldn't stay there any time, though she was quite sick with it all she'd gone through, because she wanted so badly to get to this country; and when after finding passage in another merchant ship just going to sail for New York. She was the only woman on board, so there was only the doctor's cabin for her to take care of her when she got worse, as she did soon after the ship sailed. Then was the ship taken by a French sailor-ship, and spilled her very much, and did all he could for her. But the doctor said from the first that she'd never live through it, and he was right, for she died when it was just eight days old. Nobody knew what to do with me then, and they wanted I was going to sail to die—that is, all but Father Jack; so when he begged to have me, the doctor said to them, 'Let him have the child, for he's a mate by, but if it dies on, for the little one's sure to go overboard after the mother.' From the time the doctor said that Father Jack did very well with me, and brought me safe in the bag to New York. Then he wanted to be kept on board as a sailor, but didn't stay always made his home in New York, and he bit me there when he went to sea again. He was very kind and faithful to me about my mother, after all; for by the time he got to Liverpool the crew of the wrecked ship was quite used to us to the captain, he'd taken the loss of his ship and cargo so hard that, after going through with all the trouble in the wreck, he could not right be himself safe in the other ship in pumped overboard and drowned himself. Father Jack went to see a good many times after that. The last time he went I was just nine years old, and he made me a birthday present that I shall never be tickled. I think more of that present than any one he ever gave me, Sir; for it was the last for that, though I am much again."

"He never came back? And how was that?"

"He died aboard ship of a fever, Sir," replied little Bags, and one big tear rolling slowly down each cheek.

"And so you lost your kind friend! And what did you do after that?"

"Father Jack 'd done all he could to make the way easy for me after he was gone, for he was sick when I was seven, and paid my board a whole year in advance before he left. So I had a fair start, and I turned to for myself, as I did right."

"But what were you able to do?"

"Oh! odd things, Sir, but a good many little things, that helped along. I swept out gentlemen's stores and offices, and went errands for them, and sang like that, Nobody liked a beggar-boy much with me because I was so small, but after a while they found I got my work well enough."

"And what became of your school during this time?"

"I went to school all the some, Sir. I got through with a good many jobs before nine in the morning, and after school I got a good many to do. I use for a little more work, besides learning my lessons. I wouldn't give up the school, Sir, because Father Jack thought so much of my going to taught. He said I must learn all I could, that I might be something as long he might live to be a poor ignorant boy. For he always knew my father must come by me one day or other; he said it was a thing that was to happen."

"And do you, too, expect this?"

"Oh, yes, Sir," replied Bags, very confidently. "Father Jack said so, and he knew. He often said to me, 'Be honest and do your duty, and you shall be found by your father.' Some father coming along you can say to him without a lie, 'Father, I may be poor and rough, but I've always been an honest boy and true to my ship, so you needn't be ashamed of me.'" See, Sir, I could never forget those words and that. And chopping cap and sticks, Bags bured his little arm, and exhibited to the Colonel the figure of a ship in full sail, with Father Jack's name and the words "Hope On" neatly pricked into the skin with Indian ink in the manner common with sailors. "I've done that myself, this neat piece of handiwork, said the Colonel.

"No, you could never forget those words; for, Sir, it was an odd good name. Father Jack was careful to mark them indelibly on your heart as on your arm."

"He did, Sir," responded little Bags.

"But you have yet to explain to me how you came to be discovered by your father, Bags."

"I can soon tell you that, Sir. When I was twelve I left Boston and went on to Chicago with a gentleman in the bookbinding business there, who appreciated myself to him. I'd been with him nearly two years when one day a regiment of Father Jack was there, he'd say, 'Go and fight for your country,' and he was off enough to volunteer, —that's the ship you're to stand by now!" One day—it was after the three months' men had come home—I was passing by a recruiting office, and seen were just going in, so I went in too. I heard them say their names and where for a regiment just about to leave for Virginia; so I stepped up and told them I'd like to volunteer for the place. Some of them laughed, because I was so little; but a big man—the very biggest of them all—didn't laugh at all, but said to me, 'Show us what you can do, my lad.' So they brought me a drum, and I beat it for them. Then the big man said he thought I'd do well enough; so I agreed right off to be drummer to the Twenty ——th."

The Colonel was silent for a while. He was turning over in his mind different projects for befriending little Bags. "Without your family name, or some more definite information than you have, how do you think it possible he will ever find you?" he then asked.

"I don't know, Sir; but I'm sure he'll do it somehow. Father Jack always said we'd come together one day or other, in God's own time. It was plain to be seen that on this point little Bags's faith was too strong to be shaken by arguments. Said the Colonel to himself, "The boy will live and die in the belief that he is to find Mr. Manley, and one that will do him no harm." "My dear! he sure to have it so, for right boy, when he once find one," presently continued Little Bags, "I've something to show him that was my mother's, Sir, Mr. Manley's, and he knows it well." Bags's cap was bag sewed closely all round, and suspended from his neck by a string. "In this is a pretty locket that my mother always wore on her bare, and that Father Jack took off after she died to keep for a remember. I've worn it ever since the day before he sailed for the last time—but he said if he shouldn't come back it must never be opened again till I found my father; and that I must keep it always in this way about my neck that it was my mother's, Sir, and Father Jack 'd say," he'd outlook at, exclaimed the Colonel, "Let me have it—I must see it at once!" But little Bags drew a step back. "I'm sorry, Sir," said he, "but I promised Father Jack I'd told use—" "Depend on it, were he here he would bid you overlook his rule only," hastily interrupted the Colonel, his hand trembling perceptibly as he reached it forth toward the little wallet. With both his drum and sticks dropped, and in a manner so gazing inquiringly into the Colonel's face, Bags, slipping the string over his head, he silently yielded up his treasure.

To rip open the canvas with his knife and draw forth the locket was the Colonel's work a moment. The ornament was of peculiar style and workmanship, and consisted of short braids of woven hair surrounding a little flake of gold, inscribed with a large gold locket. The countenance of Colonel H—— underwent many rapid changes as he turned the bracelet round upon his finger, and attentively examined it. Then, making a powerful effort to speak with composure, he said, "I had I have this bracelet. If it be as I hope—as I believe—within this locket you shall find two names, and the date August 10, 1848. The names Eugene and Cecil—the surnames of both the same, for the bracelet was a wedding gift—are engraved with a

The locket opened with a spring—a secret that Father Jack had not thought necessary to tell Bags —and at a touch of the Colonel's finger the lid flew back. One moment sufficed for an eager look within. In the next, with tears streaming from his eyes as he exclaimed, "My son! my son!" he clasped the little drummer to his breast!

In the first year of his marriage—between fourteen and fifteen years before—Eugene Manley, then a merchant of Boston, had, with his wife, accompanied her mother to the south of France, of which country the latter was a native. Mrs. Manley at Mrs. Grayson, for the benefit of which this change of residence was made. But no improvement ensued on the contrary, when Mr. H—— was some months later unexpectedly recalled to Boston by the sudden death of his business partner, he was obliged to go alone, leaving his wife in attendance upon her mother in all appearance in perfect health-bed. It was but a few months later that a letter from Mrs. H—— informed him that her mother was no more, and that, owing to a new arrangement, she was hastening to join him, having taken passage in the Albion, which was to sail in a week. The Albion arrived, but Mrs. H—— was not on board. The passenger who occupied the state-room she had engaged brought a letter to the expectant husband, explaining how an accident, though not one of a very serious nature, had decided her to delay her journey another week to fit for the voyage in a week's time as farther, and he might look for her in the course of August. This was the last positive information Mr. H—— ever received of his wife. Vainly he made inquiries of arriving vessels, and as vainly wrote her after letter by those that left for Havre. In increasing anxiety he finally engaged his passage, that he there, to his infinite alarm, could gather no trace of her. She had been a stranger in the city, and Mr. H—— had no friend to whom he could for grief at the recent death of her mother, she had avoided the world to attend upon him. His inquiries seemed to have been generally received that she had sailed for the United States, but beyond this no information, though many days elapsed and long continued, elicited any information concerning her movements.

The victim of doubts and griefs which were at times almost too much for his reason, Mr. H—— drove in vain to forget his loss in the business affairs. A tormenting craving for change beset him. He passed year after year in European countries, engaged in mercantile pursuits in new localities energies led him for the time to seize upon. The Crimean war first awakened his military spirit, and, attached to the staff of a distinguished French officer, he plunged into its vortex with a zeal and fearlessness which found few equals.

Years later, when he brought to his own country a new bride, Lawrence was dead; he little dreamed that, guided by the hand of Providence, he was going to meet the solution of that fearful mystery which for years had been wearing away the fate of his young wife. Or that he was about to give back God in his mercy had yet spared to him a precious link with the life so lost and mourned!

Had any one predicted for little Bags that he would cry when he found his father he would have thought it quite impossible. Yet tears were now flowing freely down his cheeks. As soon as these would permit him to speak, looking up in the Colonel's face with glistening eyes, he said, "Father, you've found me at last, just as Father Jack always said you would; and you are a great gentleman, and a great colonel, while I'm only a poor drummer! But indeed I've never forgotten what Father Jack told me; I've been an honest boy, and tried my best to do what was right—you won't be ashamed of me, father?"

"Ashamed of you, my son! No, I am proud of you!" said his father, clasping him yet closer in his arms; "nor, from this hour forth, shall I fail to thank God, night and morning, for bringing you to my heart, and bringing you just as you are!"

One other consideration embarrassed little Bags; and concerning this also, he lost no time in consulting his newly-found parent. He had an intuitive perception of the nobleness of the drummer remaining in the humble position of drummer to the regiment; yet his high sense of duty revolted at the bare thought of deserting his post. He had volunteered for three years—surely he must keep to his word—he must stand by the ship! Could he earn recreant and leave the Twenty ——th without a drummer!

MANHATTAN: OUR ISLAND EMPRESS.

A POEM DELIVERED BEFORE THE COMMON COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK, ON THE TENTH CELEBRATION OF THE 86TH ANNIVERSARY OF OUR NATIONAL INDEPENDENCE, COOPER INSTITUTE, JULY 4, 1862.

BY A. J. H. DUGANNE.

Where the River of the Mountains[1]
Weds the River of the East,
Sits enthroned our Island Empress,
Diadem'd and golden-fleeced;
And, like Argonauts of Jason,[2]
With their white sails gently furl'd,
At her feet, from storms reposing,
Lie the ships of all the world.

Proudly smiles our Island Empress,
Throned upon Manhattan's strands,
Weaving wools of Golden Fleeces
With her soft and shining hands.
Back and forth she plies her shuttles,
O'er the land and o'er the main—
Iron ships that cleave the ocean,
Iron cars that scour the plain!

All the world her wondrous fabric,
Warp and woof she softly weaves,
From the Merchant's Golden Fleeces
And the Farmer's Golden Sheaves;
Back and forth she plies her shuttles,
And the webs that leave her loom
Are the radiant robes of Commerce
And the fleets of Harvest-home!

Filed within her granite warerooms,
Flashing from her marble marts,
Here abide the Freights of Nations,
Lofty wools and marvelous silks:
From the furrows of the ocean,
From the furrows of the soil—
Golden harvests, ripening always
Out of iron seeds of Toil.

And she sits enthroned upon them,
Gathering still, with shining hands,
All the world more closely round her,
Woven in Trade's golden bands.
And as tides are drawn through ocean
By the moon's imperial smile,
Tide-like flow the wealth of nations
Round about Manhatan's Isle!

Wealth of loom and wealth of garner,
Wealth of mountain and of mine,
Wealth of Workmen, wealth of Manhood,
Wealth of Liberty divine!
All that Man may glean from Nature,
All that Heaven hath given of Wealth,
Freedom yields our Island Empress,
Throned upon Manhattan's girth.

And as flows the tireless Trade-wind,
Freedom's wealth goes outward still;
And as flows the circling Gulf-Stream,
Round the world her currents thrill!
Wafting people of Life and Manhood—
Bearing goodlier freights than gold—
From the gardens of the New World
To the deserts of the Old.

Old Manhattan! brave Manhattan!
Many call thy minstrel chant,
Done by all thy sturdy burghers
Since the times of Stuyvesant![3]
In the grand old days of "Queen Boys"[4]
The days of "Golden Hill"[5]
God be thanked! the pulse of Freedom
Throbbed through Old Manhatan still!

Here, upon the ancient "Common"[6]—
There, beside the olden piers—
Walked the feet of stout M'Donald,[7]
Schuyler bold, and gallant Sears:
Here were Hamilton and Clinton,
Here were Livingston and Jay!
God be thanked! they have not left us—
Here their spirits walk to-day!

And I feel their gracious Presence,
As if flags were fluttering o'er;
And I feel Manhattan's burghers
Answering gradually, as of yore,
When George Washington invoked them
From their homes and from their marts,
And the new-born "Declaration"
Sang its Gospel through their hearts!

When the marching tramp of freemen
Shook the walls with stormy peal,
And they trod King George's image
Underneath their rushing feet:
Underneath their marching columns
Tramped his likeness and his laws,
While the statue of their tyrant
Gave them BULLETS for their CAUSE![8]

These the deeds of Old Manhattan—
Voices, like a bugle-blast,
Sounding, as through mountain gorges,
Challenge from the Loyal Past!
And we hear them rolling round us
In the hour of Freedom's need,
Till our hearts, like echoes, answered,
Word for word, and deed for deed!

Answered, as on ancient "Commons,"
Answered, as on "Golden Hill,"
Twice one hundred thousand freemen
Rouzed as with electric thrill;
Answered, with Manhattan's trousers
Piled upon the Union's shrine;
Answered, with Manhattan's life-blood
Poured like sacrificial wine!

Loftier waved the flags of Freedom,
Louder rolled the Union drums,
When the inspiring shout went upward,
"Oh! Manhattan's army comes!"
Washington once more invoked us,
And we rose in columns grand,
Marching round the "Flag of Sumter,"
Grasped within his sculptured hand![9]

When the myriads of Manhattan
Shook the earth with martial tramp,
And she kissed her noblest children,
Hurrying down to Freedom's camp;
And the sundered coils of Treason
Writhed upon her loyal shore
When she flung her gallant "Seventh"
In the scales of righteous war.[10]

Gallant "Seventh!" loyal "Seventh!"
Theirs to lead Manhattan's van—
Answering to the Union roll-call
Fresh-lipped youth and bearded man!
One forward to fearful kindness,
One loyal prayer for boyhood's home—
And they leaped to plant their banners
On the Capitolian dome![11]

Dumb be he whose lips belie them!
Freedom's first Protection Guard![12]
Theirs to strike Manhattan's key-note,
When the Harp of Stars lay jarred.
Would ye hear their latest drum-beat?
Would ye track their latest tread?
Go where loyal graves lie foremost—
There the "Seventh" claims her dead.[13]

Banners streaming, bayonets gleaming,
Helots spoiled by manly foils—
Here the stalwart Sixth advances,
There, behold! the veteran Eighth!
Marching onward—marching onward—
Southward like a storm they burst!
Here the Ninth and Twelfth are charging;
Yonder wheels the Seventy-First![14]

Still the battering pulse of Washington
Throbs the main he loved in life!
Still the generous heart of Winthrop[15]
Throbs where'er his comrades bleed;
Still the battle-cry of Ellsworth[16]
Breaks along the charging lines;
And the dying shout of Ricks
Surges from the Seven Pines![17]

And I hear the angry clangor—
Hear the stern and wild accords—
Crashing from the Harp of Ireland,
Struck by Freedom's battle-swords!
Hear the Sixty-Ninth's dread slogan,
Rending clouds of blood-red smoke,
When the flash of Erin's Star-Banner
Through the mist of Bull Run broke![18]

When the Celt and Saxon, mingling,
Kissed and died on Glory's bed;
And the green sod seared with leather—
Iceland's gore and Scotia's red—
When the noble feet of Haggerty
Trod with Cameron Freedom's plains,
And the faithful soul of Corcoran
King-like walked in rebel chains![19]

Scotland's Thistle—Ireland's Shamrock—
Bloom for us with crimson flowers;
And o'er all the roar of battle
Gallia's eagle screams with ours.
Roman "Fire!" German "Forwarts!"[20]
Mingle with our own hurrahs;
And the Hungarian answers "Eljen!
Eljen!" for the Flag of Stars![21]

Still where'er the brave are summon'd,
There Manhattan's heroes march:
Freedom weaves their laurel chaplets,
Union builds their triumph-arch!
Here they clustered, here they mustered,
Hurrying forth to Danger's van:
Merchant, sailor, student, toiler,
All who bore the stamp of Man.

Still where'er the clouds are darkest,
There Manhattan's legions form,
And the life-blood of her martyrs
Flings its Rainbow o'er the storm.
Still in sacrifice for Freedom,
Hero-souls to God we given;
Mounting from the Camps of Conflict
Upward to the Stars of Heaven.[22]

By the grand and lordly highlands,
By the broad and breezy plain,
Rolls the River of the Mountains
Downward to the sounding main:
Streaming, like our glorious banner,
Outward to the ocean's bar—
Purple-starred beneath the morning,
And at midnight bright with stars!

Far away, in clouds and darkness,
Roars Atlantic's stormful waste;
By its gulfs lies encircling
Half the wondrous world embraced!
Far away its voiceful billows
Thunder on the opposing strand;
There, it guards the Old World nations,
Here, it shields my Native Land.

Land of grandeur! land of glory!
Fresh from Nature's throbbing breast!
Over all the world-wide countries
Thee the Almighty One hath blest'd!
Beauty robes thy smiling prairies,
Power encrowns thy mountains grand,
Plenty laughs along thy rivers—
God is with my Native Land!

God was with thee in thy childhood,
And he walks before thee now;
'Tis the reflex of His splendor
That is burning on thy brow!
States, in all the Earth, have moulded
Hero, patriarch, saint, and sage;
But their proud historic records
Pale before thy simple page.

Moving slow, like sceptral phantoms,
Nations pass in awfulness;
But in all their stately pageants
Walks no country like to mine.
Upward from the vasty depths
Many a hero-chieftain towers;
But through all the realms of ages
Walks no Washington across!

Thee, my Native Land! unmated,
Tread'st the Future's shining ways;
Following far, the wondering peoples
Mark thy onward glories blaze:
Mark where Man asserts his birthright,
Mark the strength of Freedom's charm,
Mark the Toiler, proudly tanning
Monarch of his own right arm!

By the Loom, the Plow, the Anvil,
Freedom's sons like princes tower;
Theirs the thunder and crown of Manhood—
Kings can claim no nobler dower.
Rude their garb and rude their labor,
But their strength is grand as trees;
And through all the gates of triumph
Still they walk with sceptred souls.

Here the Toiler toils unbranded,
Here the Poor Man feels no shame;
For he knows the future fortune
Upward treads to loftiest fame;
For he dwells where lands and children,
Where the grandest heights of earth
May be scaled, with brave aspirings,
By the child of humblest birth.

Where the dark primeval forest
Glooms around like shades of night,
There the young Backwoodsman opens
With his axe the gates of light.
And the Intellect of Labor,
Clasping Nature's guiding hand,
Climbs aloft with Archimedean Levers,
Rules with arm our glorious land.

Type of Freedom's highest Manhood,
And the Genius of her soul,
Stands to-day this brave Backwoodsman,
Representative of all!
And the Lesson of his Greatness,
Writ in Faith and Hope sublime,
Tells the humblest of the People
How to triumph he may climb.

And the Nations, following onward,
O'er Atlantic's stormy deep,
May behold this Chosen People
In the Lord Jehovah's keep;
May behold how loyal Manhood
Up to royal grandeur springs—
Where the realms of Labor,
And the Toilers are the Kings.

Though the blood-red forge of battle
Roars with fierce Rebellion's blast,
And the Cloud of War is Union
In the stormy blaze are cast—
Though the strokes of War's dread hammers
Shake the anvil of our strength—
Out of all the Gold and Iron
God will shape His Work at length.

In the blaze of War's red forges
Old King Cotton's crown shall melt,
Yielded Iron and Gold for Freedom
When Manhattan cast it down.
In the blaze of War's red forges
Manhood's gain is Tyrant's loss;
All our purest ores are Freedom's—
All our dross is Slavery's dross.

Old Manhattan! Island Empress!
Thine the sceptre—thine the throne!
In thy womb are Freedom's armies—
Freedom's navies launched in thine!
Thine the Iron and Gold of Ages,
Mined from all the wondrous Past;
Union's Gold and Freedom's Iron—
Fear not! God will weld them fast!

In the fiery trial of Conflict
Freedom proves her purest ores;
And the bonds of Peace are welded
Underneath the blows of War.
From the Iron and Gold of Armies,
From the broken links of Wrong,
God will weld His Work together—
God will make the Union strong!

[1] The Hudson River was known to the early settlers of Manhattan as the Rio de Montannes.

[2] "The Island," occupied by the Dutch, who sailed in search of the "Golden Fleece," composed the first naval force on record—their flag-ship, the Half Moon, being the war vessel of which we have any account. In conquering our Empire State, the Manhattan, or Dutch, burghers, who made the fortunes of her Argonautic visitors, I trust the day will never come when they will permit her to be betrayed, like Medea, or goaded by ingratitude to the destruction of her own offspring.

[3] Peter Stuyvesant was the last Dutch Governor of New Amsterdam and Manhattan Island.

[4] The "Liberty Boys" composed a notable patriotic organization of Revolutionary days, and their name that of New York faithful spirits, during the Civil times that led to the Revolution. The conflict of "Golden Hill" were conflicts between patriotic citizens and sailors of New York on one side, and British soldiers (who had cut down a "Liberty Pole") on the other. The conflict occurred in place January 19 and 21, 1770, on an eminence of the present John Street, between William and Cliff streets. The troops were driven to their barracks by the "Liberty Boys."

[5] The "Common" occupied the site of our "Park."

[6] Alexander M'Donald, colonel of a regiment of the Revolutionary War, was the leader of a party which before the Revolution, formed a "Son of Liberty to the Reader" in which "Tea" was to be sent. This party also betrayed intelligence of the British authorities. His bold threats and promises made him an idol of the people, and he became the "great meeting in the fields," July 6, 1765. General Gates, afterward Governor Daniel Tompkins, subsequently a Major-General, sustained M'Dougal in his contest with Governor Tryon. Isaac Sears was one of the master-spirits of those days, always on the street parties. Alexander Hamilton, when at that time a youth of seventeen years, made his maiden speech at "the great meeting in the fields," in favor of the first "mass" gatherings of New York's "Sons democratic." Livingston and Jay were members of the Provincial Committee of a "Hundred Patriots."

[7] On the 4th of July, 1776, one year after the signing in Congress of the "Declaration of Independence" reached New York, the people of that city pulled down the leaden statue in our city to mutter on the "Commons" of which we have the earliest record a hollow square within which was Washington on horseback, and on the spot where the statue stood, a pedestal of white granite. The people gathered in masses around the statue, and when the order to mount was sounded, Captain M'Donald, who commanded to the front, shouted to his men:

"After the reading of the 'Declaration,' the excited people rushed to the City Hall, and tearing the portrait of George the Third from its frame, trampled it under foot. They marched in a body to the Bowling Green, hurled the image of King George from its pedestal, and dragged it in pieces through the streets. The statue (an equestrian one) was then taken down. It was conveyed to Litchfield, Wolcott, Governor of Connecticut, by whose wife and daughters the lead was run into bullets. Forty-two thousand and musket-balls were made from it, and four hundred British soldiers perished by the bullets into which the statue of Connecticut was invaded by Governor Tryon. The solidarity of the statue is still preserved, in the shape of a bronze copy, at the Museum Hotel, West Broadway.

"On the 9th of July, 1776, the troops were assembled on the 11th of April, 1861, at Union Square, the 7th of the Seventy-fourth Regiment, N. G. S. N. Y., and the 71st of the First Brigade, and was exhibited to the troops. The statue was then taken down, and one of the bronze equestrian statues of Washington which now adorn the Capitol at Washington will be the result.

"In accordance with the above response of the Seventy-fourth Regiment, New York State militia, to the call of President Lincoln, the Seventh Regiment decided impulse to the Union spirit of New York, and the Seventh Regiment was the first to march to the defense of the National Capital. Patriotism at that crisis might have emboldened sympathizers with the South to attempt a diversion; but the unanimous enthusiasm of the Seventh, and the subsequent patriotic promptitude of the Sixty-Ninth (whose ranks had likewise been rolled upon by disloyal politicians), completely overawed whatever treason might have been lurking for a spring. Honor, then, to the representative militia of Manhattan, who, in the Union Cause, militia of Manhattan, who, in the Union Cause, militia of Manhattan, who, in the Union Cause, recognize no prejudices of party, rank, race, or religion!

THE INFLUENCE
THE SISTER OF CHARITY

OUR WOMEN AND THE WAR.

Our artist has entitled the large picture which we publish on pages 568 and 569 "THE INDIFFERENCE OF WOMAN." It illustrates, in effect, what women may do toward relieving the sorrows and pains of the soldier. In one corner will be seen that exquisite type of angelic womanhood, the Sister of Charity, watching at the bedside of a dying soldier, ever ready to relieve his wants and minister to his desires. On the other side a lady-nurse is writing, at the dictation of a poor wounded soldier, a letter to his friends far away, which shall relieve their terrible anxiety. Above, a group of young ladies are busily engaged, with needle and sewing-machine, in making clothing for the troops, and especially those comfortable garments which even our coarsest but most devoted soldier will not scorn to supply. One can almost see the fairy fingers fly about the work. Last of all, above Biddy, who has probably got a lover or a husband or a brother at the war, is doing her part in helping the soldier by cooking for them. The moral of the picture is sufficiently obvious; there is no woman who can not in some way is something to help the army.

In the Crimean war glory and fame swirled the charitable efforts of Florence Nightingale and her noble band of lady nurses. This war of ours has developed scores of Florence Nightingales, whose names no one knows, but whose reward, in the soldier's gratitude and Heaven's approval, is the highest our guerdon woman can ever win.

BATON ROUGE.

BATON ROUGE must be taken!
Forward, my boys, and be steady!
We'll snatch from the hand
Of the rebel hand
The laurel of old "Rough and Ready!"

Old "Rough and Ready"—(there him!)—
How the cowards would flee before him!
We'll strike in his name,
'Twill be all the same,
For the flag that flouted o'er him.

If the hero of Buena Vista
Knows our country's present story,
With what joy I ween
He must see us then
That victory of "Old Glory!"

And WILLIAMS, who led the way,
Like a patriot, calm and steady—
How he must have cried
With a soldier's pride
When he joined old "Rough and Ready!"

STRANGE AND YET TRUE.

WHEN the evening lamps are lighted, or, rather, just before that operation—say in the little interval which follows the retirement of the ladies from the dining-room, and precedes the appearance of the hacking, skyrocket fizz left temporarily to a low—a grain of guard-talk mingles, not inharmoniously, with the gentle and domestic topics invoked by the subdued light and confidential feeling of the hour. The treatment of the subject is necessarily various. Twenty minutes will not suffice for a dive into philosophic deeps. Facts are simply adduced. Theory and proposition are bald bare, and left to for any after-manipulations profounder thinkers please. Nevertheless, from the jabulous (often exceedingly) fragmentary way these little conversations may be deduced a whole garden of thought worthy the attention of the most earnest sage.

Whatever be the cause, the fact will hardly be disputed that a vein of the supernatural has greatly augmented of late among the educated classes of society. It has, indeed, as might be expected, abounded in ancient form of belief—modern, it is neither believe in the ghost nor shoot at him. We require to know something of the nature who is to be uninvited into our dwelling, and what may be his immediate business there, but not with rudeness or inhumanity. In a word, the intellectual spirit of the time is the welcome child of progress. As every age has stamped upon the wild world around the seal of some grand discovery—as every successive year reveals its half-suspected wonders—the vein has become and less studied as new combinations upon that vast unexplored ocean which, like the natural horizon, seems to mark the union of man God—and man, as he grows wiser, grows humbler.

To this improved feeling, and this better disciplines of reason, we are indebted for many an interesting narrative which would else have never passed the household family circle ; or, in so doing, so would have at least been carefully denuded of every corroboration as name, place, and time afford. In the incidents here for to be related they have been supplied without scruple, and without desire for any greater reticence than the subtler in his discretion may impose. The circumstances of each case have been verified with unusual care, because another object than simple curiosity excites such inquiry. Still it may be proper to call attention to the fact that persons who have known, or who have conceived themselves to have been, the witnesses of so-called supernatural appearances, are, in recalling the circumstance, never visibly under the dominion of that exalted feeling which accompanied it, and which is all calculated for minute and accurate detail. He, therefore, who undertakes to relate a ghost story at second-hand may have the difficult task of rendering incoherences in such a manner as shall not bring down unjust doubt upon what is in fact correct narration.

To assist analysis, we must compare. To aid comparison, the least possible reserve should unite with the closest possible adherence to facts, so far as facts can be ascertained after passing through strongly susceptible mediums. Even were these extra-natural occurrences not explicable (which we hold them in every case to be), there is surely no little terrible or revolting in the pursuit. It is, for example, a simple, touching, and beautiful faith that the last earthly regards of the liberated spirit should be fixed upon its best beloved. If such be the work of a mocking spirit, it wears a wonderfully heavenly mien. "I am a ghost," says Wolfran, in the Foil's Tragedy :

> Tremble not. Fear not me:
> The dead are ever your friends.
> And love the living. They are cheerful creatures—
> Just quiet at the time of their visits.
> In grace, and patient love, and options bounty,
> I'm now their guardian angel.

To proceed at once to illustration, here are two fantasies of 'imitation," both brief and true. The first is fragrant with reminiscences of the old French literary circles, whom it induced to bestow much attention on the subject of apparitions.

In 1816 he was visiting a lady of his acquaintance at Rouen. They were engaged in earnest conversation, when the door behind the chair-back of the lady's children, the youngest of whom—a girl of eight—was sitting by her mother. Suddenly the latter started from her seat with a loud shriek, and threw herself into her mother's arms. On being questioned as to the cause of her agitation, she pointed to a sofa, and, weeping bitterly, declared that she had seen seated upon it the figure of her elder sister, Rosaline, then on a visit to some relations at or near Havre. The countenance of the phantom was of a death-like pallor. The girl had occurred at four o'clock in the afternoon of the 17th September. Two days after (affirmed the Rosaline Lemercier, whom unhappily drowned in a boating excursion at Havre, at (it was affirmed) the precise moment of the appearance.

As another instance, here is a circumstance minutely related by Monsieur M——, a retired French officer, in a letter to a friend :

"Left an orphan at an early age, I was brought up under the care of a kind-hearted grandmother, who could scarcely have cherished me more had I been her own offspring. She resided at Harfleur, and, being in easy circumstances, lived in a style of living that could contribute to my youthful pleasures, keeping open house on Christmas-day, and with that material which rendered my frequent visits to the Sunday fêtes in the neighborhood doubly agreeable. On one occasion I had returned, usual, in company with a band of young vagabonds like myself, to attend a fête at Quilleboeuf, on the opposite side of the Seine.

"Contrary to my natural habit, I felt uneasy and depressed, an inexplicable feeling of dread hung upon my mind, and neither my own efforts nor the raillery of my companions could drive it away. I therefore left my good companions, embarked by ferry-boat, and, but I was not aware that she was in my company, Mademoiselle Le Roux upon my mind, far from dispersing, momentarily increased. If I joined as usual in the different sports, I was conscious that my mirth was that of wit that generally accompanied our games had not a word to say to it. My soul was absent from the match of skittles. It was my turn to deliver the ball, and I was standing, half pensively, poising it in my hand, when I heard a voice close to me pronounce my name. I started, and turned round, and lo! my sister stood before me.

"Nobody, replied those around me.

"I insisted that I had heard a woman's voice say "——'

"Bah! you're dreaming. Play away!

"I struck the ball with my hand when a second time I heard my name pronounced in a soft and plaintive tone, but fainter than the former, as if a long distance off. I was "No one present had heard the sound.

"It struck me that some one of the party was playing a trick upon me, in order to increase my evident melancholy. Nevertheless, under the influence of some unaccountable power, I felt myself summons, I refused to play any longer, and presently returned alone to Harfleur. On reaching my grandmother's house I was shocked to learn that she had expired during the afternoon, pronouncing my name twice or thrice distinctly, and that the moment of the second summons I had heard. These facts are well known to some twelve or fifteen people at Harfleur and its neighborhood, and many are still (in 1854) living, and were I to live fifty years I could never forget the impression that event apart from my memory."

But of course these so-called "facts" hast their common source in the nature. Therefore, as a question of fact, no corroboration is gained by their being known to the dozen or fifteen people still living.

The heroine of our next illustration is MRS. D——, an English lady.

"When, by an early age, Mrs. D—— became a widow, it pleased the brother of her husband to dispute the dispositions of the latter's will—a proceeding the more annoying as the property in land, for the widow was already extremely moderate. Illiterate, and as a question of business, she must insist three years, and caused Mrs. D—— the utmost vexation and anxiety, when at length the jury, finding their claims insufficient, the lady had never been any thing else, decided in her favor. Some short time after this, Mrs. D—— was residing in 1 Place, Brighton. A friend, Miss ——, usually shared her bedroom. Both were lying awake one night about three o'clock, when Mrs. D——, with some surprise, saw her friend sit up suddenly in bed, clasp her hands, and sink back again on the pillow in a profound sleep. Strange as seemed the movement, it was no evident to Mrs. D——— that her friend was really in a tranquil slumber that she made no effort to disturb her. A minute elapsed, when the door quietly opened, and there seemed to enter a figure which she knew at once was supernatural. She describes her feelings with great minuteness. She owned that, by nature, she was somewhat nervous, her impressions, as she afterward remembered them, on this occasion had not the slightest intimixture of fear. She was conscious of a reverential awe, such as might become the witness of a revelation overruling the accepted laws of nature, united with a feeling of intense curiosity as to the object of the apparition. Gliding through the subdued light, the figure had all the appearance, gait, and manner of her deceased husband ; until, passing round the room, and sinking down into an arm-chair that stood nearly opposite her bed, turned slightly aside, the figure presented its profile, and Mrs. D—— clearly recognized the countenance and late opponent, Mr. W. D——, at that time residing in the North. No sooner had the mysterious visitor set down than he raised his clasped hands, as in passionate entreaty ; but though the spectral lips appeared to move, as in harmony with the gesture, no sound was audible. Three times the hands were lifted in the same earnest manner, when the figure rose, and retired as it came. Some nervous reaction followed its disappearance, for Mrs. D—— remembered no more that night, but found her mistress trembling violently, and much agitated. Nevertheless, she quickly regained her self-possession, and could only related what she had seen, both to Miss F—— and the maid, the former rising shortly after and very unusual, and only knowing that she had fallen asleep again contrary to her own intention.

The succeeding day was cold and stormy, and neither of the friends quitted the house. In the evening some visitors called. As they were taking leave one of the party suddenly inquired :

"By-the-by, have you had any recent news from the North? If so, since you reached us, I hardly know how, that Mr. W. D—— is dangerously ill, some say dying, even (but it is only report) dead."

"He is dead," said Mrs. D——, quietly. "He died at midnight."

"You have a telegram?"

"You shall hear."

And Mrs. D—— told her story to her wondering friends.

As quickly as news could reach Brighton she received intimation of Mr. D——'s death at the hour of his appearance.

A singularly suggestive statement is, that the scene witnessed by Mrs. D——at Brighton was nearly repeated in the dual combination of Mr. W. D——, hundreds of miles distant. His mind rendered somewhat as the end drew near, but perpetually returned to the spot of the visitation by sea-mist. Mistaking his sister for Mrs. D——, he addressed to her the most fervent entreaties for pardon, avowing his bitter regret, condemning his own injustice and covetousness, and declaring that he could not die in peace without her forgiveness. Three times the dying man had raised his hands in the manner she had witnessed, and so expired.

One morning, some years since, the lady of a distinguished London physician was lying in bed in her house in Harley Street. It was late, and she was broad awake. The door opened, but Lady ——, concluding it was her maid, did not raise her head. But a remarkable-looking figure, passing between her bed and the window, walked up to the fireplace, and there stood with the mirror which hung above, Lady —— recognized the features of her step-son, Dr. J——, then attached to a foreign embassy. He wore a long night-dress, and carried something on his arm.

"Good Heaven! is that you, John? and in that dress?" cried Lady ——, in the first surprise.

The figure turned slowly round, and she then became aware that it must be carried out in a dead child, the body being swathed round and round in a large Indian scarf of remarkable workmanship, which Lady —— had presented to Mrs. J—— on the eve of her departure. As she gazed the outline of the figure became more and more indistinct. They were lost in the familiar objects of the room. Lady —— neither fainted nor shrieked, nor even rang the bell. She was alone, and thought the matter over, resolving to mention it to no one until the return of her husband, then absent on a commission on an illustrious household. His experience would decide whether her physical health offered any solution of the phenomenon. As for the ghost of a child, it may be taken as an accepted fact that, though nobody is supposed to die in bed without he sleep, every body knows, by the sudden change of scenery, and snapping of the chain of thought alone, when he has left the world.

On hearing her story her husband immediately looked at his wife's tongue and felt her pulse. Both organs perfect. Of her sanity he had not proof. Touching veracity she was truth itself. Still he was averse to her making public any recommendation to patience, and to see what cause of it. In the mean time the day and hour were noted down, and the next advices from J—— awaited with more than usual interest.

At length they arrived. Mrs. J—— informed his father that their child—an only one—had died on such a day (that of the apparition), and that his wife, although she would be laid up in bed in the last of its birth, had begged that it might be fetched by the first train. It was to be brought up rived, embalmed, but inclosed in a coffin so much larger than was required for the tiny occupant that it was considered best to be filled with the child's clothes, etc., while the Indian scarf had been wound in many folds round the body of the child.

A favorite theory lays it down as law that it requires two minds to produce one ghost. These must be, of course, the percipient and the recipient of the image; on the other, that of receptivity. Unless the mirror be specially prepared, the object, though at hand, can not become visible. Yet here is an example of the substitution of one, certainly in no such condition of special preparedness, for another unquestionably interested.

Colonel B——, who perished, with a party of his men, in the lamentable burning of a transport on her voyage to the Crimea, was well known to the writer. He was a man of the coolest nerve, of the most impenetrable self-possession. It was his habit to sit up late, reading, in the chamber of his invalid wife, after the latter had retired to bed. One night, Mrs. M—— has fallen asleep, the door opened, and her maid, Lucy, who had been sent home, till, to the charge of her friends a few days before, entered the room. Perfectly conscious, as he declared, from the first, that the object he beheld was not of this world, the steady soldier fixed his eyes on the apparition, careful only to catch its every movement, and impress the whole scene with accuracy on his memory. The figure moved slowly to the side of the bed, gazed with a sad and wistful expression on the sleeper, and, finally, as though reluctantly, dined away into the gloom. Colonel M—— then awoke his wife and inquired what had occurred. The hour was noted, and proved to be precisely that at which the poor girl had breathed her last, murmuring her mistress's name.

Some twenty years ago the attention of SIR M—— and Lady S——— was attracted to the appearance of a little orphan boy. So great was the interest with which he inspired them both that they took entire charge of his future. He was put to an excellent education, and, at a proper age, introducing him, on his own earnest request, into the service. Years passed, during which the young man advanced rapidly in professional and general knowledge, and won for all appearance on the ocean a prosperous career, when, one rude November night, about half past twelve, the inmates of Lady S——'s country-house, in which she was then residing in the absence abroad of Sir M——, were aroused by a loud ringing at the bell. The servants, already awakened, heard the step of her steady old butler, moving in person to ascertain who could possibly be arriving at such an hour. The violent gust of wind and rain seemed to burst in with the opening door. The servants succeeded ; after which the butler was heard reascending to his apartment. Lady S——'s curiosity was sufficiently aroused to induce her to summon her maid, who was in an adjoining room, and send her to question the butler as to the unseasonable visitor. The servant was that, on opening the door, no one was to be seen. The night, though rough, was not very dark, and the gleam on the pavement from the gas in the broad lawns could be discerned a living thing. But for so many having heard the bell the butler would have suspected it to have been a gust of wind.

Gradually the household resumed its repose, when, at the end of another half-hour, every one in every body. There was no mistaking now, for the bell had not ceased its impatient vibrations when it had been set in motion by the servants on the stairs. Again the storm dashed into the house, and nothing but the storm. No human form was visible without, nor were any footprints to be traced on the smooth gravel sheltered by the porch. As they were about to close the door for the second time Lady S——'s maid appeared on the landing and beckoned, with a white, scared face, to those below.

"Come up, come up, somebody! My lady has been HIM. Sir ——! I dare not tell you more."

It was, in effect, as she had said. Immediately after the group of servants had descended the stairs Lady S——, with every sign of fright and horror, standing at the foot of her bed. Believing at the moment that it was actually himself, she had accosted him.

"What, Edward, you here?"

"Yes, mother," (immediately) disappeared.

News shortly arrived that the young man had perished at sea on the very November night, between the hours of twelve and two.

The following singular story, belonging, perhaps, more strictly to the class of second-sight than visions, was related to the writer a short time since, by the lady of a distinguished German diplomatist, accredited at Frankfort :

A friend of the narrator had herself a beloved and attached friend, who died after a brief but severe interval of suffering. A short time after, the spirit of the departed stood, in a dream, by the bedside of the living friend, and, with the most benevolent countenance directed with indescribable agony impressed the hand, and pointed to the words of some "great, strong soul," that might wrestle for her in prayer, and emancipate the afflicted spirit, if it were "bound" by any fetters of unexpiated sorrow. This condition she described as one of an eager longing to rejoin her friend, but of perplexity with some terrible hindrance, only removable through the means suggested. Much troubled in mind, Madame L—— rose, after some delicate hesitation to appeal to the strongest and most potent soul within the range of her acquaintance, which was that of a German professor, called in the "German Luther." To him, accordingly, she made her appeal. The request was granted, and redressed with promise with characteristic zeal.

Soon after, the apparition revisited Madame L——. This time with more solemn, more composed, but still marked with traces of suffering and anxiety, and waving the thanking hand which she had been already done, adjured her, in the most touching language (repeated by the narrator with wonderful accuracy and minuteness), to persist in the success intercessor to engage more—but once again

"Oh yes, yes, yes!" cried Madame L——, deeply moved, did as she was requested, and wrote at once to ——, who happened at this time to be absent at the distance of two days' journey.

On the third night the spirit once more stood by her friend's bed, with an aspect of unspeakable tranquillity, and surrounded with angelic radiance, declaring that all was now well.

"Woman, woman!" he exclaimed, "what have you done? For no reward that could be proposed to me would I endure such another hour of conflict and agony as that which my compliance with your request has caused me." He then proceeded to relate that, having—though with some reluctance—engaged in prayer as he was desired, he felt as though at once environed by all the powers of evil, and that every fiend in hell, within and without hell, and all but overcome, he recited himself to the very utmost, and struggling on through unutterable mental torture, at length regained his calm. But never more, for him, such fearful championship!

A broad distinction, of course, lies between cases of mere cerebral excitement and such as we have before adduced. Hallucinations are as fully recognized, if not quite so common, as colds in the head. Few of those who must have noticed the twitch or toss of the head peculiar to the late eminent counsel, Mr. B——, were aware that it was engendered by a perpetual vision of a raven perched on his left shoulder. A gentleman now residing in Broadway, New York, transacts business daily under the immediate supervision of his great-uncle, who, in a laced coat and ruffles, occupies a large arm-chair placed expressly to receive the honored vision.

MANNERS MAKE THE MAN.

WE have lately stumbled on two compendious little works, entitled "The Gentleman's" and "Lady's Manual of Modern Etiquette," which profess to embody the latest edition of the code of manners observed in "the highest circles." Glancing at the preface, we found to our horror that to be ignorant of the subject-matter of these minute volumes was "necessarily to exhibit vulgarity at the table, clownishness in the drawing-room, and general unfitness for the society of the refined;" and, furthermore, that here were set forth "certain fixed laws, observed by all classes claiming a respectable position." Inexpressibly shocked at the awful consequences we must have incurred by remaining ignorant of this authoritative exposition of the edicts of fashion, we lost no time in perusing it, with the faint hope that haply our instincts might have saved us from some of the social enormities so sweepingly denounced, and that in the eyes of society we might hitherto have appeared as, at any rate, a favorable specimen of the savage.

The "Gentleman's Manual" begins by setting out the ceremonial to be observed on the occasion of a morning visit. And the exhaustive nature of the treatise will be recognized by the first direction, which is this, "If you alight from a carriage, endeavor to do so in a graceful manner." Our author has evidently a salutary fear of the street gamins before his eyes, for he adds, "Inattention to this matter has subjected many to ridicule." Visits are of two kinds, for purposes of congratulation and of condolence. We do not pretend to understand the reasons which, of course, exist for the following caution with reference to the former: "Visits of congratulation must be always made before dinner." Much more intelligible is this rule for a visit of condolence, which breathes the very spirit of the "mitigated affliction department" at Messrs. Pugh's or Jay's: "Take care to appear in a sober dress; and if the occasion be the death of a person even slightly related to you, go in mourning—deep or otherwise—according to the degree of relationship." Here is an exoteric precept applicable to all visits, the full force of which the housemaid will appreciate: "Be very careful to scrape your feet, and to use the door-mat upon entering, if the streets be in a muddy condition." But the very next is highly mystic and esoteric: "Take your hat with you into the reception-room, and, as a rule, hold it in your hand; if requested to do so, you may place it beside you on a table, but never put it on the ground." Chapter II. relates to the dinner-table, and in it the programme of dinner is minutely laid down. "To married ladies," we read, "should be conceded preference as to the order of rotation, and if it is wished to be very formal, let those of highest rank be taken out first." The "order of rotation" can only mean that in the highest circles the ceremonial is to go in state down the front stairs, then to mount with equal pomp the back stairs, then to descend the front stairs a second time, and so on ad infinitum—clearly a very aristocratic proceeding, because it would result in a dinner with his Grace Duke Humphry. "The host offers his arm to the principal lady"—that is, if he wishes to be very formal—"and leads the way." "Immediately behind comes the hostess." It is terrible to reflect that we have invariably permitted the wife of our bosom to bring up the rear. Once down stairs, here are a few of the canons for behavior. Perhaps, in these revolutionary days, it is wise in our author to reassert explicitly a good deal that Lord Chesterfield would take for granted. At any rate, it is impossible to cavil at the following sound advice: "Never convey the knife to the mouth. Take care to masticate as quickly as possible, and do not rattle your knife, fork, or spoon, more than you can avoid. It is not necessary to wait until any one else begins to eat; commence the business of your dinner as soon as you are served, although it is not requisite to dart upon it like a vulture upon its prey—such a course would intimate that you are unaccustomed to such fare as you have before you." A great instructor can not enlarge on his chosen theme without introducing indirectly a good deal of curious scientific information. As we learned, under the head of visiting, that a visit of congratulation must be taken, like fruit, early in the day, on pain of dyspepsia, so in the passage just quoted we are presented with a singular fact in natural history—namely, that it is the want of familiarity with raw meat that makes the vulture take to it with such unmistakable gusto. Peculiar responsibilities of course attach to the post of master of the house. There is the obvious duty "of sending a plate of any meat he may be carving, by a servant, to each guest who is not supplied, without the ceremony of first asking permission." But he must have the subtlety of a Gladstone or a Bethell to realize and act upon the following nice distinction: "He may inquire of each person if he prefers any particular part; not whether he would like such or such a part, naming it. If he have no choice to offer, it is out of place to press a guest to make one." Out of place, indeed! but we can hardly believe that a host could be found of such devilish malignity as to press a friend to partake of a wing or breast when nothing but the drumstick remained. "It is mistaken kindness to persist in helping any one to a particular dish if once declined." Again, we think the "Manual" understates the barbarity of this proceeding. It is impossible to reprobate too severely the conduct of an entertainer who should treat his guests as Strasbourg geese are treated, or the apoplectic pigs that sprawl about a Cattle Show. There are a few useful hints about taking wine. "It is not necessary to ask the pleasure of taking wine with a lady verbally—to catch her eye is sufficient. If her neighbor is so remiss as not to perceive that the service is required, a lady may politely request him to charge her glass." The parties "should smile and bow slightly before drinking."

Ball-givers and ball-goers may learn much from these pages. First, as to sending out invitations. "If several members of one family be invited, one card is sent to the master and mistress, another to the daughters, and another to the sons. These may all be placed in one envelope, which should not be fastened, and addressed to the mistress of the house." The votary of Terpsichore ought to be grateful for the following suggestions: "In a quadrille, the gentleman should, if possible, escort his partner to the top place. (N.B. If the orchestra be placed at the end of the room, that end is considered the top; if elsewhere, the top of the room is that end farthest from the door.)" This is really hard upon the unhappy lady who is offered the alternative of being deafened by the cornet-à-piston, or suffocated for want of air. Besides, what if a room should be so utterly abnormal as to have two doors, where would the top be then? This is a casus omissus to which we respectfully invite the author's attention. "In the Schottische, Waltz, and Polka be very careful to avoid encircling your partner's waist, except in the lightest manner, and exercise extreme caution to prevent pressing too closely upon her; avoid pressing her hand tightly." Soft pressure, it would seem, is allowable, and does not entail any "unfitness for the society of the refined." But no further liberty would be tolerated in "respectable company;" and we may charitably infer, therefore, that "in the highest circles" a similar propriety is observed.

Hitherto we have been drinking in wisdom from a stern, rigid Mentor. In the remarks on "Supper," we feel at once that we are listening to a man and a brother. "After attending to the wants of their fair partners, the gentlemen generally tacitly agree to stand and wait until the ladies have retired (which they should always do after a moderate refreshment), and then to sit down together to supper," of which they may, by implication, partake immoderately. Here we have the voice of nature bursting artificial restraints. Great is lobster salad, for it fairly triumphs over etiquette in the affections of this modern Polonius.

Of this Manual, as of some other books, it might be said that it contains many things that are new, and many things that are true; but what is new is not true, and what is true is not new. No one, for instance, would dream of disputing the following proposition: "Some knowledge of passing events is almost indispensable to those who go much into society;" or this: "Do not speak so much as a single sentence in company in a language not understood by those present;" or this: "To take notice of children is generally to render yourself agreeable to their parents." Again, the most unsophisticated among us knows that "letters should always be prepaid;" that "the flesh, teeth, and nails should be cleansed at regular and fixed intervals;" and that "the nails should never be permitted to grow to an offensive length." We have long ago arrived at the conclusion that "those who have weak eyes should wear colored spectacles;" and the instinct of self-preservation would forbid any disregard of the following rule: "If you use false hair, be careful that it is all of one shade." Nor do we require to be reminded that "it has an undignified and somewhat thief-like look to turn the eyes down whenever you are spoken to." The following caution, too, we regard as somewhat superfluous: "When a marriage contract is to be drawn up, it is well to ascertain that all parties concerned agree to all the particulars set forth before the formal meeting for signing the deeds. This will prevent much unseemly discussion in the presence of the bride-elect." But we find in this volume many injunctions and many subtle distinctions calculated to make us feel acutely our own utter ignorance of modern etiquette. We do not see, for instance, how any conversation is to proceed, if the following rule be strictly adhered to: "It is inexpedient to indulge the habit of asking questions; it may be inconvenient to answer them, or if answered, the reply may cause you to look very foolish." Again, there must be some good reason for the following precept, though we fail to grasp it: "Do not permit yourself to be surprised at any thing, except in the company of ladies." Why is one to be all agog in female company, and how long has straining eyeballs and an open mouth been a recommendation to the sex? Here is a mysterious canon: "A formal introduction may occasionally be dispensed with in the case of persons who meet casually, and who, finding each other's society or conversation agreeable, think fit to dispense with the services of a third party." What services? and who is the "third party" darkly alluded to as haunting the steps of the two "agreeable parties?" For a good many "things not generally known," we beg to refer our readers to the head of "Letter Writing," in this pregnant little work. They will learn there that, "in addressing any one higher in rank than themselves, large-sized paper should be used;" that the use of adhesive envelopes should be exclusively confined to business communications; that it is "contrary to good-breeding to send a letter secured otherwise than by sealing-wax to your most intimate friend, or even to your wife; that the seal should never be impressed by any fantastic device; and that gilt-edged paper should only be employed in a friendly letter." With infinite shame and contrition many of our readers must own to frequent breaches of each and all of these social observances, and particularly to having licked innumerable envelopes in corresponding with their wives about the children's whooping-cough. We are not sure that all our generous impulses toward our superiors have taken the form of a present of game, which we are assured is "the only thing that we may be certain will not give offense." Nor have we interpreted the ante-nuptial banquets of our male friends in the following cruel sense: "It is usual for a gentleman, previous to his marriage, to give a dinner to those of his bachelor friends whose acquaintance he wishes to discontinue. This is tacitly understood as a friendly form of dismissal!"

There is great originality about the "general suggestions" given at the end of these volumes. A gentleman will note that the habit of crossing the legs is objectionable; that he must never address a friend aloud by his name in public; that in ascending stairs he must precede a lady as quickly as possible, in descending he must follow her; and that while escorting a lady from one room to another on the same floor he must give her the left arm, unless both parties are married, in which case the right arm is more correct. A lady will find much practical wisdom embodied in the remarks on "dress." If she is so unfortunate as to be deformed, she is advised to conceal it by "attention to the make of that portion of her habiliments immediately connected with the misshappen part." If her features be large, she is to arrange her hair in large masses. She is never to appear anxious about the safety of any part of her attire in company. She is solemnly warned not to compress her feet into shoes too small, or her hands into gloves of a size less than proper for them. "Such an attempt causes the 'member' to appear larger, its uncomfortably tight appearance attracting attention; besides which, the feet are sure to be injured, and, by the formation of corns, to become larger and more unshapely the longer the course is persisted in." And lastly, let her attend to the following oracular utterance, in which we could have wished that the condemnation of crinoline had been more explicit: "At a ball, you will pass and repass during its progress the other dancers many times. Bear this in mind, and dress, accordingly, in a costume as light and close-fitting as is consistent with the fashion."

One is tempted to ask, with whom can the author of this wonderful Manual have lived? and who are the lunatics who regulate their deportment by the rules it contains? Who in the world is our anonymous instructor? We do not hesitate to say that we have penetrated his disguise. Every item in this catalogue of the proprieties smells of cast-off plush. It is our old friend Jeames, whiling away the hours of his retirement from active work by dilating on the Genteel. There is a certain psychological value in a travesty of society regarded from the point of view of a thoroughly vulgar and illiterate mind. But there is something more of which a book of this kind is the expression. It symbolizes the essentially snobbish side of character. The demand for such information as this impudent imposture pretends to give is created by the morbid craving which almost every class evinces to ape its betters, and do as is done "in the higher circles." Mrs. Smith wants to know the dinner arrangements observed in a nobleman's family, in order that, when she next entertains Mrs. Jones, she may astonish that lady's weak mind by imitating them as closely as circumstances will permit. The hard-worked maid of the Smith establishment does just the same thing, when she waggles about the kitchen in a hoop which she fondly imagines to be a faithful copy of Missis's style of dress. There is something almost pathetic, in an Aristotelian point of view, in this latest synopsis of the social virtues. The points which strike an ordinary reader as most ridiculous would save it from ridicule in the eyes of a philosopher. The injunctions to cleanliness and a calm temper betray something like a faint and dim notion of the principles on which true courtesy rests. They indicate a sort of twilight consciousness that, after all, it consists in something more than a set of arbitrary rules about matters of infinitesimal importance, and that it is too subtle to be subjected to this ludicrous codification. As Sheridan says of wit, so it might be said of good-manners, that they are more nearly allied to good-nature than shopmen imagine. While spurious politeness hinges on respect of persons and has its sliding scale of manners—these for the company of a grandee, these for every day life, and these for a poor relation—true politeness disdains to look beyond or outside of itself for a principle whereby to regulate its conduct. The true gentleman is absolutely and unalterably the same in the cottage and in the palace, simply out of respect for himself and a noble scorn of appearing for a moment other than he is. It is this which Shakspeare expresses so happily in the few pregnant words with which Hamlet rebukes the men who would have had the poor players treated according to their degree—"Treat them according to your own honor."

THE BATTLE AT BATON ROUGE.

ON page 564 we publish an illustration of the BATTLE OF BATON ROUGE, fought on 5th August; and on page 565 an illustration of the DESTRUCTION OF THE REBEL IRON-CLAD "ARKANSAS" BY THE UNION GUN-BOAT "ESSEX," which occurred on the following day. We condense from the Herald correspondence the following account of these affairs:

General Williams received information as early as Monday, the 28th ult., that the rebels had started from Camp Moore for the purpose of making an attack on Baton Rouge.

About two o'clock on the afternoon of the 4th information was received from some negroes that the rebels were approaching in force from the Greenwell Springs road, upon which the troops were got under arms, ready for the menaced attack. At half past three o'clock on the following morning the reveille was beaten, and, the troops having formed, they were marched out to meet the enemy. About a mile out of town our little army was drawn up in line of battle, awaiting the expected attack.

The engagement was brought on by one of the companies of the Twenty-first Indiana, which was on picket duty about a mile back of the camp, being driven in by the rebels. As soon as the firing was heard General Williams sent the other companies of the Twenty-first Indiana to the support of the pickets. On reaching the scene of action they found that the enemy was in too great force to contend with successfully, upon which they fell back to the front of their tents, followed by the enemy. There they made a stand, and engaged the entire brigade of General Clarke, consisting of two Mississippi regiments, and a third regiment, composed partially of men from Mississippi, the rest being from Arkansas. The fighting at that place was very severe. The Indiana boys performed prodigies of valor, and kept the enemy in check for a considerable time. General Williams, finding, however, that they were too far advanced to receive support from the other regiments, ordered them to fall back, which was done to the distance of from 200 to 250 yards.

Just about this time the right wing of the Union army was engaged by Colonel Allen's brigade. This wing consisted of the Sixth Michigan and Nims's battery. Simultaneous with this movement our left was attacked by Ruggles's brigade. Attached to the left wing was the Fourteenth Maine and Everett's battery. The fighting at this point was excessively severe, and the roar of battle was heard all along the line from left to right. This lasted for about twenty minutes, during which time the rebels kept their troops masked under the cover of the woods as much as possible, while the Union soldiers were exposed to their fire in the open field. Considerable inconvenience was experienced by our troops, too, in consequence of their facing to the east, which caused the morning sun to shine in their faces, rendering their operations exceedingly difficult. Still our brave troops flinched not, but manfully bore the shock of overwhelming numbers in the face of every difficulty.

The Thirtieth Massachusetts was now ordered to advance and support the Michigan troops; but while they were getting into position it was found that their aid was not necessary, as the Michigan boys had already repulsed their opponents. The Ninth Connecticut and the Fourth Wisconsin, which were held in reserve, were ordered about the same time to advance in support of the other regiments; but as they were going on the field the enemy retired. At one period of the fight the enemy got into the camp of the Twenty-first Indiana and burned it, upon which this regiment, from the cover of the woods, poured a most terrific volley into them, doing fearful execution, and causing them to retire precipitately. They met a similar fate from the Twentieth Maine, into whose camp they had forced an entrance, though they succeeded in burning this camp too.

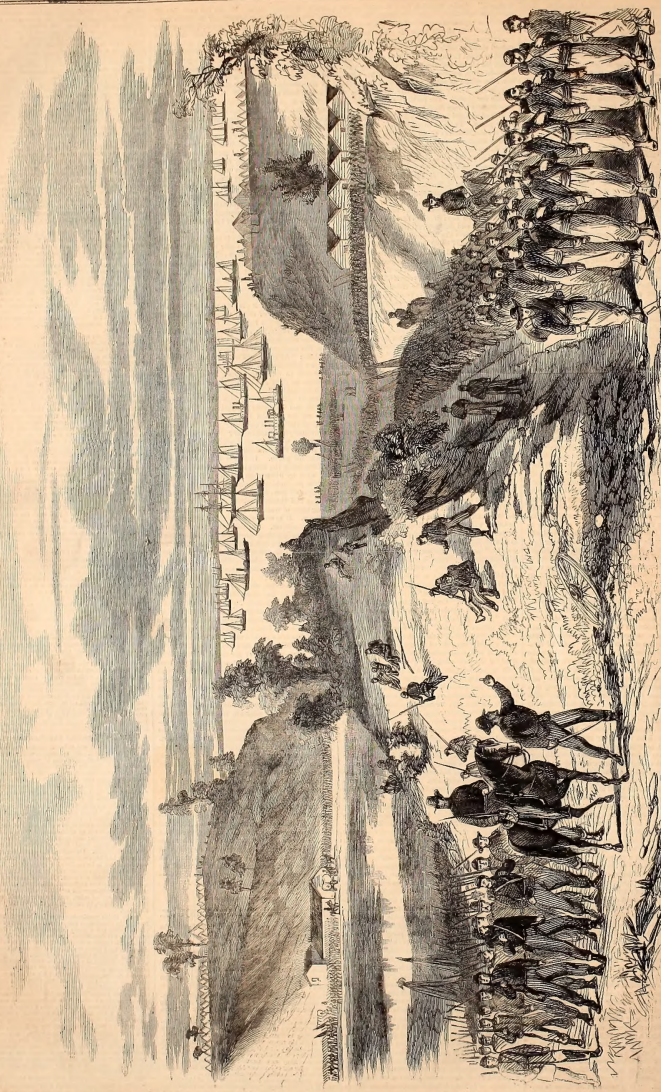
While the fight was raging three companies of the Sixth Michigan Volunteers were in peril of being cut off by the Fourth and Thirtieth Louisiana regiments, commanded by Colonel Allen, acting as Brigadier-General. These two regiments suddenly emerged from the woods and marched toward the three companies, with the view of turning their right flank. They had succeeded in capturing two guns belonging to Nims's battery, and a well-known rebel officer, named Henderson, was seen to wave a flag in triumph over the guns. Some say it was a black flag; but doubts have been expressed in regard to the correctness of the statement. The two guns were brought to bear on the gallant Michigan boys; but they were too nimble for the rebels. Lying flat on the ground, the rebel balls flew over them, upon which they started to their feet and poured so well-directed a volley into the enemy's ranks as to completely astonish him. This was handsomely seconded by the remaining guns of Nims's battery, which, making a detour along the road, so severely galled the Louisiana regiments by a well-timed cross-fire that when the two companies of the Michigan Sixth came to the bayonet charge the rebels were driven back to the cover of the woods, leaving the two guns they had captured behind them. Nims's battery thus got their own again.

The hardest part of the fighting was in the centre, where the Fourteenth Maine fought with distinguished bravery.

The Twenty-first Indiana also fought like tigers, and it is said that a rebel general paid them the handsome compliment of saying that but for those damned Indianians Baton Rouge would have been captured, though there are Union soldiers who do not see it exactly in that light.

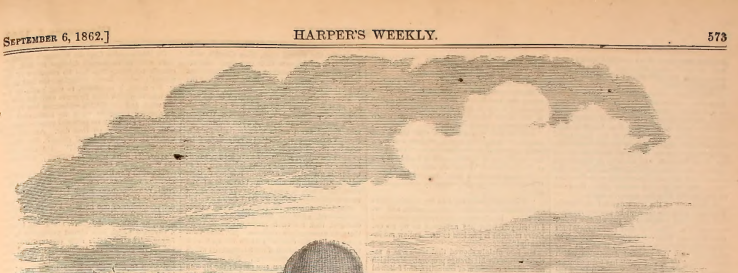
When the long roll was beaten the gun-boats Essex, Sumter, Kineo, and Katahdin took up their positions, the two former to protect our left and the two latter our right flank. The Essex and the Sumter opened fire in the woods, their shells screaming through the trees, tearing them into shreds and scattering an iron hail around. Signal-officer Davis, of the Kineo, stationed himself on the tower of the State House, from which elevation he had an excellent view of the field, and could signal to the vessels where to throw in their shells. After the battle had raged for some time the Union troops began to fall back on the Penitentiary, when several well-directed shots from the 11-inch guns of the boats kept the rebels in check. Shortly after this the firing ceased.

At half past three P.M. firing was re-opened, the gun-boats Kineo and Katahdin shelling the woods in different directions where the enemy were, doing great execution. It has been stated that one shell from the Kineo killed from forty to sixty rebels. Toward evening the firing again ceased: but the gun-boats continued to send in a shell every half hour in different parts of the woods during the whole night, with the view of keeping the rebels at bay; but they had already fled, the gallant charge of the Sixth Michigan having completed their discomfiture.



The rebels were led by Major-General John C. Breckinridge, who scampered off in such haste that he left his sword behind. It was picked up on the field, and is retained as a trophy. Perhaps it was this circumstance that gave rise to the report that the traitor lost his right arm.

DESTRUCTION OF THE "ARKANSAS."



While the firing was going on smoke was seen up the river behind a bend. It was ascertained that it proceeded from the rebel ram Arkansas, in pursuance of the programme laid down for her to attack the Union vessels while their land forces were dealing with our troops. It seems, however, that the commander of the Arkansas thought better of the matter, and did not venture down; for there was the Union ram Essex, as well as the other gun-boats, ready to give her a warm reception, and at night the officers of the Union vessels wondered where the Arkansas was. Their curiosity being stimulated by the continued absence of the nondescript, or "What is it?" as Barnum would term it, it was determined that, as the mountain would not go to Mohammed, Mohammed would go to the mountain; and go he did, being represented by the Essex leading, closely followed by the Sumter, Kineo, and the Katahdin. On turning the elbow, beyond which her smoke had been seen on the previous day, the monster was discovered to be on fire close to the bank. The rebel gun-boats Webb and Music were by her, but they prudently retired on seeing our boats. It seems that the Arkansas was worked by two engines on one wheel, and that both must be in working order or neither will act. One of the engines got out of order, and the other would not work without its fellow, in consequence of which she got under the bank.

As the Union gun-boats approached several shots were fired at the Essex from the Arkansas, one or two of them taking effect, but without doing any damage. In consequence of the immovable position of the Arkansas she could not bring more than one of her two guns to bear, or she might have given the Essex a great deal of trouble, as the latter vessel is quite unmanageable. The Essex ran past the Arkansas to a part of the river where there is a reach of some length, and opened on her formidable antagonist at five hundred yards with three guns loaded with solid shot. One of these took effect right under the port in the starboard bow of the Arkansas, and split in two from the force of the concussion. Commander Porter then ordered the same gun to be loaded with an incendiary shell of his own invention, and, without moving the gun to take a new aim, the shell was fired, entering just where the solid shot had struck. Immediately a jet of flame was shooting upward from the Arkansas, and in a short time the entire vessel was on fire. It is supposed that the condensed cotton with which the Arkansas is packed caught fire from the shell, and communicating thence to the wood-work soon wrapped the monster in flames. After burning till all her upper works were destroyed she swung off into the stream, where she blew up with a terrific explosion.

The Arkansas was plated with railroad iron on the outside, over a planking of six-inch oak; inside that was six inches of condensed cotton on another six inches of oak.

CHAPTER VII.

LATE that evening, when Magdalen and Mrs. Wragge came back from their walk in the dark, the captain stopped Magdalen on her way up stairs, to inform her of the proceedings of the day. He added the expression of his opinion, that the time had come for bringing Mr. Noel Vanstone, with the least possible delay, to the point of making a proposal. She merely answered that she understood him, and that she would do what was required of her. Captain Wragge requested her, in that case, to oblige him by joining a walking excursion in Mr. Noel Vanstone's company, at seven o'clock the next morning. "I will be ready," she replied. "Is there any thing more?" There was nothing more. Magdalen bade him good-night, and returned to her own room.

She had shown the same disinclination to remain any longer than was necessary in the captain's company throughout the three days of her seclusion in the house.

During all that time, instead of appearing to weary of Mrs. Wragge's society, she had patiently, almost eagerly, associated herself with her companion's one absorbing pursuit. She, who had often chafed and fretted in past days, under the monotony of her life in the freedom of Combe-Raven, now accepted, without a murmur, the monotony of her life at Mrs. Wragge's worktable. She, who had hated the sight of a needle and thread in old times—who had never yet worn an article of dress of her own making—now toiled at sandcastry over the making of Mrs. Wragge's gown, and bore as patiently with Mrs. Wragge's blunders, as if the sole object of her existence had been the successful completion of that one dress. Any thing was welcome to her—the trivial difficulties of fitting a gown; the small ceaseless chatter of the poor half-witted creature who was so proud of her assistance, and so happy in her company—any thing was welcome that shut her out from the coming future, from the destiny to which she stood self-condemned. That sorely-wounded nature was soothed by such a trifle now as the grasp of her companion's rough and friendly hand—that desolate heart was cheered, when night parted them, by Mrs. Wragge's kiss.

The captain's isolated position in the house produced no depressing effect on the captain's easy and equal spirits. Instead of resenting Magdalen's systematic avoidance of his society, he looked to results, and highly approved of it. The more she neglected him for his wife, the more directly useful she became in the character of Mrs. Wragge's self-appointed guardian. He had more than once seriously contemplated revoking the concession which had been extorted from him, and removing his wife at his own sole responsibility, out of harm's way; and he had only abandoned the idea on discovering that Magdalen's resolution to keep Mrs. Wragge in her own company was really serious. While the two were together, his main anxiety was set at rest. They kept their door locked, by his own desire, while he was out of the house; and, whatever Mrs. Wragge might do, Magdalen was to be trusted not to open it until he came back. That night Captain Wragge enjoyed his cigar with a mind at ease, and sipped his brandy-and-water in happy ignorance of the pitfall which Mrs. Lecount had prepared for him in the morning.

Punctually at seven o'clock Mr. Noel Vanstone made his appearance. The moment he entered the room Captain Wragge detected a change in his visitor's look and manner. "Something wrong!" thought the captain. "We have not done with Mrs. Lecount yet."

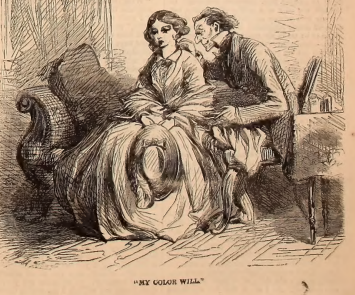
"How is Miss Bygrave this morning?" asked Mr. Noel Vanstone. "Well enough, I hope, for our early walk?" His half-closed eyes, weak and watery with the morning light and the morning air, looked about the room furtively, and he shifted his place in a restless manner from one chair to another as he made those polite inquiries.

"My niece is better—she is dressing for the walk," replied the captain, steadily observing his restless little friend while he spoke. "Mr. Vanstone!" he added, on a sudden, "I am a plain Englishman—excuse my blunt way of speaking my mind. You don't meet me this morning as cordially as you met me yesterday. There is something unsettled in your face. I distrust that housekeeper of yours, Sir! Has she been presuming on your forbearance? Has she been trying to poison your mind against me or my niece?"

If Mr. Noel Vanstone had obeyed Mrs. Lecount's injunction, and had kept her little morsel of note-paper folded in his pocket until the time came to use it, Captain Wragge's designedly blunt appeal might not have found him unprepared with an answer. But curiosity had got the better of him—he had opened the note at night, and again in the morning—it had seriously perplexed and startled him—and it had left his mind far too disturbed to allow him the possession of his ordinary resources. He hesitated; and his answer, when he succeeded in making it, began with a prevarication.

Captain Wragge stopped him before he had got beyond his first sentences.

"Pardon me, Sir," said the captain, in his loftiest manner. "If you have secrets to keep, you have only to say so and I have done. I intrude on no man's secrets. At the same time, Mr. Vanstone, you must allow me to recall to your memory that I met you yesterday without any reserves on my side. I admitted you to my frankest and fullest confidence, Sir—and, highly as I prize the advantages of your society, I can't consent to cultivate your friendship on any other than equal terms." He threw open his respectable frock-coat, and surveyed his visitor with a manly and virtuous severity.



"I mean no offense!" cried Mr. Noel Vanstone, piteously. "Why do you interrupt me, Mr. Bygrave? Why don't you let me explain? I mean no offense."

"No offense is taken, Sir," said the captain. "You have a perfect right to the exercise of your own discretion. I am not offended—I only claim for myself the same privilege which I accord to you." He rose with great dignity, and rang the bell. "Tell Miss Bygrave," he said to the servant, "that our walk this morning is put off until another opportunity, and that I won't trouble her to come down stairs."

This strong proceeding had the desired effect. Mr. Noel Vanstone vehemently pleaded for a moment's private conversation before the message was delivered. Captain Wragge's severity partially relaxed. He sent the servant down stairs again; and, resuming his chair, waited confidently for results. In calculating the forfeities for practicing on his visitor's weakness he had one great superiority over Mrs. Lecount. His judgment was not warped by latent female jealousies, and he avoided the error into which the housekeeper had fallen, self-deluded—the error of underrating the impression on Noel Vanstone that Magdalen had produced. One of the forces in this world which no middle-aged woman is capable of estimating at its full value, when it acts against her, is the force of beauty in a woman younger than herself.

"You are so hasty, Mr. Bygrave, you won't give me time—you won't wait and hear what I have to say!" cried Mr. Noel Vanstone, pitiously, when the servant had closed the parlor door.

"MY COLOR WILL."

"My family failing, Sir—the blood of the Bygraves. Accept my excuses. We are alone, as you wished—pray proceed."

Placed between the alternatives of losing Magdalen's society or betraying Mrs. Lecount—illenlightened by any suspicion of the housekeeper's ultimate object; cowed by the unscrupulous severity of Captain Wragge's inquiring eyes—Mr. Noel Vanstone was not long in making his choice. He confusedly described his singular interview of the previous evening with Mrs. Lecount, and taking the folded paper from his pocket, placed it in the captain's hand.

A suspicion of the truth dawned on Captain Wragge's mind at the moment he saw the mysterious note. He withdrew to the window before he opened it. The first lines that attracted his attention were these: "Oblige me, Sir, by comparing the young lady who is now in your company with the personal description which follows these lines, and which has been communicated to me by a friend. You shall know the name of the person described—which is now left a blank—as soon as the evidence of your own eyes has forced you to believe, that you would refuse to credit on the unsupported testimony of Virginie Lecount."

That was enough for the captain. Before he had read a word of the description itself he knew what Mrs. Lecount had done, and felt, with a profound sense of humiliation, that his female enemy had taken him by surprise.

There was no time to think; the whole conspiracy was threatened with irrecoverable overthrow. The one resource in Captain Wragge's present situation was to act instantly on the first impulse of his own audacity. Line by line he read on—and still the ready contrivances which had never deserted him yet failed to answer the call made on it now. He came to the closing sentence—the last words which announced the two little moles on Magdalen's neck. At that overwhelming end of the description an idea crossed his mind—his parti-colored eyes twinkled; his curly lips twisted up at the corners—Wragge was himself again.

He wheeled round suddenly from the window, and looked Mr. Noel Vanstone straight in the face with a grimly-quiet suggestiveness of something serious to come.

"Pray, Sir, do you happen to know any thing of Mrs. Lecount's family?" he inquired.

"Any thing, Captain Wragge!" said Mr. Noel Vanstone—"that's all I know. Why do you ask?"

"I am not usually a betting man," pursued Captain Wragge, "but on this occasion I will lay you any wager you like there is madness in your housekeeper's family."

"Madness!" repeated Mr. Noel Vanstone, amazedly.

"Madness!" reiterated the captain, sternly tapping the note with his forefinger. "I see the cunning of insanity, the suspicion of insanity, the feline treachery of insanity in every line of this deplorable document. There is a far more serious reason than I had yet suspected for Mrs. Lecount's behavior to my niece. It is clear to me that Miss Bygrave resembles some other lady who has seriously offended your housekeeper—who has been formerly connected, perhaps, with an outbreak of insanity in your housekeeper—and who is now evidently confused with my niece in your housekeeper's wandering mind. That is my conviction, Mr. Vanstone. I may be right, or I may be wrong. All I say is this —satisfy me now any man can assign a sane motive for the production of that incomprehensible document, and for the use which you are requested to make of it."

"I don't think Lecount's mad," said Mr. Noel Vanstone, with a wavering belief in his own composed manner. "It couldn't have been with my habits of observation—it couldn't possibly have escaped me if Lecount had been mad."

"Very good, my dear Sir. In my opinion she is the subject of an insane delusion. In your opinion she is in possession of her senses, and has some mysterious motive which I cannot fathom. Either way, there can be no harm in putting Mrs. Lecount's description to the test, not only as a matter of curiosity, but for our own private satisfaction on both sides. It is of course impossible to form a guess that she is to be made the subject of such a preposterous experiment as that note of yours suggests. But you can use your own eyes, Mr. Vanstone; you can keep your own counsel; and—mad or non-sane—at least tell your housekeeper that the testimony of your own senses, that she is wrong. Let me look at the description again. The ground-work of it is not worth any straw for any purpose of identification; hundreds of young ladies have light hair, fine complexions, light brown hair, and light gray eyes. You will say, on the other hand, hundreds of young ladies have not got two little moles close together on the left side of the neck. Quite true. The moles suggest exactly what we scientific men call the Crucial Test. When any nicce comes down stairs, Sir, you have my full permission to take the like grey of looking at the neck."

Mr. Noel Vanstone expressed his high appreval of the Crucial Test by nodding and simpering for the first time that morning.

"If looking at her neck," repeated the captain; returning the note to his visitor, and thus making for the door. "I will go up stairs myself, Mr. Vanstone," he continued, "and inspect Miss Bygrave's walking dress. If she has inconsiderately placed any obstacles in your way—if her hair is a little too low, or her frill is a little too high—I will exert my authority on the first harmless pretext I can think of to have those obstacles removed. All I ask is, that you shall place your opportunity discreetly, and that you will not allow my niece to suppose that her neck is the object of a gentleman's inspection."

The moment he was out of the parlor Captain Wragge ascended the stairs at the top of his speed and knocked at Magdalen's door. She opened it to him in her walking dress—obedient to the signal agreed on between them which announced the return home.

"What have you done with your paints and jewelry?" asked the captain, in a whisper, and a word in preliminary explanations. "They were not in the box of costumes which I sold for you before your father left for India."

"I have got them here," replied Magdalen. "What can you possibly mean by wanting them now?"

"Bring them instantly into my dressing-room," said the captain, hurriedly, "and don't ask me any thing. Don't waste time in asking questions. I'll tell you what has happened in a minute. Every moment is precious to me. Follow me instantly!"

His face plainly showed that there was a serious reason for his strange proposal. Magdalen secured her collection of cosmetics, and followed him into the dressing-room. He locked the door, placed her on a chair close to the light, and then told her what had happened.

"We are on the brink of detection," proceeded the captain, carefully mixing his colors with liquid glue, and with a strong camel-hair brush from a bottle in his own possession. "There is only one chance for us. Mrs. Lecount has (on the left side of your neck)—I have told Mr. Noel Vanstone to take a private opportunity of looking at you in order to satisfy his own mind that she has devil Lecount, by painting out your moles."

"They can't be painted out," said Magdalen.

"No color will stop on them."

"My color will stop on them," said Captain Wragge. "I have tried a variety of professions in my time, the profession of painting among others. I have had a turn of it this day, as a Black Eyed Devil some months once in the neighborhood of Surbiton Lane—and I have found my flesh-color stood on bruises of all sorts, shades, and sizes—and it will stand, I promise you, on your moles."

With this assurance the captain dipped his brush into a little tray of colors, in which he had mixed a saucer, and which he had graduated, as nearly as the materials would permit, to the color of Magdalen's skin. After first passing a camphire handkerchief, with some white powder in it over the two moles, which the glue had be designed to operate, he placed two layers of color on the moles with the tip of the brush. The process was performed in a few moments—and the moles, as if by magic, disappeared from sight. Not even the closest inspection could have discovered the artifice by which they had been concealed; at the distance of two or three feet only it was perfectly successful.

"Wait here five minutes," said Captain Wragge, "to let the paint dry, and then join us in the parlor. Mr. Vanstone, my dear, account got the description which you read down stairs? Well, your side has got it now, and one has not seen the mark on my neck; it is too far back and too high. What is the next move?"

"Who knows of the mark?" asked Captain Wragge.

She turned deadly pale, under the anguish of a sudden recollection of Frank.

"My sister knows," she said, faintly.

"Mrs. Lecount may have written to your sister," suggested the captain.

"No," said Magdalen; "her letter would tell a stranger what no stranger has a right to know? Never never!"

"Is there nobody else who could tell Mrs. Lecount? The mark was mentioned in the London ball-room. Was it seen there?"

"Not Norah! Perhaps Mr. Pendril. Perhaps Miss Garth!"

"Then Mrs. Lecount has written to Mr. Pendril or Miss Garth—more likely to Miss Garth. The governess would be easier to deal with than the lawyer."

"What can we say to Miss Garth?" repeated Captain Wragge confusedly a little.

"I can't say what Mrs. Lecount may have written," she said; "you must decide for yourself. I should have written in Mrs. Lecount's place. I should have frightened Miss Garth by false report about the marks, and have got her to confess, have asked for personal particulars, to help a benevolent stranger in restoring you to your friends."

She angry glitter flashed up instantly in Magdalen's eyes.

"What you would have done is what Mrs. Lecount has done," she said, indignantly. "Neither your nor governess shall ever have a chance to my own will and my own way. If Miss Garth thinks she can control my actions by corresponding with Mrs. Lecount I will show Miss Garth she is mistaken! It is high time, Captain Wragge, to have done with underhand ways and of discovery. We will take the short way to the end. We will go ourselves to Miss Garth's house, or Miss Garth think for. How long can you give me to wring an offer of marriage out of that creature dying easy?"

"I dare not give you long," replied Captain Wragge. "Now your friends know where you are, they may come down on us at a day's notice. Could you manage in a week?"

"I'll manage it in half the time," she said, with a mad, defiant laugh. "Leave us together, Captain Wragge. I'll go and Darwick—and take Mrs. Wragge with you as an excuse for putting company. Is the paint dry yet? Go down stairs and tell Frank I am coming directly."

So, for the second time, Miss Garth's well-meant efforts defeated their own end. So the fatal force of circumstance turned that which would fain have held Magdalen back into the hand that drove her on.

The captain waited to his visitor in the parlor, after first stopping on the way to issue his orders for the walking excursion to Mrs. Wragge.

"I am shocked to have kept you waiting," he said, sitting down again confidentially by Mr. Noel Vanstone's side. "My niece declares that my niece had accidentally dressed her hair so as to defeat our object. I have been persuading her to alter it—and young ladies are not on a little obstinate on questions relating to their toilet. Give her a week on that side of you when she comes in—and take your look at her neck comfortably before we start for our walk."

Magdalen entered the room as the captain spoke—and, after the first greetings were exchanged, took the chair presented to her with the most unsuspicious readiness. Mr. Noel Vanstone applied the Crucial Test on the spot, with the full approving sanction of the fair creature who was the subject of experiment. Not the vestige of a doubt was visible on any part of the smooth white surface of Miss Bygrave's neck. It mutely answered the blinking inquiry of Mr. Noel Vanstone's dark-colored eye by the perfect theoretical contradiction of Mrs. Lecount. That one central incident in the events of the morning was one of all the incidents that had hitherto deterred the most important in its results. That same discovery which the housekeeper held on her master as nothing had shaken it yet.

In a few minutes Mrs. Wragge made her appearance at the gate on the road, surprise in Mr. Noel Vanstone's mind as he was capable of feeling, while absorbed in the contemplation of Magdalen's society. The walking-party left the house at once—directing their steps northward so as to avoid the direction of Scotch Corner.

Mrs. Wragge's unutterable astonishment her husband's first words informed her that a most married life, politely offered her his arm and led her on in advance of the young people, as if the privilege of walking alone with Miss Bygrave some special attraction to him! "Step out!" whispered the captain, fiercely. "Leave your niece and Mr. Vanstone alone! If Lecount is looking back at them I'll put the Oriental Cobra-Snake on your shoulders, and frighten her out of your toes out and keep step—confound you, keep step!" Mrs. Wragge kept step to the best of her ability, and said no more.

The walk lasted for rather more than an hour. Before nine o'clock they were all back again at the house. The ladies went up stairs—and so did the captain. Mr. Noel Vanstone remained with Captain Wragge in the garden.

"Well?" said the captain, "what do you think now of Mrs. Lecount?"

Mr. Vanstone replied Mr. Noel Vanstone, in great agitation. "I'm half inclined to agree with you. I'm half inclined to think my maternal housekeeper is mad."

He spoke fretfully and unwillingly, as if the present situation was more than he could endure in him. His color came and went; his manner was absent and undecided; he fidgeted restlessly about the garden walk. It was plain to the captain to a far less acute observation than Captain Wragge's that Magdalen had made her impression by an unexpected grace and readiness of encouragement which had entirely overthrown his self-control.

"I never enjoyed a walk so much in my life!" he exclaimed, with a sudden outburst of enthusiasm. "I hope Miss Bygrave has all the fun after for it. Do you go out at the same time to-morrow morning, Mary? I join you again!"

"By all means, Mr. Vanstone," said the captain, cordially. "Excuse me for returning to your question—but what do you propose to do to Mrs. Lecount?"

"I don't know. Lecount is a perfect nuisance! What would you do, Mr. Bygrave, if you were in my place?"

"Sir," said the captain, "you ask a question, my dear Sir, before I tell you. What is your breakfast hour?"

"Half-past nine."

"Is Mrs. Lecount an early riser?"

"No. Lecount is lazy in the morning. I hate lazy people. If you want to see her early what should you say to her?"

"I should say—pray!" replied Captain Wragge. "I should return at once by the back way; I should let Mrs. Lecount see me in the distance, as I left the house, at my customary breakfast; and I should leave her to suppose that I was only just out of my room. If she wants you, whether you mean to come here to-day, say no. Secure a quiet life, until circumstances force you to give her an opportunity of left the plain truth—say that Mr. Bygrave's niece and Mrs. Lecount's description are at variance with each other in the most important particular, and beg that the subject may not be mentioned again. There is my advice. What do you think of it?"

If Mr. Noel Vanstone could have looked into his companion's heart he might have detected the captain's advice excellently adapted to serve the captain's interests. As long as Mrs. Lecount could be kept in ignorance of her master's return to North Shingles, so long she would wait until the opportunity came for trying her experiment; and so long she might be trusted not to endanger the conspiracy by any further proceedings. Necessarily incapable of viewing Captain Wragge's advice under this aspect, Mr. Noel Vanstone simply looked at it as offering him a temporary means of escape from an explanation with his housekeeper. He eagerly declared that the course of action suggested to him should be followed to the letter, and returned to Sea View without further delay.

On this occasion Captain Wragge's anticipations were in no respect falsified by Mrs. Lecount's conduct. She had no suspicion of her master's visit to North Shingles—she had swallowed her mind, if necessary, to wait patiently for his interview with Miss Bygrave until the end of the week, and she did not embarrass him by any unexpected questions when he announced his intention of holding no private communications with the Bygraves on that day. All she said was, "Don't forget, Sir, to-morrow, Mr. Noel! or don't you feel inclined?" He answered, shortly, "I don't feel well enough;" and there the conversation ended.

The next day the proceedings of the previous morning were repeated in every detail. The time Mr. Noel Vanstone went home rapturously with a keepsake in his breast-pocket—he had taken temporary possession of one of the handkerchiefs. At intervals during the day, whenever he was alone, he took it out and fondly kissed it with a devotion which was almost passionate in its fervor. The miserable little creature luxuriated in his recollections of stolen happiness, in speeches and stealthy delight which was a new sensation to him. The few young girls whom he had met with, in his father's narrow circle at Zurich, had felt a mischievous pleasure in treating him like a grave, middle-aged man. The keenest impression he could make on their heavy mass an impression in which their leg-dogs might have rivaled him—had never been made. He could create in them was the interest they might have felt in a worm under the microscope. The only women who had hitherto invited his admiration, and taken his compliments seriously, had been women whose age was old enough to be his own, and whose chances of marriage were fast failing them. To see for the first time in his life a girl not passed hours of happiness in the society of a beautiful girl, who had left him to think of her afterward without a single humiliating remembrance to lower him in his own esteem.

Anxious as he was to hide it, the change produced in his look and manner by the new feeling awakened in him was not a change which could be concealed from Captain Wragge. On the second day she pointedly asked him whether he had not made an arrangement to call on the 5th—the fatal day, as before. "Perhaps you are going to-morrow, Mr. Noel?" exclaimed the housekeeper, with the sly zeal of his resources; he was impatient to be rid of her inquiries; he trusted to his friend at North Shingles to help him—and Mrs. Lecount was answered, Yes. "If you see the young lady," proceeded Mrs. Lecount, "don't forget that note of mine, Sir, which you have in your breast-pocket." No more was said on either side—but Mrs. Lecount's last words never were out of his mind. The letter merely acknowledged, with thanks, the receipt of Miss Garth's communication; promised to write him, in a few days, Mrs. Lecount hoped to be in a position to confirm again, and summon Mr. Pendril to Aldborough.

Late in the evening, when the parlor at North Shingles was given up to get ready for the captain rang the bell for candles as usual, he was surprised by the appearance of the servant in the passage, telling the servant to take the light down stairs again. She knocked at the door immediately afterward, and announced the obscurity of the room like a ghost.

"I have a question to ask you about your plans for to-morrow," she said. "My eyes are very weak this evening, and I hope you will not object to dispense with the candles for a few minutes."

She spoke in low stifled tones, and let her eyes wanderingly to a chair that stood from the captain, in the darkest part of the room. Sitting near the window, with the light between the dim outline of her dress, he could just hear the faint accents of her voice. For the last two days he had watched her closely, and expected during their morning walk. On that afternoon he had found his wife crying at the top of the stairs down stairs. She could only tell him that Magdalen had frightened her—that Magdalen was going to do some thing again which she hoped and dreaded, and which she knew the letter came from China, in the terrible part time at Vauxhall Walk.

"I was sorry to hear that you were ill to-day, from Mrs. Wragge," said the captain, uncomfortably, dropping his voice almost to a whisper as he spoke.

"It doesn't matter," she answered, quietly, out of her darkness. "I am strong enough to suffer and live. Other girls in my place would have been happier—but you would have suffered and died. It doesn't matter; it will be all the same a hundred years hence. Is he coming again to-morrow, or shall we go to-day?"

"He is coming, if you feel no objection to it?"

"I have no objection to any thing. I have done with objecting. But I should like to have the time altered. I don't look my best in the early morning—I don't like to be seen by the daylight and worn. Write him a note this evening and tell him to come at twelve o'clock."

"Twelve is rather late, under the circumstances, for you to be seen out walking."

"I have no intention of walking. Let him be shown into the parlor—"

Her voice died away in silence before she ended the sentence.

"Yes?" said Captain Wragge.

"And leave me alone in the parlor to receive him?"

"Ay! ay!" said the captain. "I understand. I'll be out of the way, in the dining-room, while he is here; and you can come and tell me about it when he has gone."

There was another moment of silence.

"Is there no way but telling you?" she asked, suddenly. "I cannot bring myself to write to him, but I can't answer for what I may say or do afterward. Is there no other way?"

"Plenty of ways," said the captain. "Here is the first that comes to me. Leave the blind open in the window of your room up stairs before he comes. I will go out on the beach and wait there within sight of the house. When I see him come out again I will look at the window. If he has said nothing, leave the blind down. If he has made you an offer, draw the blind up. The signal is simplicity itself; we can't misunderstand each other. Look your best to-morrow! Make sure of him, my dear girl—make sure of him, if you possibly can!"

He had spoken loud enough to feel certain that she had heard him, but no answering word came from her. The dead silence was only disturbed by the rustling of her dress, which told him she had risen from her chair. Then another pressure crossed the room again; the door shut softly—she was gone. He rang the bell himself for the lights. The servant found him standing close at the window, looking less self-possessed than usual. He told her to go to bed, be quietly, and sent her to the cupboard for the brandy.

At a few minutes before twelve the next day Captain Wragge withdrew to his post of observation, concealing himself behind a fishing-boat drawn up on the beach. Punctually as the hour struck he saw Mr. Noel Vanstone approach North Shingles, and open the garden-gate. When the house-door had closed on the visitor, the Captain Wragge settled himself comfortably against the side of the boat and lit his cigar.

He smoked for half an hour—for nearly an hour and the hour—by his watch. He finished the cigar down to the last morsel of it that he could hold in his lips. Just as he threw away the end the door opened again, and Noel Vanstone came out.

The captain looked up instantly at Magdalen's window. In the absorbing excitement of the moment he counted the seconds. She was ready from the parlor to her own room in less than a minute. He counted to thirty—and nothing happened. He counted to fifty—and still nothing happened. He gave up counting, and left the boat impatiently to return to the house.

As he took his first step forward he saw the signal.

The blind was drawn up!

Cautiously ascending the eminence of the beach, Captain Wragge looked toward the View Cottage before he showed himself on the parade. Mr. Noel Vanstone had reached home again: he was just entering his garden-gate.

"If all your money was offered me to stand in your shoes"—said the captain, looking after him —"rich as you are, I wouldn't take it!"

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC AT YORKTOWN.

On page 573 we illustrate the recent march of the Army of the Potomac through York Town from Williamsburg, en route for other fields of action. The correspondent of the Herald gives the following sketch of the march of this great army:

Some days before the contraband arrived with us their splendid march was heavy siege guns—of which, it should be borne in mind, we have but few here—with which to carry on vigorously. The division of Pennsylvania reserve troops, commanded by Major-General M'Call, was left here, and a number of ambulances, were subsequently sent by the same means of transportation. The men were prepared to march in the lightest possible order. Hence their knapsacks were carried in wagons with the baggage and camp barges, which were towed down the river by the steamers. Officers were instructed to reduce their baggage to such quantity as could be put into a small traveling-bag or valise, and to dispense with tents, for the men had been warned to convey forage and provisions. The extra tents and baggage were stored in the second floor of the houses in the transport vessels, and the men were ordered to leave behind them their little crimson flags flying from the masts, worn at the same point from which they emanated, from the general hospital at the Harrison House and the lower hospital on the peninsula, to the commander-in-chief of the army. All the sick were sent away on steamers. A large number of them were from the contraband camp. As they waited from the hospitals to the steamers. It was a touching and sympathetic sight. With their peculiar and indicative of disease, some with fists, and most with stuffs in their hands, they slowly wended their way down to the promised land. The contrabands in camp were sent away by barge, transported a distance of seventeen miles, men, women, and children, in their curious costumes, stirred by the landing or wading from the barges to the boats. At length, however, all the baggages, all the contrabands, and all the sick were sent away, and at the same time the several divisions of the army began their movements, and commenced the march toward the Chickahominy and down the peninsula.

For a distance of many miles there was only one road to travel on, the one leading from the Chickahominy to Richmond—a rope took an outside road, over Jones's bridge, to serve the passage of the other troops and their artillery, a pontoon bridge which had been thrown across near the mouth of the Chickahominy where it empties into the wide waters of the James. The train of the reserve artillery corps accompanied that of the infantry corps, and in the subsequent movement of the several corps the trains of artillery, according to the advantageous and expanded the troops of the division, arranged in the proper order of march. Each quartermaster and his assistants were ordered to keep with his train, to take it at the proper time to its appointed place in the line of march, and not to let it get in the way of any other train. Each division of troops would have on the progress of troops and trains following in his rear. The trains of the reserve artillery of the several divisions accompanied those of the divisions in the order of march. No attempt, however, was to be made to hurry down of a wagon or the halting of a team, was, on any consideration, allowed to delay the progress of the rear of the one specially afflicted; but in the few instances where such accidents occurred an escort was left with the wagon to attend to it, while the trains moved on. Quarter-masters were also required to see that bridges were not molested before starting each day, so as to engage was perfectly safe for the passage of the troops and trains in the road. While all the arrangements perfected, and the men in the best of spirits, anticipating a fight at every moment, they have experienced, the grand Army of the Potomac, covered with dust and glory, was marching down the peninsula in the direction of Fortress Monroe. The head of the column had crossed the river and proceeded many miles beyond before the last division had left the line of fortification. If the whole were seen in one continuous column it would make a line of almost fifty miles in extent. The wagon-trains alone were about twenty-six miles long, and, added to those the miles of artillery, cavalry, and infantry, and the many miles of troops, the whole grand display was in length must present a splendid column of eighty miles in length.

General Sumner's corps and Pleasanton's cavalry brought up the rear of the long line of columns of the army. They had moved out on Friday and had taken up their position near Charles City Court House, while on Saturday evening several of Franklin's corps, the last to leave the old encampments, were still on the road. They left Sumner's corps to bring up the rear. Near Charles City Court House there is a small stream which crosses the road, and then rugged and ascending country on which it was difficult for the trains to pass. General M'Clellan, with his staff, having been among the last to leave the banks of the James River, on Saturday, when arriving at this point, he took a position and drew on the scene of encampment for the night, while he dismounted from his horse, and, attended by half a dozen aids and a dozen orderlies, used his personal influence to wonderful advantage in pushing the trains and the troops forward pell-mell. He stood for hours in the water, hurrying through the trains, and, as he saw the head of the column of troops that had marched in the morning coming down the hill, he himself mounted his horse and rode on to the front. The importance of the movement was fully understood by the commander-in-chief and evidence produced. The trains and the artillery went swiftly on, while the troops were halted for the night. They remained there till eleven o'clock at night, and did not leave the spot till every wagon had safely passed that dangerous place.

FROM THE WILDS.

So my old friend recollects me, though the tide of time hath rolled
Many a long wild wave between us, since we hailed each other bold;
Yet I glory in the feeling that your love is not estranged,
That the ties which bind us here through manhood with an order all unchanged.

Dwelling in the giant city! told its shocks of worldly war, Where the storms of passion strike the bridged by human power, Turning from the siren pleasures, from the sorrow and the strife,
Still your memory loves to wander on the morning hills of life.

Golden glimpses of the glory that has hurried to past away,
As the dawn's wild hectic beauty melts into sober day.

And your thoughts are often with me, though you can not well divine
How the eventful winds of trial may have rudely shaken mine;
But my friend is unforgotten. Can he doom affection less
Where it bends a guardian spirit in the savage wilderness?

Where it reigns all undisputed, feeling naught of earth's allay
Like a fire wild thing of nature, full of light and full of joy!
Not the friendship of our boyhood hath no change nor turning known,
But still burns strong within me, leaping up to meet your own.

Could you see me here at noonday, half a satyr, half a cherub,
For my beads are hard with labor, and my cheek is dark-ened by brown;
Yet the slender youth you know me, when on shining Ex-ploits shall
We wrested the ships together, and discoursed of foreign lands,
When our arms were undecided, and the golden future seemed
All that young Imagination in her heyday ever dreamed.

You may strive for fame and win it, I can only hope to share
Such poor toil and such poor triumph as the senseless exiles bear,
Yet I know not who is better—you with dreams of fame to come,
Or myself, whose aspirations in this awful bush are dumb,
For the Kingdom of Heaven suffereth violence, and only it is said:
And our toils, though high or humble, only seek for rain at last.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For September, 1862.

The conclusion of MR. THACKERAY'S "Adventures of Philip" appears in this Number of the Magazine. The second Tale, "Lovel the Widower," by "The Author of Mad-ji," by Miss MULOCK, and "Orley Farm," by MR. TROLLOPE, will be commenced in the October No. The Tales to be issued in HARPER'S MAGAZINE, simultaneously with their publication in England.

The papers upon our "Rebellion" having been concluded, there will be commenced in the next Number a series written by the same Author upon our "Confederate and Leagues," beginning with "The New England Confederacy of 1643."

The Article in this Number upon "Iron-clad Vessels" will be followed by others, showing what progress engineers have made in the production of the materials and machines of war.

The materials in the hands of the Publishers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE for the next seven months are so valuable that a recount. Tables, Essays, and Poems; Voyages, Travels, Adventures, Sketches of the Country in the world; papers upon Natural History, Popular Science, Literature, Art, Fashion, and Manufactures—every thing that go to make up an entertaining and instructive miscellany, will embellish the pages of the MAGAZINE. The Editorial Departments will include notes and comments upon the topics of the day at home and abroad; a continuation of the current history of the time, and such anecdotes and facetiæ. Illustrations will be prepared with the utmost care they and no pains or labor or cost of the papers. Those are produced at an expense which renders it one of the cheapest Illustrated Periodicals in the country.

Apart from the monthly issue of the Magazine as a Periodical, HARPER'S MAGAZINE has from the first contained a succession of valuable and original Books, which constitute a complete set a desirable acquisition to any public or private library. For the past three years the demand has been so great that the Publishers can supply complete sets, or any separate Volume, at reasonable prices. The Twenty-five Cents they will send any Number by mail, post-paid. MAJOR-GENERAL POPE.

MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN POPE, Commander of the Army of Virginia, whose portrait we give herewith, was born in Kentucky, about the year 1822. He entered the Military Academy at West Point from Illinois in 1838, and graduated in 1842 as Second Lieutenant of Topographical Engineers. He was in the Mexican war, and at Monterey so distinguished himself that he obtained his First Lieutenancy. Again at Buena Vista he won laurels and the brevet rank of Captain. He was still a Captain when the rebellion broke out, and was one of the officers appointed by the War Department to escort President Lincoln to Washington. He was loyal, and was soon after the inauguration appointed to a command in Missouri. Bands of marauders were at that time overrunning the State, burning bridges, robbing Union men, and firing into army trains. General Pope inaugurated the plan of making each county responsible for outbreaks occurring therein. An attack having subsequently been made by the rebels on a body of Union men, General Pope assessed the damage at a given sum, ordered the county to pay it on a day fixed, and, when the county officials showed a disposition to trifle with him, seized property and produce enough to pay the amount required. He was subsequently appointed by General Halleck to the command of Central Missouri, and effected several important seizures of rebel arms and supplies, which rendered it necessary for General Price to fall back. When General Curtis was sent in pursuit of Price, General Pope was dispatched to Commerce, Missouri, where he organized with remarkable dispatch a compact army of about 13,000 men, and marched through the swamp to the rear of New Madrid. He took the place by a brilliant dash, seizing a large quantity of arms and munitions of war: then, conjointly with the mortar and gun-boat fleet, laid siege to Island No. 10. The siege might have been indefinitely prolonged but for "a transverse movement" undertaken by General Pope. He cut a canal through the swamp and bayou, through which a gun-boat and transports were sent to him from above. This enabled him to cross the river, and to bag the entire rebel army at Island No. 10. General Pope was subsequently ordered to reinforce General Halleck at Corinth. His was the first corps to enter the place after the evacuation, and he pursued the flying force of Beauregard for forty miles, capturing large stores of ammunition and a large number of prisoners.

In May last General Pope was called from the West to Washington, and placed in command of the Army of Virginia, which consisted of three corps d'armée, under Generals M'Dowell, Sigel, and Banks. On assuming the command General Pope issued the following stirring address to his army:

WASHINGTON, July 14, 1862.

TO THE OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS OF THE ARMY OF VIRGINIA.

By special assignment of the President of the United States I have assumed command of this army.

I have spent two weeks in learning your whereabouts, your condition, and your wants; in preparing you for active operations, and in placing you in positions from which you can act promptly and to the purpose.

I have come to you from the West, where we have always seen the backs of our enemies, from the rising to the setting sun. I kow how to fight victoriously, and to beat back or destroy whose policy has been attack, and not defense.

In the campaign which has opened before me I intend to pursue the same system, and to prosecute it against the enemy.

It is my purpose to do so, and that speedily.

I am sure you long for an opportunity to win the distinction you are capable of achieving. That opportunity I shall endeavor to give you.

Meanwhile, I desire you to dismiss from your minds certain phrases which I am sorry to find much in vogue among you.

I hear constantly of lines of retreat and of bases of supplies. Let us discard such ideas.

The strongest position a soldier should desire to occupy is the one from which he can most easily advance against the enemy.

Let us study the probable lines of retreat of the opponents, and leave our own to take care of themselves.

Let us look before, and not behind.

Success and glory are in the advance.

MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN POPE, COMMANDING THE ARMY OF VIRGINIA.

Disaster and shame lurk in the rear.

Let us end, on this understanding; and it is mine to predict that your banners shall be inscribed with many a glorious deed, and that your name will be dear to your countrymen forever.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General Commanding.

General Pope advanced without delay, concentrating his forces on the Rappahannock, and located his head-quarters at Warrenton, Virginia. From this point the army gradually advanced toward Richmond, the cavalry under the direction of General Hatch actively scouting and making the country too hot for spies or guerrillas. On the 9th of August the reconnoitring column crossed the Rapidan, pushed forward to Orange Court House, took possession of the town, then in the possession of the rebel cavalry under Robertson. Eleven of the rebels were killed and fifty-two taken prisoners, among whom were a major, two captains, and two lieutenants. The Union loss was but two killed and three wounded. The rebels left their wounded behind. The railroad track and telegraph line between Orange Court House and Gordonsville were destroyed. Another party shortly after destroyed Frederick Hall Station and the railroad line for several miles between Richmond and Gordonsville. On the 9th of August the famous battle of Cedar Mountain was fought by General Banks's corps of General Pope's army. The severity of the contest, and the bravery with which it was fought, are still fresh in our readers' minds. We need but allude to it. The rebels retreated under cover of the darkness of the night of the 11th, and General Pope took possession of the ground formerly held by them. General Pope followed up the battle by pursuing the rebels across the Rapidan with his cavalry and a small infantry force, occasionally engaging them. He next pushed on his whole army to the Rapidan, General Sigel's corps driving back the rebels every time they attempted to cross that river. The rebels, under General Lee, in strong force, next began to move on General Pope in front, while Jackson attempted to outflank him. He, however, managed to defeat their plans for the time by organizing a fighting retreat, during which General Sigel's corps acted brilliantly. At last, however, Jackson succeeded in getting into his rear, and Pope was surrounded. But he brilliantly released himself from the difficulty by cutting his way through the rebels and forming a junction with the Union troops in his rear.

During Pope's administration of his new department he has made himself remarkable by the energy of his movements and the determination evinced in his general orders. The rebels became so furious with him that they denounced him by general order, in which they declared that if he or any of his officers were taken prisoners, they would be treated as common felons. Instead of being cowed by such an announcement, it only added vigor to his already vigorous plans.

We publish on page 581 three illustrations from the army of Virginia, sketched by our special artist, Mr. Davenport. The following account of the skirmish at Freeman's Ford, in which General Bohlen lost his life, will be found interesting:

When the artillery attack on Sigel had lulled a little, the brave General determined to feel the rebel strength opposite his position. Accordingly he ordered General Carl Schurz to reconnoitre with his division, and, if possible, to cross the river. Schurz's division comprises two brigades, of which he took only the first, General Bohlen, for the reconnaissance. The Seventy-fourth Pennsylvania was sent over first, the men wading breast-deep through the water, holding their pieces and ammunition above their heads to keep them dry.

Schurz's crossing was unopposed. He had on up the opposite bank, and cut upon the level ground, and went more than a mile before the pickets came face to face with the enemy's. They had no choice but to form about and attack Schurz in his own position, which they did in force.

The fight on this trans-Rappahannock field was badly contested—as you may well imagine from the fact that it commenced at about 9 A. M. and lasted until 4 P. M. Our loss was not, up to 5 o'clock, when I passed that way, Sigel has put above 20 or 60 as killed and wounded. But the brave men and officers who fell, one in his sacrifice—Brigadier-General Bohlen, of Philadelphia, commanding the First Brigade, Third Division, Sigel's Army Corps, had fallen while at the head of his command he was waving his sword and cheering on his men.

"KILLED IN ACTION."

MOURN for the young, the brave!
Let the fife wail, and touch the muffled drum!
Bid soldiers, comrades, friends, around him come,
And lay him gently in a soldier's grave.

Take for his fitting pall
The grand old flag in whose defense he fell.
The glorious banner which he lived so well,
And o'er his cross now let it softly fall.

Upon the hero's breast
Lay the good sword, drawn to guard our land;
Clasp on his left each cold and stiffen'd hand,
Wrapped in his cloak, bear him unto his rest.

We lay the fallen brave
'Neath this old oak, which saw the deadly fight!
Here, too, the sun's last ling'ring glance of light
Shall shed its radiance on the soldier's grave.

Through all the coming years
The laurels on his tomb shall never fade,
But flourish there, fresh, bright, and undecayed—
Kept fair and blooming by a nation's tears!

What though no mossy stone
May mark the spot where the young soldier sleeps,
Yet o'er his humble grave a nation weeps—
A grateful country mourns her patriot son!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1862.

THE SITUATION.

THE rebels have transferred the bulk of their army to the vicinity of Manassas Junction, and the bulk of our Eastern army is there to oppose them. At the hour we write we know that four battles have been fought with no decided success on either side. Our troops, outnumbered as they are, have, however, held their own. Manassas Junction and the Heights of Centreville are ours still. We have taken a large number of prisoners, and killed a great many rebels. Our army has probably not been the same. Such is the situation at present. Possibly before these lines are read it may have changed materially.

From the moment General Halleck assumed command of the armies of the United States the progression which had been previously determined was essentially modified. That acute general and statesman realized, as soon as the whole responsibility of the war was laid on his shoulders, that if we are to win in this tremendous contest it must be through a thorough development of our numerical strength, and a concentrated exertion of our forces. He accordingly directed new levies, by volunteering and by draft, for the purpose of swelling our effective army to the unparalleled number of a million of men. He next ordered the withdrawal of the Army of the Potomac from the Peninsula, in order that it should be in a position to co-operate with the other Union soldiers in service in Virginia. Both orders have been, or are being, carried out. We have at this moment nearly or quite 700,000 men under arms, and within a month the remaining 300,000 will be awaiting arms, equipment, and transportation to the seat of war. The Army of the Potomac has been withdrawn from the Peninsula without the loss of a man or a gun. Thus far General Halleck's programme has been carried out to the letter.

Meanwhile the rebels who pretend to carry on a government under the control of Jeff Davis have realized that if the Halleck plan be fairly carried out the cause of the Slaveholders' Confederacy is utterly gone. With an energy worthy of an honest cause, and well deserving of imitation by our leaders, they no sooner ascertained that M'Clellan was evacuating the Peninsula than they threw their whole force upon the line of the Rappahannock, and perilled every thing for the sake of destroying Pope and capturing Washington. The seizure of Washington has been the day-dream of their most fiery leaders from the beginning, and there is reason to believe that nothing but the prudence of Jeff Davis has prevented the attempt being made before. Now, it seems, the hopelessness of conducting a contest against a million of armed soldiers of the Union has induced the rebel President to waive his scruples, and to adopt the programme urged upon him a year ago by Beauregard and others of his confederates.

To succeed in this new rebel enterprise the rebels must take and hold either Washington or Baltimore—it matters little which. If they take Washington, recognition by the European Powers follows as a matter of course, and a treaty offensive and defensive would probably be concluded in due order. If they take and hold Baltimore, Washington would fall in a short time, and the result would be the same. But nothing short of the accomplishment of one of these two objects could repay the shocks for the risk they are running. What is the prospect?

We have, on the south side of the Potomac, as large an army as can be manœuvred on any battle-field, largely composed of veterans who have fought on the Peninsula, and in the Shenandoah Valley. Before a rebel regiment can be safely crossed into Maryland this army must be destroyed. If Jackson, or Lee, or Hill, or Longstreet, or any other rebel commander undertakes to cross an army over the Upper Potomac into Maryland, and succeeds in storming the powerful batteries which have been erected to protect the line of that river, he will find himself, after crossing, without a base, and hopelessly isolated from support. There is no place in Maryland where he could feed his army for a week. Whatever the sympathies of the rich men of Baltimore may be, the people of that city would resist him to the death, for the simple reason that not to do so would be to insure the destruction of their beautiful city. At the moment a rebel army crosses into Maryland it will find itself in an enemy's country, with its base of supplies and its return home hopelessly cut off. With troops ready to take on the forts erected for the protection of Washington on the south side of the Potomac, from Chain Bridge to Alexandria, and with forts on the north side from Georgetown to Fort Washington, all that can be said of them is that General M'Clellan, whose ability as an engineer no one has ever questioned, pronounces them impregnable. Yet if the rebels are to succeed in their design, they must either cross into Maryland and carry on war successfully without supplies, base of operations, or line of retreat; or they must storm and carry those forts after having attacked and destroyed an army fully as strong as theirs—now lying encamped eight to ten miles in front of the Washington fortifications.

If the rebels can not do one of these two things, the battle of the Rappahannock was to no use to them whatever, though they win every one of them. Brilliant victories, duly emblazoned in the Richmond Examiner, and Baltimore will not prevent the slow and sure accumulation of national troops at and around Washington, and when they move, they will move in force. Our generals, obnoxious as they seem to be to newspaper criticism, are not such tyros in the art of war that they can not achieve substantial victories when they have twice as many men as their enemy with gun-boats and military resources in abundance. The rebel battalions must win in the end.

We stand in the crisis of the war. If the rebels can not accomplish that which they started from Richmond to do, self-preservation will compel their surrender.

ANOTHER SNEER FROM EARL RUSSELL.

A CORRESPONDENCE between Mr. Seward and Earl Russell has been published in the papers. Mr. Seward's letter, written in May, was in general terms for the Union cause in the Courts of Europe. Earl Russell's reply is a sneer at our country, our cause, our army, our civilization, and our people.

We are sorry the letters were written, and sorrier they were published. There is bad blood enough between this country and England without increasing it needlessly. It will be hard for the present generation of Americans to forget or forgive the unfair and unfriendly treatment they have endured at the hands of the English since this war broke out: the brutal bullying on the Trent affair; the constant misrepresentation of our purposes and our progress by British statesmen and British journals; the aid and comfort granted to the rebels by British merchants, manufacturers, and officials in every British colony. These just causes of angry burn irritated us enough, and there was not worth while to choose the moment of our deepest agony to shoot more barbs into our flesh. It is difficult to prove that such wrongs could possibly be served by inditing or the publication of this correspondence.

We are not a loss, for our part, to discover what Mr. Seward expected to gain by writing the dispatch to which Earl Russell's taunts are a reply. Experience should have taught him the peril of indulging in hopeful prophecy. His correspondence with our representatives abroad, which was laid before Congress in March last, and published as an official document, teems with expressions of hopes that were never realized, confident predictions that never came true, and opinions which the event seldom verified. With this warning before him, he ordered a check in the work of improving and painting our history rose-color, argued more rashness than we would have imputed to our experienced Secretary of State, and again, what can we gain by letting Europe know how right we think we are, and how sure we feel of success? Does Mr. Seward suppose that the Government and people of England are to be swayed by reasoning, or by considerations of right and wrong in this case? We do not. What is the only man in the country who does so. All the rest of us were long since satisfied that England has neither had any sense of right in our war than to see the United States divided—a great nation weakened, and a manufacturing and commercial rival crippled. This has been the clew to her policy all along. There has never been any other. Right and wrong, slavery and freedom, justice and injustice, even free trade and protection—have never had any weight in determining her action. British statesmen and the British people have never pretended to much from the great object on which they had set their heart from the first, which was to secure the division of the Union. Mr. Roebuck confesses the fact in his crude, blunt way. Under these circumstances could any thing be sillier than to hope to change the policy of England by arguments founded on abstract justice, or honesty, or good feeling? As reasonable would it be to preach morality to a burglar with his hand in your strong box.

We hope we have seen the last of these appeals to the honesty or the pity of Europe. They only get us laughed at, and afford a miserable encouragement to Earl Russell on opportunity of sneering at our misfortunes. The work we have got to do we must do ourselves, and we should long ere now have made up our minds that we may as well ask Jeff Davis for aid or sympathy as England.

THE LOUNGER.

THE PRESIDENT'S POLICY.

THE letter of the President to Mr. Greeley was editorially discussed in these columns last week, but it bears further consideration. It is a perfectly distinct statement of his position. He says that he is the Chief Magistrate of the Union; that he is sworn to maintain it; and that he means to maintain it at any price. But what exact price must be paid he says that he must determine. He will take every step, including emancipation, as fast as it shall seem to him necessary. But he implies that he will not consider emancipation a measure necessary to suppress the rebellion merely because it is a good measure in itself, or because it would please all men free. The object of the war is the preservation of the Government. Emancipation must be only an episode—it can not be the purpose of the war.

Will any sensible man quarrel with this position? Will any one deny that, under the actual circumstances of the country, it would have been wise and proper for the President to have proclaimed emancipation on the day after the fall of Sumter? Or, again, will any sensible man say that if the Government can not be saved without emancipation it must be destroyed?

The critical point is to determine when the decree of emancipation is a necessary measure. It is clear that it can not be truly effective until it is supported by public opinion. It is equally clear that the mere declaration would not create that opinion. "The darkest hour," of which Mr. Conway so earnestly and impetuously writes, is not the hour in which war gives the President command of all the resources, but that in which the love of the Union and the Government is strongest in the hearts of the nation than party spirit, or the antipathies of race, or the prejudices of ignorance and passion. For it is precisely upon this point that the whole issue of the struggle at the time must be determined by a sagacious apprehension of the national feeling.

The great failure of the people would respond to a great act of emancipation because they ought to respond, has been that we have not sufficiently studied the public mind during the war but must be very sure that nothing required more delicate consideration than the very proclamation by the war itself seemed to settle beyond dispute. Nor is it easy, but it is extremely important, that any great measure should be premature. If indeed he declare that no measure like this can be premature, he is insane. But he is not reasonable.

Knowing perfectly well, then, that the President faithfully believes what he considers to be the national wish in the prosecution of this war—knowing equally well that he is a humane and honorable man—we are to be sure to wait only through him, not over him, what is our duty?

Surely, it is to create that public opinion. It is to show that, as the war spreads in its misery, no peace is impossible while slavery lasts; to show that slavery is the cause of the war, the necessary sacrifice, and that to make war upon the rebellion, and to spare slavery, is to fight with blank cartridges and with the sword sheathed.

But how, you ask—how if that perception comes too late? Why, if it does come too late we are lost. But it will not be the fault of the President. It will be the fatal consequence of the long dominance of slavery, which will have controlled the national common-sense as well as have corrupted the public conscience.

"How," the President might ask in turn—"how if I declare emancipation before the nation believes it to be necessary? Will it, in fact, be necessary? If it should, all is well. If it should not, should I not be responsible for the slaves if I had lost the support of the nation?"

"But the people would support you, Sir."

"Yes," he might answer, "you think so sincerely. When I think so, and I invite you to perish, I am a murderer, you say."

Emancipation, to be the effectual measure that we believe, must be actually decreed by the national will—merely from exhaustion, if from no other. And let us be patient, for this nation is not to perish. It has learned in a year and a quarter a half what would have been a gain for half a century in ordinary times.

Meanwhile it is the duty of the President to go quite as fast as the people. When Congress passes a law especially urging upon the President's choice he is to take peculiar care that every military and civil officer is apprised of it, and he is to be very sure that it is obeyed. He is to show under the magistrate who impartially does his duty the man who does it with glad alacrity when it forces human liberty. He is not to pretend an impartiality, which no honest man feels, between justice and injustice. While he waits to hear what the people wish, he is to show that his heart leaps with joy when they wish right. He is to inform the world that the Chief Magistrate of the Union is never so happy as when enforcing laws that tend to the lowest and most hapless of his fellow-men, and whisper to them, "Friends, come up higher!"

If this be the President's position, the conviction of the people will not sweep him anywhere. It will freshen a dam; it will only waft him to port, or winnow blow the wayward chip laden with priceless treasure.

BRITISH FRIENDSHIP.

LORD ROSSLYN, the British Foreign Secretary, has written a letter to the British Minister at Washington in reply to a dispatch of Mr. Seward's. The tone and the expressions of the letter are alike insulting. The whole thing is flippant, a patch unnoticed for a month, and, when he affects an answer, entirely evades the point of it.

Lord Russell says that the British Government wishes heartily to see, in the words of the President, an end of all this unnecessary and injurious civil war. The President of the United States, when he uses that expression, means evidently one thing. Lord Russell as evidently means another. By the means to insinuate, as any candid reader of his note will see, that it is an unnecessary war upon the part of both "belligerents." The President means that it is an unnecessary rebellion, because every change in our policy can be peacefully and constitutionally secured, if the people wish it. Lord Russell says, in effect and openly, that the British Government has at heart nothing more than to see the injurious and unnecessary attempt of the United States Government to maintain itself brought to a speedy and satisfactory conclusion.

Judged by the context of his note, what would that satisfactory conclusion be? Could it be anything but the defeat of the purposes of the Government? When he, a foreigner, calls our war unnecessary, he includes both parties to it in his condemnation. What is the cause of such an expression in his mouth?

Lord Russell is an English Whig. Does he think the Revolution of '88 an unnecessary war? Does he think the Great Rebellion of 1640 costly? Does he think the campaign of 1714 against the Pretender an unnecessary war of the British Government to defend itself against a rebellion? In April, 1848, if the Chartists had appeared in London, the Earl Of Clanricarde had called upon the Queen to surrender her throne because she was he wanted, would Lord John Russell have stigmatized her efforts as consequent war as injurious and unnecessary?

Again, Lord Russell says that "since the beginning of the war" Her Majesty's Government have pursued a friendly, open, and consistent course." That is new. When a successful insult had been made upon an exposed and starving garrison of United States soldiers by an armed and uniformed populace—but it was then the Government that was on emissader of the United States, specially instructed, was the first to run in the way to Boston, was it "friendly and open" in the British Government, refusing to wait and hear what he might explain, to declare to the friendly Government of the United States and its domestic enemies equal belligerents?

When, in December last, news reached England of the Trent seizure, and the mind of the country was so inflamed against us that there was no chance our reckless insult to the British flag, which was plainly provoked, to be authorized by the United States Government, was the conduct "friendly and open" for the British Prime Minister to hide in his closet an authorization for the destruction of the Government of intent to insult, and to hold his tongue for a fortnight while the popular misapprehension which his studied reserve had created was fanned into war? It was "consistent" with the friendly and open policy of mere hostility and prejudice which distinguishes the British foreign policy, but was it "friendly?" was it "open?"

Lord Russell's letter of the Foreign Secretary—telling the war which the Government could not restrain without incurring the charge of treason, "serious and unnecessary;" scoffing at the "less blockade," and, in its last sentence, sneering at the expression of sympathetic speeches—is this friendly illustration of the openness and friendliness of the British Government?

These are not new things to say, but the babble of British impartiality in this war is so constantly repeated by British writers and speakers, and so constantly pricked by American pens and tongues, or somebody may seriously suppose there is something in it.

"PEACE."

OF course no honest man is deceived by such a "Union" meeting as that lately held in Philadelphia. Its objects are plain to the leaders of the conspirators. "If you will only hold out longenough, we will try hard to divide the North upon the cry of 'conservatism,' and then we can make you an easy victory over the Government, and you will surrender your friends."

The meeting was intended to secure the surrender of the country to the rebellion; to make it appear that the true enemies of the national peace were not the rebels in arms, but those who demand that the Government shall be saved at all cost. To declare that Vallandigham and Wickliffe are the model patriots, and the Administration, the lately and unanimously elected President, and the loyal citizens of the country are incendiaries, fanatics, and traitors.

The meeting was a miserable failure. It failed in every way. It failed in numbers, in enthusiasm, in eloquence. The aim of Mr. Ingersoll—a rich citizen of Philadelphia—was to excite the hatred of one class of the poorer citizens against another. It was a lofty aim. It was a "conservative" strain! It was a manly conduct!

Every meeting, every where, which seeks to palliate the enormous crime of this rebellion by accusing those who oppose the rebels, is simply as treasonable as assembly in Jeff Davis's Congress. There is not a man who enters into such meetings earnestly who does not sympathize more sincerely with the rebel, than with the national, Congress. He does not openly denounce the Government, for he has learned that that is not a safe business, but he angrily denounces all who are for maintaining it at every cost. The real enemies of the Union, he insists, are those who are resolved to save it. Let us hang those, he cries, who are for preserving the Union any how, and all will be serene.

So it will; perfectly serene for the men who assert that they are our natural masters: who murder our bravest and best, and torture those whom they do not kill; who are bent upon destroying our peace and prosperity if they can not use us for their own purposes. Let the people who are struggling for all that is precious to men or nations spew out these politicians, who are trying to do the dirty work of the rebellion in the very heart of our camp. Let them be made to understand that the people of this country mean to save their Government at any cost, and if that cost shall include justice to an outraged class, they will be only the more religiously resolved.

And whether Jeff Davis remembers his friends or not after the desperate and terrible war is over and every household in the land sits among its ruins and counts its loved and honored and lost, the people of this country will remember in that hour with dreadful distinctness the men who now, in the midst of peril and upon the very battle-field, are trying to stab their country and help its enemies.

THE VIEWS OF SOME GENERALS.

It is most creditable to Generals Sickles, Meagher, and Corcoran—all of whom have proved themselves brave soldiers—that in their speeches for the war they heartily denounce the attempt to dissuade enlistments by the cry of abolitionism. They say distinctly, what for their future it is to be hoped they see as clearly, that at this moment there are no parties whatever except true men and traitors. There is the party for the war, and the party against it. Those who are constantly shouting that the abolitionists ought to be hung belong to the party that Jeff Davis loves. General Corcoran puts it well when he says that he does not ask whether the man at his side is an abolitionist or a pro-slavery man, so long as he stands firmly shoulder to shoulder, and strikes straight for the Union.

Let us settle that we have a Union, and then determine what party we belong to. And to that settlement let nothing impede our way. Neither of the Generals that we name are "abolitionists," as the word has been used, and they are not known as anti-slavery men. They may even believe it practicable to save the Union and leave slavery unharmed. But that they would let the Union slide rather than slavery we do not believe; and that they will presently see that effectually to end the war the slave system must be suppressed we do not doubt.

General Cochrane and General Busteed have already said what they think of the question. The latter, with acute humor, declares that he does not see that if his blood is not too good and precious to be shed for the Government why a black man's is. He does not believe that the lives of colored people are any more valuable than those of other people; nor does he see why white men should go as substitutes for black ones.

General Sickles, in his Brooklyn speech and elsewhere, mentions the folly of supposing that the liberation of slaves would bring them to the North. He says, what every sensible person sees to be true, that it would be the very thing to keep them at home, because then they would have a fair chance.

General Spinola declares that he thinks white men better fight and colored men dig. But he says that if the rebels lose their slaves they have only themselves to thank for it.

If, then, we can help our brave fellows in the field, and at once shorten their service and the war by disorganizing the labor, the lines, and the life, of the rebels, we do not believe one of these Generals would insist upon keeping them strengthened. For they are Generals not only because they wish to serve their country, but because they are shrewd men and understand the necessities of things.

REPRESSING THE PRESS.

General Halleck does not show himself less worthy the public confidence because he forbids correspondents in camp. While we are compelled to make war let us do it in a warlike way. Let us have secrecy of movement, and if it can not be absolute, let us be as secret as we can. General Halleck is said to be a man who does not care for any body's criticism or opposition. Such a statement is probably an extravagant manner of expressing a most desirable quality of character.

One thing, of course, he will not forget. The people have a right to know the current course of affairs, and the authorities have no right to change or cook the truth. When, therefore, the Government undertakes to supply us with information, it must do it. After Ball's Bluff the Government was apparently guilty of tampering with the nation: that is to say, it had control of the telegraph and it did not tell the truth. We had been bitterly and simply routed, and the news came to us as a success even, then a masterly falling back. If the authorities were themselves misinformed, there was no offense on their part, but they should never have been again misinformed by those officers at least.

So the retreat of M'Clellan upon the Peninsula was first announced as a great movement which was sure to secure Richmond. Exactly what that movement was is now evident to the blindest prejudice. If it were represented to the Government as other than a retreat, the Government should take care never to be deceived by the same persons again.

Some newspapers assume that the Government stops correspondence, from the conviction that the people are children and cowards who can not bear to hear the truth. On the contrary, the Government treats us like men who understand that war has the most rigid necessities, and who can wait until the issue of a movement before we hear all the details. We greatly mistake General Halleck if he is going to suffer any falsehoods or glosses to be telegraphed. He alone, if the Generals in the field are faithful, knows, from hour to hour, the fortune of the day. He alone can tell us at the earliest moment the comprehensive result. It would be the height of folly in him to excite the public with every account he receives. On the other hand, it would be downright madness to conceal any important event.

But why should we presuppose him to be a fool? He is a citizen precisely as we are. He understands the peculiar impatience and the actual rights of the public quite as accurately as we. Let us candidly try him. Let us see if he is demented by his position. Thus far he certainly does not seem to be. When he does, let us not hold our tongues.

THE QUAKERS AND THE WAR.

The Legislature of Rhode Island lately debated a proposition not to exempt Quakers from military duty. The ground of those who wished that they should serve like other citizens was that the Quakers enjoyed all the benefits of the Government, sued in the courts, and shared a protection which rested at last upon the bayonet; and that consequently to release them from the duty of supporting that Government, in the last resort, was to be guilty of class legislation.

The reply to this was, that non-resistance was a tenet of the sect, and that to compel them to fight was to interfere with that religious liberty and equal respect of sects which the fundamental law guarantees.

The proposition was lost by a heavy majority.

Yet the ground of the defense seems to be unsound. To excuse the Quakers, as a religious sect, from duties which are imposed upon all other sects, is evidently a very unequal respect for sects. The only true ground of excuse should be not that a man is a Quaker, but that he is a non-resistant. For by what just law can a non-resistant Quaker be excused from military service, and a non-resistant Baptist or Methodist compelled to serve? Suppose that a new sect should appear with a new tenet of non-resistance, to the effect that governments should be supported by voluntary contributions, should the members of the sect be excused from taxation? And if the members of the sect, then why not all citizens who hold similar opinions?

Unless, therefore, all persons who conscientiously object to fighting are to be released from military duty, there is no good reason why any of them should be.

The law in regard to the exemption of Quakers is of no great importance in itself, because they are not a large class, and because many of them practically disregard it, and are as gallant soldiers as any in the field. But the principle of the law is very important. It favors one sect. It discriminates between equal citizens. It is really a law of privilege, and ought to be repealed. Then if it shall be thought wise to excuse all citizens who have true conscientious scruples against fighting, let a law be made to secure their release.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ARMY OF VIRGINIA—THE REBELS AT MANASSAS.

On the evening of 26th the enemy's cavalry appeared at Manassas Station. The troops engaged numbered, according to all accounts, nearly two thousand men, and were a portion of Colonel Fitzhugh Lee's forces, which made the attack on Catlett's Station a few days previous. The attack appears to have been first made on a train of cars at Bristow, about four and a half miles west of Manassas; but the train, putting on extra speed, escaped. The rebel cavalry then made a dash on Manassas, where they were partially checked by the Eleventh New York battery. The resistance, though gallant, was ineffectual, and the rebels destroyed every thing within their reach—the railroad track, the cars, the telegraph wires, and all the Government stores and buildings. The place appeared to have been undefended, save by three or four companies of infantry and the single battery of undisciplined troops, who were unable to make any defense.

THEY ARE DRIVEN BACK.

The following dispatch from General Pope explains the course he pursued:

Manassas Junction, August 28—10 P.M.

To Major-General H. W. Halleck, General-in-Chief:

As soon as I discovered that a large force of the enemy was turning our right, toward Manassas, and that the division I had ordered to take post there two days before had not yet arrived from Alexandria, I immediately broke up my camp at Warrenton Junction and Warrenton, and marched rapidly back in three columns.

I directed M'Dowell, with his own and Sigel's corps, to march upon Gainesville by the Warrenton and Alexandria pike; Reno and one division of Heintzelman to march on Greenwich; and, with Porter's corps and Hooker's division, I marched back to Manassas Junction.

M'Dowell was ordered to interpose between the forces of the enemy which had passed down to Manassas, through Gainesville, and his main body, moving down from White Plains through Thoroughfare Gap. This was completely accomplished, Longstreet, who had passed through the Gap, being driven back to the west side.

The forces to Greenwich were designed to support M'Dowell in case he met too large a force of the enemy. The division of Hooker, marching toward Manassas, came upon the enemy near Kettle Run on the afternoon of the 27th, and, after a sharp action, routed them completely, killing and wounding three hundred, capturing camps and baggage and many stand of arms.

This morning the command pushed rapidly to Manassas Junction, which Jackson had evacuated three hours in advance. He retreated by Centreville, and took the turnpike toward Warrenton. He was met six miles west of Centreville by M'Dowell and Sigel late this afternoon. A severe fight took place, which was terminated by darkness. The enemy was driven back at all points, and thus the affair rests.

Heintzelman's corps will move on him at daylight from Centreville, and I do not see how the enemy is to escape without heavy loss. We have captured one thousand prisoners, many arms, and one piece of artillery.

John Pope, Major-General.

THE SECOND BATTLE OF BULL RUN.

The following dispatch explains itself:

Head-quarters, Field of Battle,
Groveton, near Gainesville, August 30, 1862.

To Major-General Halleck, Commander-in-Chief, Washington, D. C.:

We fought a terrific battle here yesterday with the combined forces of the enemy, which lasted with continuous fury from daylight until after dark, by which time the enemy was driven from the field, which we now occupy.

Our troops are too much exhausted to push matters; but I shall do so in the course of the morning, as soon as Fitz John Porter's corps comes up from Manassas.

The enemy is still in our front, but badly used up.

We have lost not less than 8000 men killed and wounded, and, from the appearance of the field, the enemy have lost at least two to our one. He stood strictly on the defensive, and every attack was made by ourselves.

Our troops have behaved splendidly.

The battle was fought on the identical battle-field of Bull Run, which greatly increased the enthusiasm of our men.

The news just reaches us from the front that the enemy is retreating toward the mountains. I go forward at once to see.

We have made great captures; but I am not able yet to form an idea of their extent.

John Pope,
Major-General Commanding.

ANOTHER BATTLE ON 30TH.

The fighting was renewed on Saturday between General Pope and the enemy, who had been considerably reinforced. The battle was a severe one, the rebels gaining the advantage and compelling General Pope to fall back to Centreville, which he did in good order. Franklin's corps reached him at this point on Saturday evening, and General Sumner's division was rapidly marching up to join him. He was expected to make another assault on the enemy on 31st, with the fresh troops thus added to his army, but there was very little fighting on that day, not more than an occasional skirmish. The army was in fine condition and good spirits. The position of General Pope is represented as the strongest in the vicinity of Washington. Rebel scouts have penetrated as far as Langley's station, in the vicinity of the Chain Bridge; but it is said that all necessary precautions have been taken to prevent a surprise of the capital in that direction.

PRESENT SITUATION.

At the time we write (noon on September 2), the Army of Virginia, reinforced by the bulk of the Army of the Potomac and other troops in considerable numbers, lies intrenched on the heights of Centreville. General Banks is understood to be at Manassas Junction. The rebels made no attack on 31st August or 1st September, and appear to be waiting for Pope to make the next move in the game. M'Clellan is at Alexandria, in command of some remains of his army. Burnside is at Aquia Creek, having just evacuated Fredericksburg. Troops are pouring into Washington at the rate of several thousand a day.

DESTRUCTION OF CITY POINT.

The rebel rendezvous at City Point was completely demolished on Thursday last by the gun-boats of Commodore Wilkes. It appears that for some time past the enemy had been harassing our transports, and Commodore Wilkes sent them word that if they did not desist he would shell them out. The response to this threat was a further reinforcement of riflemen and cannon and a more brisk fire upon our flotilla. The gun-boats then proceeded to carry out Commodore Wilkes's announcement, and finally demolished every building at City Point and drove the rebels clear out of their strong-hold.

A DEFEAT IN KENTUCKY.

The rebels, 1800 strong, under Morgan, came into collision with General Johnson, near Gallatin, on the 21st, and compelled his force of 700 men to surrender. General Johnson and staff were kindly treated by the rebel chief, and released on parole. The Union loss was twenty-six killed, including Lieutenant Wynkoop, of the Seventh Pennsylvania cavalry, and two other officers, and thirty-three wounded. The rebel loss, including several officers, was thirteen killed and fifty wounded.

ANOTHER.

The following telegram is published:

Cincinnati, August 31, 1862.

On Friday afternoon the rebels beyond Richmond, Kentucky, drove in our cavalry. General Manson, with the Sixty-ninth and Seventy-first Indiana, moved up, and after throwing a few shells the enemy retreated rapidly beyond Rogersville, leaving one gun behind. Manson bivouacked for the night, and on Saturday morning advanced with two regiments and four guns, and coming up with the enemy, an artillery fight began, with heavy loss on both sides. The enemy attempted to turn our left flank, when sharp fighting occurred between the skirmishers. The Sixty-ninth Indiana advanced through a dense fire of shot and shell to the relief of our skirmishers, and behaved like old soldiers; but the rebels finally turned our left flank and advanced in full force on our column. General Manson ordered a retreat, fell back three miles, and re-formed in line of battle on high hills, with artillery in position on the right and left flanks.

The firing by artillery was recommenced and kept up by both sides very briskly. After fighting about two hours the enemy advanced on our right flank, under cover of the woods, and after severe fighting succeeded in turning it. Retreat immediately took place to the original camping ground. Here General Nelson came up, and, after great efforts, succeeded in rallying the men, and formed another line of battle. Our artillery ammunition was nearly exhausted, and some of the guns were left without a man to work them, all having been killed or wounded.

General Nelson was wounded at about three P.M., when the men again fell back, retreating to Lexington. The enemy's forces numbered 15,000 or 20,000. The Union forces engaged were the Ninety-fifth Ohio, Twelfth, Sixteenth, Sixty-sixth, Sixty-ninth, and Seventy-first Indiana, Mundy's and Metcalf's cavalry. The loss in killed and wounded is heavy on both sides. The number is not yet known.

Lieutenant-Colonel Topping and Major Kunkle, of the Seventy-first Indiana, were killed. General Wright left this morning to take the field. General Wallace leaves to-night to join him. A large number of regiments are en route to Lexington.

A battle took place on Saturday near Richmond, Kentucky, lasting from morning till four in the afternoon, resulting in our troops being driven back with serious loss. No particulars are received.

General Nelson, wounded, arrived here to-night.

Lexington has been evacuated, and the State archives removed to Louisville. The entire male population of Kentucky has been called to arms.

ATTACK ON FORT DONELSON.

Fort Donelson has been attacked by the rebels, who were defeated. They numbered 450 infantry, 335 cavalry, and two field-pieces, and were commanded by Colonel Woodward. The fort was gallantly defended by Major Hart, with four companies of the Seventy-first Ohio Regiment.

THE COMMAND IN VIRGINIA.

The question of the command of the armies operating in Virginia is definitely settled by an official bulletin. General Burnside commands his own corps, except those which have been temporarily detached and assigned to General Pope. General M'Clellan commands that portion of the Army of the Potomac which has not been sent forward to General Pope's command. General Pope commands the Army of Virginia, and all the forces temporarily attached to it, and General Halleck commands the whole.

REBEL PRISONERS ARRIVING.

About a thousand rebel prisoners reached Washington on 31st from the great battle-field, representing, the correspondents say, nearly all the rebel States.

A REBEL STEAMER SEIZED.

Commander Davis telegraphs to the Secretary of the Navy, from Helena, Arkansas, that a naval and military expedition down the river succeeded in capturing a rebel steamer, loaded with Enfield rifles and ammunition; burned a railroad dépôt and telegraph station, thus cutting off all communication between Vicksburg and Little Rock; and then, entering the Yazoo River, destroyed a rebel battery and broke up several camps of the enemy.

REBEL FURY.

A special order from the rebel War Department declares Generals Hunter and Phelps outlaws, who, if captured, will meet the death of felons.

EVACUATION OF BATON ROUGE.

Our forces are preparing to evacuate Baton Rouge, and to establish the State Government at New Orleans, under Governor Shepley. Enthusiastic Union meetings have taken place in the latter city.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

BRITISH SPITE.

EARL RUSSELL TO THE HON. WILLIAM STUART.

Foreign Office, London, July 28, 1862.

Sir,—I have left hitherto unanswered and unnoticed the dispatch of Mr. Seward, which Mr. Adams delivered more than a month ago. I have done so partly because the military events referred to in it were, in the opinion of her Majesty's Government, far from being decisive, and partly because there was no proposal in it upon which her Majesty's Government were called upon to come to any conclusion.

Events subsequent to the date of Mr. Seward's letter have shown that her Majesty's Government, in their opinion upon the first of these points, were not mistaken.

Victories have been gained and reverses have followed; positions have been reached in the near neighborhood of the capital of the Confederates, and these positions have been again abandoned.

These events have been accompanied by great loss of life in battle and in the hospital, while such measures as the Confiscation bill have passed through both Houses of Congress, and, with the proclamation of General Butler at New Orleans, bear evidence of the increasing bitterness of the strife.

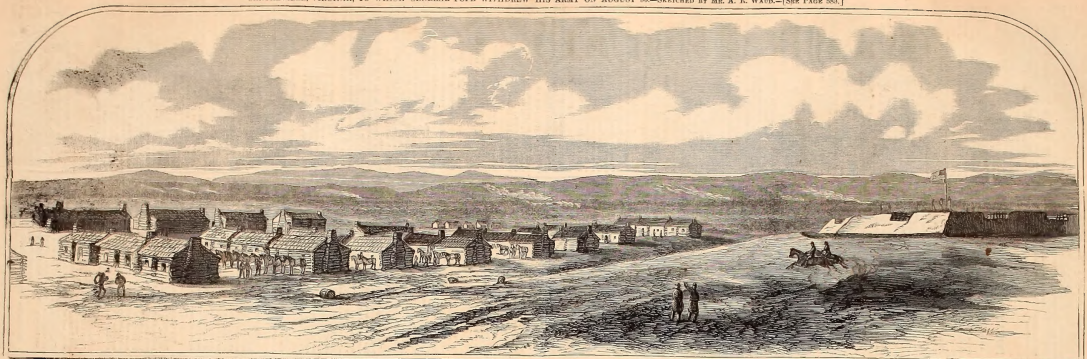
The approach of a servile war, so much insisted upon by Mr. Seward in his dispatch, only forewarns us that another element of destruction may be added to the loss of property and waste of industry which already afflict a country so lately prosperous and tranquil.

Nor, on the other point I have adverted to, have I any thing new to say. From the moment that intelligence first reached this country that nine States and several millions of inhabitants of the great American Union had seceded, and had made war on the Government of President Lincoln, down to the present time, her Majesty's Government have pursued a friendly, open, and consistent course. They have been neutral between the two parties to a civil war.

Neither the loss of raw material of manufacture, so necessary to a great portion of our people, nor insults constantly heaped upon the British name in speeches and newspapers; nor a rigor, beyond the usual practice of nations, with which the Queen's subjects, attempting to break loose from the blockade of the Southern ports, have been treated, have induced her Majesty's Government to swerve an inch from an impartial neutrality.

At this moment they have nothing more at heart than to see that consummation which the President speaks of in his answer to the Governors of eighteen States—namely, "the bringing of this unnecessary and injurious civil war to a speedy and satisfactory conclusion."

As to the course of opinion in this country, the President is aware that perfect freedom to comment upon all public events is, in this country, the invariable practice, sanctioned by law and approved by the universal sense of the nation. I am, etc.,



Russell.

ITALY.

GARIBALDI AT WORK.

At latest dates Garibaldi was still moving in the path of revolution. He had made a descent on Catania, in Sicily, in opposition to the wishes of the Italian Government. The subject having been brought up in the Senate, the Prime Minister of Italy said they considered Garibaldi "in rebellion," and that his operations would be checked by the King's troops and navy. Napoleon had expressed his disapproval of the acts of the "liberator," but hinted that Victor Emanuel encourages him.

HE DID HIS DUTY.

Come, bear him to his resting-place
With still and solemn tread.
No crown of laurel shall be placed
Above his youthful head,
No words of praise upon his tomb
To speak of how he fell—
Only the honest epitaph,
"He did his duty well."

Come near and gaze upon the dead
Ere laid beneath the dust;
Gaze on the calm and settled face
With still and solemn trust.
Look on him! let your grief be still,
And do not mourn as they
Who mourn a youthful spirit cut,
Or birth-right cast away.

How might a mother's heart rejoice
To know amid the brave
Her son, the brightest and the best,
Had found his early grave;
Amid the foremost ranks had fought,
With bold and fearless eye,
And felt within his noble heart
"Twas home else to die.

Then bear him to his resting-place
With still and solemn tread;
No crown of laurel shall be placed
Upon his youthful head,
No words of praise on his tomb
To speak of how he fell—
Only the honest epitaph,
"He did his duty well."

WAITING.

"I SAY shamed through all my being to have loved a night a thing."

Fanny Marvin started, shrank away, and from behind her little sparkled fan looked nervously about her. But, Grundy was not lurking, or she was swearing, or else she was maneuvering, or, perhaps, she was eating; at any rate, she had not heard the fierce, sagrey whisper. The swaying, voluptuous music was going on, the camelias near them didn't bleed, or the rose pale, only the dark fire in Captain Heriot's eyes gave the lie to the conventional smile on their lips.

John Heriot, following the impulse of the natural heart, had been ideal-worshipping; had enthroned and invested with all his new-found fancy and fire, like the Israelites of old, received as his wages confusion of face. It was only an additional phase of the old experience, going on ever since the unsophisticated days when altars smoked to dead, cold, and still marble: and when we make temples of heart and brain, and worship principles and passions instead, we can't afford to smile back through the misty eyes at the Olympian deity; for a nightmare low ordains that all worship addressed to any other than God must be given to unwholesome and ghastly Heriot found it. Any one could have told him that Fanny Marvin was not purity, tenderness, womanliness—in a word, only such pure and wonderlovely hair and shifting color, and a rare taste in dress. Hardly the component parts of Captain Heriot's ideal wife! Sallow, flat-chested, somewhat unguicious Esther Graham was, if he had known it, far nearer his ideal—only it is hard to believe that deep, clear eyes do not always mirror deep, pure thoughts; and so Fanny Marvin might have been Mrs. Heriot, and John's evil genius, but for the providential circumstance of young Tasden Dodge and his half million. Captain Heriot would have endured neither rivalry nor hesitating preference. He flamed out in reproaches, against Fanny. She left her finally with the bitter quotation that heads this idle story, and went back to his regiment before his fickleness had half expired, very poor indeed—polished all trust.

One woman had deceived him, another never should. They were all alike. Faith was a myth. Loyalty and honor (feminine) a poetic fiction. A little pained ivory that he had worn about him on his heart he broke up with a scornful laughter that was worse than tears; the only legitimate fruitless notes he held to the flame and watched shrivel into dust with grim satisfaction. His diamond had proved a pebble, therefore there were no diamonds.

Houses, on the average, are the exponents of those who own them; so many stone embodiments of the owners, the pet idiosyncrasies (as does in New York conscientiously excepted, tents being, in the writer's opinion, the only legitimate expression of nottopolitan life). The house of the widow Hericot was very like herself. It spoke principally of the times when Guy, first duke of Normandy, came to Virginia, bringing the very bricks of which it was built in a young wife, a handful of titles, and a family tree, that was of course a nephew of the time of William the Conqueror. It settled solidly down amongst the trees, like a house that considered itself an institution and knew nothing of the first of May. It spread itself out in colonial, lazy style; it ran to piazzas in the most unlimited way. It opened a huge door and a broad hall, like a generous heart: it had the traditional wide staircases and deep-set windows. Every where were cool, dark woods, panelled walls, waxed floors, with nothing bright about it except the conservatory, and Faith, only grandchild of Mrs. Ellicott. A little Birds manikin delighting in soft bright colors, pansy-leaf purples, mid-summer blues, even venturing on scarlet and unclad busts; pale yellows to subtle ness, lost with a perilous power of lighting up and glowing with an inner diamond-like light, soft abundant hair, and one real beauty, brown eyes, tender and deep in expression, shaded by long lashes, overarched by perfect brows, a quiet, intensive face, but—"Not in the least like the family, child," her proud old grandmother was used to say—"only you have the little arched foot, and the rosy nails and pulses that are always the marks of a true Ellicott;" and Faith would look up at the hundred-year-old portrait of a blue-eyed, fair-haired Faith on the library wall with a curious look, as if she had never benefit dimmed by the more patent beauty of her ancestress.

There was another characteristic of the Ellicotts. An intensity of will and tenacity of opinion, which Faith showed in common with them, as in an underarched foot and rosy palms, though as yet developed only in vitalizing people whom Mrs. Grundy didn't delight to honor—an unwavering reference to the Stars and Stripes, and the utterance of much treason. (See dictionaries south of Mason and Dixon's line.)

She was quite ready, this little Faith of ours, to brave at once the world and the above-mentioned fashionable female—not with that calm contempt that knows both their worth and worthlessness, but the ignorance that knows neither.

Society, which couldn't quite ostracize an Ellicott, and which Mrs. Ellicott "to come in as understanding" with her refractory grandchild, "as if one could come to an understanding with a buttercup!" or a moonlight thought the stately lady, watching Faith taking a stitch or two at her embroidery frame, flashing out in some light little ballad, whirling round and round the room humming a wild waltz measure, and then flinging herself down amidst the cushions to laugh and kiss Nods Blitzerose, her little golden-haired cousin.

"Oleon said I'll tell you something if you'll be said gleeful Faith. But the little one, putting out a dimpled hand as if to keep her off, lisped solemnly,

"Are you very wicked, Cousin Faith?"

"I don't know, Nods; how could that idiot creep under that little golden thatch of yours? Did you get lost in some of those big books of ours, when nurse Bells combed your hair this morning?"

Nonsense told grandma this morning that she couldn't come and see you any more; and I know you must be very naughty, for mamma always tells me that it is only when you are very naughty to go too. Have you told a lie, Faith, or disobeyed? Cousin Lucy says that's why I like you so much, I want you to be good again."

Faith unconsciously pushed the child from her, and set up to prove her own innocence straight at Mrs. Ellicott, the careless smile quite gone, and a look to make one think of Sin in the sky above and the light in the waves as a stormy warning.

"Children and fools speak the truth," said Mrs. Ellicott, sardonically. "Miss Nods Blitzerose only spoke the sentiments of every other right feeling Southern woman. You can not expect to be consistent while you advocate the principles of the enemies of your country."

"Have I said one countenance of any?"

"You will find it difficult to stem the tide singly. Besides, what office is it of yours?"

"There are just two alternatives, grandma of God and that of evil: there are only two standards—those of right and wrong. He that is not with the truth is against her; and, disclaim it as you will, you conservatives and neutrals are fighting vigorously on the other side."

"What arrogance for a child like you to presume to address your grandmother!"

"Has God said, so strait is the way of truth that a child can not enter therein?"

Faith, it is very irreverent for you so to parody the Holy Scriptures. A woman's business is with the heroics and not with them."

"True; but these are not her sole concerns. If they had been, we should have been torn without brains and sense—simply an accumulation of instinct, suckers, wheels, pedals, and a sewing-machine joint.

"You will condescend at least to acknowledge that men know something more of politics than you."

"Of politics, yes; of patriotism, no. This very child beside us could understand the whole thing of the Union which gave her State life, and the power to live, was that of her country."

Mrs. Ellicott's last shaft of patience gave way.

"I wonder that an Ellicott can ally herself to that low herd of Northern mudsill abolitionists who are the whole cause of the war. Do you know that if your friends prosper the next step will be to free your slaves and make you work in the field?"

"Better than that living in open defiance of God."

"Has he any where said, Thou shalt not keep slaves?"

No; but he has said, 'Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you.' I have yet to learn that any among us have dared shut the gates of human regeneration against him, and deny that they have souls; and if the mercifil Jesus really died for them, and according to his promise lives in the hearts of those among them who love him, are they not "others?" Are they not included in the commandment that shall bind, and then, my dear grandmother, if you can find me a man who does not wish to see every slave forced to work all his days for another, he shut out by law from education and further development, and who has been left almost entirely to the care of his other human being, I will go as a vivandiere with our army to-morrow."

"Oh, Faith has grown quite unanswerable since she has acted as nurse to the Yankee Captain!"

Both turned toward the third speaker, a handsome young man in a lieutenant's uniform, standing in the doorway.

"Her proficiency is not so astonishing," he went on, "when you consider her teacher, who, though a child also blind, has always the cleverest pupils in the world."

A deep glow flamed up in Faith's cheeks.

"It is manly and generous in you, Arnold Blitzerose, to attack a girl, and a helpless sufferer! I spent six weeks at Captain Heriot's house. I was indebted to him for all my pleasure while in New York. His sister and his fiancée, Fanny Marvin, are my dearest friends; so, when I saw him tossed into a cart with other moaning wretches, stopping at no one but a glass of water, and heard from his surgeon that every jolt and turn of the wheel lessened his chance of life, I should have allowed him to pass on to the tender mercies of a crowded shed, bereveted by necessity as a hospital. That would have been noble and worthy of a Southern lover, I suppose!"

"Mrs. Ellicott, I appeal to—"

But that lady had prudently disappeared. The young man flashed a quick glance around. Nods had also vanished, the music changed, the room was empty, he came and sat beside her on the cushions.

"Faith, are you quite sure that you don't love Captain Heriot?" he asked, softly, trying to look into her eyes.

No question could well have been more unfortunate. Love a man who cared nothing for her, who was betrothed! She would listen to no explanation, no apologies; but flinging aside the hand that sought hers, went up stairs, face burning, and eyes moist with indignant tears of courage, all the more mortification of loving John Heriot, and as she was thinking about him, what more natural than to go in to see him?

He was lying with half-closed eyes—closed, I am afraid, only on the instant that he heard the little slipped foot coming along the hall. He was very still; he breathed like one in sleep; yet from his face he must be lost as not a movement of hers escaped him, the breezy, pleasant room, looping back a curtain and throwing wide, and disappearing for an instant to come back with her hands full of gay flowers, and sit down on the floor like a child to arrange them. He saw it all, down to the little bird-like poise of the head on one side, as she held it up for a final look. He no longer feared, he trusted in women; but then he could admire this little, bright-tinted picture, that wanted nothing but a frame of grey, lustrous hair, and a background of green. The perfect arch of eyebrow and the sweep of the long lashes, the full, rich lips, and dimpled chin under the mass of soft hair brushed smoothly away, the scarlet of her lips, intense in tone as the heart of rose from which they flamed and seemed to breathe, the melting away of a little rounded chin into her white throat, the long, clinging fingers, the habit revealing of an arched foot, even the soft blue of her pretty wrapper, soothed and delighted him. She placed the flowers on a little stand, and then probably borne the silver goblet, with its foaming night draught, in those old times which Mrs. Ellicott called the dark ages of ignorance. She stole up to the bedside in the most exaggerated cat-after-mouse fashion, a hand-mirror held reverently before her forehead, and either she or the wind sighed, "Poor John!"

One of his hands seized and imprisoned hers, and a pair of mischievous eyes opened wide and looked up into a flushed face. Faith's first movement was to try ineffectually for freedom; her second to despise herself, and say, coolly,

"Oh! you are awake, and better, Captain Heriot?"

"Both; but what has this last moment done that you are so partial to it, while you freeze up all the rest with your 'Captain Heriot?'"

"I don't understand you."

"It was 'Poor John' a moment ago."

"You were dreaming."

"Let me dream always, then."

Here each winced with a remembrance. John recollected that another liked not to be called by men; Faith thought of Fanny Marvin. His hand relaxed with a sense of unreality, and Faith's grasp. She walked away toward the door; but there his voice arrested her.

"One moment, and you go. What is 'the news?'"

"Oh! nothing. I think most of our battles are fought on paper."

John groaned and turned restlessly.

"If these continued wounds would ever heal!"

"Even then you will be a prisoner."

"Oh! I shall be exchanged. Your cousin, Mr. Blitzerose, has promised me his influence in my behalf."

"Fanny will have reason to be glad," said Faith, with a sharp twinge at her heart.

"Fanny! I really don't think my movements will affect her materially; but I forgot, you don't know—our engagement is broken off."

"Broken!"

Faith walked quickly back to the flowers, looked up as if to speak, checked herself, and bent low over them again. If it hadn't been quite impossible, one would have said, from the light in her eyes, that she was glad.

"Well," asked John, who had been watching her, "are you not sorry for me?"

"Ought I to be?"

"Ought you not?"

"How can I tell? I know nothing of the circumstances."

"Isn't it bad enough to be jilted? Don't that call for the pity and commiseration?"

Faith was looking half displeased.

"How you misunderstand! I thought you loved her!"

"I thought so too; but something of late has shaken my belief. Two creeds are pulling at my heart-strings, and I can't decide—one steadily asserts that I only dreamed, worshipping an idol of my own creation, not really loved, because I had nothing to love; the other, that there is no love, only a brief delirium."

"Believe it not!" exclaimed Faith. "Abase yourself in dust and ashes; confess that you have erred; but don't be weak enough to deny the existence of the moon because you once made a mistake about a Roman candle."

"Faith!" called Arnold Blitzerose, from without.

"Come back," said John, under his breath.

Faith nodded and went to the door. Arnold was there with a stranger in a sort of military undress.

"I have brought the surgeon, cuz," was his salutation, "to see if Captain Heriot's wounds will permit him to move. A lot of prisoners are to be sent on to the Federal lines this afternoon, and I promised to use my influence in effecting an exchange for him as speedily as possible."

There was no mistaking the triumph of his look, the meaning in the tone; but again Faith's indomitable pride came to the rescue.

"I think he is well enough, and he will be very glad," she said, hurriedly. "He was wishing for it a little while ago."

She fled away to her own room, and, kneeling down before her little white bed, was still for a while. An hour later came a message from Captain Heriot. Could he see her for a moment? Faith got up from her knees, bathed her eyes in fragrant water and went down. Then, with the exception of a subtle tremor about her mouth, no one found John dressed, and feverishly alert and eager.

"I am going," were his first words.

"So I supposed. I am glad for you."

"Be sorry for me, too. I shall not forget the weeks I have spent here."

"Herlie, a doctor twice a day, medicines, fever, and bandages are not easily forgotten."

John's low tender little tones who watched ever me must be, of course. I thought you at last were sincere."

"I am," said Faith, proudly.

"Answer then: Is my going a relief?"

"No."

"What then?"

Faith raised her eyes and tried to meet his look, failed in that, and answered,

"What then?" he repeated.

The answer seemed to force itself from her lips against her will.

"Pain, grief, unutterable."

John's face lighted up; he made a quick movement toward her, but checked himself.

"The pain and grief of losing a friend, Faith?"

She turned away, burning with blushes, crushed with shame.

"You are cruel," she said, passionately. "It is unmanly, dishonorable."

"My little fily, Faith, forgive me. It was a poor return for so much kindness, but I could not feel if a woman dared be true, and could love well enough to withdraw and pride on one side."

As he had drawn her near to him, he could almost touch make no answer her head rested confidingly enough on his shoulder.

"Do you think you can be steadfast?" he asked, after a moment's pause. "You will not hesitate or doubt when I am parted. He is working, she waiting, both hoping.

THE ARMY OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

We publish on page 589 several pictures of towns and localities in Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi, drawn by an officer of the Army of the Mississippi. The artist describes the points illustrated as follows:

TRENTON, TENNESSEE.

Trenton is one of the most important towns on the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, and has been noted for its disloyalty since the rebellion broke out. The country people in the neighborhood, on the contrary, are thoroughly loyal, and, as they are in the majority, Union mass meetings have been held in town, notwithstanding the latter. The town has been recently occupied by the Second Illinois Cavalry and the First Regiment Kansas Volunteers. The secession sentiment was formed by a rebel band near this place; but it was soon routed, and the inhabitants have long since ceased that a repetition of the outrage will visit them with proper retaliation.

CLIFTON AND LAFAYETTE LANDING.

Lastport Landing is an important point on the Tennessee River at the present troublous time, being the way station where immense stores of Government stores are deposited for the supply of our forces in the neighboring parts of Mississippi and Tennessee. It is situated at the foot of the Muscle Shoals, and is the highest point on the river reckoning steamboat navigation from the Ohio. It is only a few miles distant from the Memphis and Charleston Road, to which the stores are transported by wagons, and thence by railway.

The Eighth Kansas Volunteers occupy the town and protect the stores from the numerous guerrilla bands that infest this portion of the country.

HUMBOLDT, TENNESSEE.

Humboldt is an important strategic point in Western Tennessee, being at the crossing of the Mempait and Ohio and the Mobile and Ohio railroads. It was occupied by the rebels at the commencement of the rebellion. In connection with this sketch is one of the ruins of a burned bridge, either on the Memphis and Ohio Railroad, a short distance from Humboldt. A few days since the track was torn up near this place by a band of guerrillas; but it was soon repaired, and the road is now open from Columbus to Corinth.

IUKA.

Iuka is a station upon the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, now in possession of our troops. It is pleasantly situated, and has recently become quite celebrated on account of a number of fine chalybeate springs which have been discovered in the vicinity, and which possess medicinal virtues. Brigadier-General R. B. Mitchell has established his head-quarters at Iuka, and the several regiments of his brigade are stationed near, either guarding the railway or protecting the town from rebel attacks.

THE SCENE OF WAR IN VIRGINIA.

On page 580 we give a picture of CENTREVILLE, Virginia, to which General Pope's army withdrew on the evening of 30th, after a severe battle with General Jackson; and on the same page, a picture of the intersection of the Orange and Alexandria Road with the Manassas Gap Railroad, which was the scene of a sharp skirmish last week. We give also, on page 581, a MAP OF THE SEAT OF WAR IN VIRGINIA. This map will be better understood by perusing the following topographical information from the Tribune:

1. West Virginia, lying westward and south-westward of the centre of the Alleghany mountains, which traverse the State from northeast to southwest in an unbroken chain, rising from 2000 to 4000 feet above the sea level, and of course nowhere perpetually snow-covered or impassable, though the roads which cross them are narrow and for two or three great turnpikes excepted. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad crosses them at the north end of the State, and is held by the Unionists; nearly all the other railroads whereby the State is supplied with coal (very far a few miles around Washington) in the hands of the rebels. West Virginia is almost unanimously loyal and loyal, and is held by the Unionists. Little fighting has been done there for months, and it is presumed nearly bare of troops. The rebels predominate in the extreme southwest of it.

2. The Valley of Virginia, so called, is deep, very fertile, and lies at the foot of the great, lofty range between the Alleghanies and the Blue Ridge, which runs parallel to them on the southeast. This valley is traversed by the Shenandoah River, which flows south and west of the centre of the State, and pursues a generally northeast course to its junction with the Potomac at Harper's Ferry, fifty miles northwest of Washington City. Winchester, Strasburg, Woodstock, Harrisonburg, and Staunton are the principal places in the Valley. The Blue Ridge is lower and smaller than the Alleghanies, holding much the same relation to them as the Jura to the Alps, and is broken by repeated "Gaps," through one of which the Manassas Gap Railroad makes its way into the Valley (when it connects with Alexandria) at Front Royal, which is near the junction of the two principal branches of the Shenandoah, some twenty-five miles above. Manassas and Salem (formerly Piney), Warrenton, Fredericksburg, Aquia Landing (Stafford), Dumfries, and the Valley shore [Front Royal was mostly in their possession prior to the events of last week. We presume that they now hold every thing south of Winchester, and may have done so.

3. Eastern Virginia consists of the residue of the State all southeast of the Blue Ridge, being about half the area, and probably containing a little more than half the entire population. Its railroads mainly centre upon Richmond (the rebel capital), though one from Leesburg (a few miles north of Washington) and another from the southwest reach the Potomac at Alexandria. The "Manassas Gap Railroad" diverges from the line at Manassas Junction (thirty miles south of west of Washington City, rune waterwally through the Gap into the Valley, and so to Strasburg, whence it follows up the north fork of the Shenandoah to Front Royal, where it crosses that river, and runs between Winchester and Harrisonburg, which are the capitals respectively of the Counties of Shenandoah and Rockingham, mainly settled by Germans of a very early emigration, and famous for always voting solid for whatever it called the Democratic ticket.

4. The Rappahannock River rises in the Blue Ridge but a few miles from the south fork of the Shenandoah, and pursues an easterly course to Fredericksburg, some sixty miles south-southwest of Washington City, where it is within ten miles of the Potomac. It has here become a broad, navigable stream, though its extreme sources are hardly eighty miles distant. From Fredericksburg it has a general southeast course till it is lost in Chesapeake Bay, some twenty-five miles below the mouth of the Potomac. For much greater, its course below Fredericksburg is constantly by the Union gun-boats, but above that city it becomes shallow, and is fordable in many places, except when the Union from the rebel forces. It naturally runs toward its source into innumerable streams and rivulets, but at first, some ten miles above Fredericksburg, into two main branches, whereof that coming from the northwest retains the name of Rappahannock, while that from the southwest is known as the Rapidan.

MAP OF THE SEAT OF WAR IN VIRGINIA, SHOWING THE SITES OF THE RECENT BATTLES.

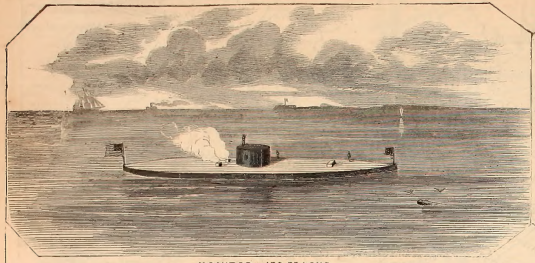
NO NAMES.

GREAT Battle! Great Battle! the urchins cry
Along our marts and the crowded street;
And I mark how the words electrify,
And hasten the steps of loitering feet.

One old man with an eager face
Arrests the courier vending his wares,
And looks about for a quiet place,
Longing to know how the Union fares.

For scarcely a year ago had gone,
Out from the quiet circle at home,
The stay of his years—his only son—
To rally around the Capitol's dome.

"Yes! here is his brigade, thick in the fray—
The dead and the wounded too are here;
Thank God! our forces have gained the day!
What's this? The Twenty-third's loss is severe?



Down the red record of glory and fame—
Red with the blood of heroes outpoured—
The old man seeks for one dear name,
Written on Time with the steel of the sword.

Faint, in one corner, this he sees—
Close beside other names plain to view—
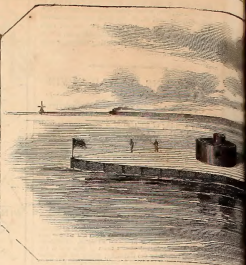
"The dead and the wounded in Company B Amount, with the missing, to eighty-two."



"But who are the wounded, and who the dead?"
The old man asks, and asks in vain;
And says, as he wearily shakes his head,
"How can I tell the saved from the slain?"

Oh brothers! dear brothers! who reckon our loss—
Dead to our hearts, but to glory our gain—
Bethink ye how much your omissions cost
In anxious days and nights of pain!

OUR NEW IRON-CLAD NAVY.

We devote pages 584 and 585 to illustrations of our new Iron-Clad Navy. The six small pictures are drawn according to scale, and may be considered mathematically correct. The larger picture shows the comparative sizes of the new iron-clads. None of the iron-clads for our inland waters are included; they will form the subject of another picture. We refer to our Number of August 30 for an account of our iron-clad navy, and in this place will only append the following table:

Name of Vessel.	Length.	No. of Guns.	Present Condition.
Ironsides	240 ft.	18	At sea.
Roanoke	270 ft.	6	Brooklyn Navy-yard.
Woodna	150 ft.	4	On the stocks.
Puritan*	340 ft.	4	Keel being laid.
Onondaga	226 ft.	4	On the stocks.
Passaic†	200 ft.	2	Launched.
Galena	180 ft.	18	James River.
Naugatuck	101 ft.	1	Hoboken.
Monitor	172 ft.	2	James River.

In order to enable the reader to judge of the size of these boats by comparison, we give in the same picture the Brooklyn, 247 feet long, and the Seneca, 150 feet.

THE YELLOW JASMINE.

School hours were over for the day; my little pupils were burying old Pointer in the sand at the door of one of the negro cabins; I stood at the window for a little while looking out longingly toward the sea in the distance; and then I came back to my little sewing-chair, and sat down to rock and think.

I had needed a time to think ever since the night before. About midnight—perhaps between twelve and one—I had been waked by some slight noise, and had stolen to my window to look out and listen. A monotonous level of sand, like an ancient sea-beach, surrounded Mr. Baker's dwelling; almost destitute of verdure, and so dry and soft that it looked like flour under the full moon; and over the sand, in and out of the shadows under the few evergreen oaks and yellow pines, some twelve or fifteen human figures were moving about—close-coated figures, with little shining caps and heavy beards. I knew what it meant, and was not at all alarmed. Through all the eleven months of my residence in the South, and especially during the autumn and early winter, while the shadow of the coming storm was fast closing in over the doomed land, this whole region had been nervously on its guard against the danger of servile insurrections. All the men remaining in the vicinity had been organized into active vigilance committees; and often before I had seen them at night "out patrolling," going their rounds over the different plantations to inspect the negro quarters and overawe any dangerous movement. What I did notice as unusual now was the marked air of excitement among the men. They talked together in their low tones longer and with more gesture than usual as they met under the trees; they moved about more eagerly, and watched and listened more intently. Presently two men met at the corner near my room. I heard the word "abolitionist" uttered in a smothered hiss. They moved forward, still talking earnestly, and as they passed under my window I thought I heard one say, "being a lady, you know." My excited attention could catch no more, until, as they separated, one of them threw back to his companion the final remark, "Well, Baker's responsible, any way."

My thoughts that night were haunted by vague uneasiness. I went down early the next morning to the breakfast-room, and as I entered the hall Mrs. Baker's sharp voice reached me through the open door. "Thomas," said she, "it is not safe. Don't you know you are responsible for what's done here? Next thing you'll be arrested yourself if you don't have—" An audible "hush" stopped her, and looks icier than ever greeted me as I appeared at the door. The family were all huddled around her arm-chair nervous and gloomy. I learned that rumors of "another plot" had been brought down by express the night before from a town seventeen miles away in the interior, the negroes of which had lately had some communication with those of our neighborhood.

All day the loneliness and the uncertain peril of my position had haunted me, and now, at the first moment of leisure, was the time to think it all over. I was very inexperienced. It had been my first adventure, when, a year before, I had left my mother alone in the little parsonage, which was still allowed her after my father's death, to help as I might toward eking out our small income in this foreign-like region, hundreds of miles away. I had stood at my post until every other Northern resident had gone home. Then at last I had told my employer that I must go. It was some six weeks before; and that gentleman had surprised me at the time by simply replying that, as my engagement had been made for a year, I could not of course expect to receive any part of my salary until the close of that time. I had been reared among the Berkshire hills, and I astonished him in turn by answering that I would stay till then.

Now when I sat down to review that decision, I began by resolutely setting at bay the infinite longing for my home, my mother, my own dear, safe, happy New England, and resolving to consider only what was best. My mother was poor—I was her only helper. How could I go back to her a burden instead of a helper? But then, what if any thing should happen to her only child. What if the impending storm should burst suddenly, and my retreat be cut off, and the last of her desolated household be left imprisoned among strangers and enemies? No; I could not take the responsibility; I must go home.

Poverty—that poverty which stimulates and degrades not—teaches us very early our grand lesson; it teaches us, by the necessity of constant practice, to keep the soul's world fresh and blooming and sunny, let the world without lower and darken as it will. It had taught me this lesson, and I put it in practice now. This evening was my own, to-morrow would be time enough for business; and I had one thing more to do, one more picture to lay by in memory before I left the South forever. I must see the yellow jasmine in bloom.

I ran down on the instant to find some one who would go with me to the only one I knew of within walking distance. Mrs. Baker sat before her sewing-machine with her oldest daughter.

"Julia," said she, when I had explained my errand, "go up to my room, dear, and bring me another spool. I'm sorry, Miss Carr, we all happen to be engaged just now. Possibly old Sarah might serve you for a guide if you are very anxious to go." And she vanished abruptly through the hall door.

I had reached the door of old Sarah's cabin before the strangeness of this proposal had fully dawned upon me. For months I had felt that the local proprieties required me to have no intercourse with the servants whatever—never to talk with them, and never to be seen with them alone. But this one—this grim, secret, cunning, taciturn old Sarah—was the one of all most suspected and most watched. However, the proposal was hers—the straightforward course is almost always best. I hesitated only for a moment.

To my surprise Sarah was unwilling to go. "Bad road, Missus; bad, heavy road. Gitt'n' late, mos' sundown, Missus. Curus place out dah, Missus—yes, Missus. Ladies nebba goes out dat a way; dey doesn't—no, Missus." I silenced her with a word or two, and we started.

It was certainly a lonesome road; the old road leading through a light pine wood, and across a wide stretch of sand, and then on through a low, jungle-like forest to a ruined and deserted plantation beyond. When we reached the forest old Sarah led me a little distance down its borders and away from the road. We reached a spot where a black resinous sink of water crept away into the thicket under a covert of naked trees, all knotted and interwreathed with dry brown climbers, till all below was black as a cypress shade. There she stopped and stood motionless, pointing solemnly upward.

"What is it, Sarah?"

"De jasmine, Missus, 'way up dah."

There it was, indeed! A colossal wreath of flowers, with no apparent connection with the earth, with no other living thing near it, running along the enormous basket-work of vines and branches in huge masses and festoons for scores and hundreds of yards, its glossy, papery, pointed foliage, almost hidden by the tropical luxuriance of trumpet-like flowers and long conical buds, bright as gold and soft as swan's-down, and every breeze that touched it bringing down a burden of voluptuous fragrance—the fragrance of a crushed peach-stone, yet delicate and balmy as the breath of a rose. I was alone in a wilderness of forest, sky, and sand, and for once I seized the privilege of those impulsive races who live near to nature in the wild, free paradise of the tropics—I clapped my hands and shouted aloud.

But how long had that beautiful thing been growing? How many years had it climbed upward and upward, and then how many more had it been traveling from tree-top to tree-top when it could climb no higher? How long was it since the brown, rope-like stems, now drawing up moisture and sustenance from the reservoirs so far below, had been themselves beautiful with clusters of the crisp green and waxy gold? Ah! what splendid history had been growing with it, and how tragically that history was changing now. All through its lifetime North and South had been standing together against common enemies, or helping each other on in peaceful progress—their union and happiness the hope of the world. Why was it all so changed? What crime, above all other crimes, had so brought God's curse down—

My reverie was cut short by a quick pull at my dress. There stood old Sarah, pointing upward again, her gaunt, black face hideous with fear.

"Come 'way, come 'way, Missus!" she whispered; "Mos' sundown, Missus."

"Hark, Sarah, just a moment! Oh, it's the wind among the fine wiry stems. It's like an Æolian harp. Listen!"

"Oh, come 'way, come 'way, Missus; it's de dogs—it's de dogs!"

"The dogs! where?"

"Up dah, up dah. Dere's mor'n one's heerd 'em 'fore now, Missus. Dey's allus a-yowlin'—a-yowlin' jes' dat a way o' night, Missus. Come 'way, come 'way!"

"Sarah, what do you mean?"

"An' dah's a w'ite bone down dah 'n de watah, Missus; an' ebery night dat bone come up 'top o' de watah an' it go roun', roun', roun', roun' a-huntin' for de oder bones. Yes, Missus, ebery night ha' past one. Gittin' late, Missus, come 'way, come 'way!"

"Now, Sarah, be quiet and listen to me. You've heard some dreadful story about this place, and you've been frightened by it; tell me the story just as you've heard it, and then listen to what I say about it. Come!"

But the woman stood in dogged silence, only turning her eyeballs strangely up at me.

"Won't you tell me, Sarah?"

"Dem stories ain't for to tell, Missus."

"Why not?"

"Ugh."

"Why not, Sarah?"

"'Gin the awdahs."

"Well, Sarah, we'll go home now."

In an instant the long, lithe creature had darted out on the sand a rod or more; in another instant she had stopped. She stood for a moment facing toward the thicket, craning forward like a snake ready for a spring, one fist stretched fiercely out, the other drawn back to her shoulder—then she made her spring. There was a crash in the underbrush, then a sudden bound out of it, and a burly, yellow-faced Irishman, with bristling head and bulging eyeballs, scoured away across the sand-plain, yelling in a very agony of terror. "Howly Vargin, the nagur, the nagur!" I knew him; he was a railroad laborer employed occasionally at Mr. Baker's.

"Dey's put him dah for to watch—for to watch Missus," whispered old Sarah as I came up. "De good Lord bress yer dear soul, Missus! dey's put him dah for to watch if—if Missus say any thing 'bout—'bout dat ah."

It was only too plausible. I had heard the man's hammer on the back veranda as I stood talking with Mrs. Baker. We had delayed long enough, and our course had been circuitous enough to give him ample time to secure his ambush before we came up.

"Sarah," said I, "you may fall back now; I will walk before; I know the way."

I walked on very hurriedly; but scarcely had I reached the bend in the old road where it enters the pine woods, when from a distance in the direction of the house came a loud, brutal shout. I understood it perfectly. The Regulators were there—had probably been near when the spy was sent on his errand. They had heard his story, and they would come to meet us.

I could see very far through the woods. The trees were almost branchless, and the sunset sparkled every where on the smooth, stiff, radiating spears of the low-creeping palmetto which formed the only underbrush. In a moment they came in sight, still at a distance, eight or ten men of the lower class, led on, as the Southern mob always is led, by a gentleman.

This man I knew. I had heard him talked of as a visitor in the place, and the "lion" of the time. Almost a boy, with all the wild, headstrong recklessness of the Southern boy; and I knew that this very quality, no less than the rumor of wealth and position at home, had given him unbounded influence in the neighborhood. Mrs. Baker had never succeeded in attracting him to her house; but I had seen him once at a distance, and now, as the leader rode on considerably in advance of the rabble on foot, I knew it was Harry Kent.

There was but one thing to be done, and I did it. Near the roadside, just before the turning, a cluster of thick, tall holly bushes stood, hiding us from sight. There I waited. Harry Kent turned the corner, and the holly thicket hid him from sight too. Then I went up quickly to his horse's side, looked up into his face, and said,

"May I ask you to come back with me to the house? I am afraid to meet those rude men alone."

It must have been a full minute before the fixed amazement of his face allowed one muscle to move. Then, as another shout came up, now fearfully near, he blushed up to his cap-rim, darted from the saddle, and threw the reins to old Sarah.

"I'll do my best," said he; "don't be afraid. I—I beg your pardon! Would you let me take the ends of your sash?"

I gave him the two ends of the long blue ribbon I wore, drawing out the bows to make it longer. He took them and went forward a few steps just as the foremost of the troop came up.

A braver woman than I would have grown paler at the whoop and yell, and the hurrahs and shouts of laughter, with which they greeted Kent and his prisoner, as they rushed up crowding and jostling to get a nearer view of me. Kent held them back, and restored something like silence by a vigorous motion or two of his hand.

"All right!" he sung out, gayly, the moment he could be heard, tossing his thumb over his shoulder at me. "Hallo, Captain! what d'ye say; suppose you take the fellows all off down to Wurmer's—see 'f you can't get there 'n time to help him out with that other little job, you know. Want to come back round by Bob Sims's likely, 'n get a little somethin' for the boys—there's the tin."

There had been a grumble of disappointment at this suggestion, but it died away as the coin rattled down on the sand. The grisly-looking "Captain" gathered it up, but then stood scratching his head a little discontentedly.

"Say, Colonel," said he, "they say you Kentucky fellows allus knows wot purty faces is. Bet ye a 'lipenny now, boys."

"If you don't care to command the expedition, Captain, I will relieve you."

That settled the matter. To "command an expedition" under Harry Kent was a chance not to be lost by the parvenu Captain, who was becoming a man of weight in the absence of the better men.

"All right, all right!" he answered, and my heart began to beat again as I saw them defiling away through the woods.

"You'll let me speak abruptly, won't you?" said Harry, putting my hand in his arm, a little bashfully, and starting with me up the short road toward the house. "I want to know, you see, how I can serve you, and there's but little time now."

"Say it at once," said I; "am I arrested?"

"Well—you know people are so excited now. I don't know much about it myself, but it seems your going out to that place with a suspected servant—"

"But that was her mistress's suggestion; she sent the woman with me."

"Did she?" He stopped short. "Did any one hear her—any white person?"

"No."

"I'm afraid— Well, you know Mrs. Baker. Likes to improve her social position, you understand, by being a little extra-patriotic just now."

"Yes, I know. You will not hesitate to tell me plainly what the special danger is—what I probably have to expect."

"Well, do you think you would be unwilling, for instance, if it should be necessary, to go back to the North at once?"

"Oh no, no!"

"Or to stay—in your room, perhaps—until you you are ready to go?"

"As a prisoner? No, I can submit to that."

"Then, if my influence is worth any thing, it shall be so. I don't suppose it would be best to be seen making preparations till you hear more—might raise suspicions, you know; but I suppose I must say that you may need to leave at an hour's notice. I mean, if it is decided as we hope."

"If? You think then I have something more to fear?"

"Oh, I hope not! I hope not! The meeting is at seven, you will know then as soon as possible. But whatever course things may take, let me assure you, I will act for you as I would act for my sister."

He spoke low and quick, for just then, as we came up, Mr. Baker lounged out of the gate to meet us.

"Well, Sir," said Harry, suddenly taking up the rôle he had dropped, "ready to succeed me in office, eh? You won't be gone but a minute, will you? I'll just wait here."

Baker took me under his arm with a sly laugh at Harry, and led me, without speaking, through the gate, up the steps, past the group of slightly-sobered faces in the parlor door, and on up the staircase to my room. The door closed on me, the key turned, and I stood in the centre of the room pressing back with clasped hands the smothering throbs of my heart, and saying over and over, in a vague effort to summon back courage and hope, "He will do his best! he will do his best!" For I saw it plainly then, that between the chance of going back to my mother's home, and the chance of meeting all the unknown terrors of a Southern prison or a Southern mob, my only hope in the wide world was the fidelity of this one impulsive boy.

What a long night it was! Sometimes I sat still, trying to gather my whole soul into the resolution neither to hope nor fear, neither to think nor feel, only to keep my faculties steadily poised for action when the time should come. Then I would go about my room, making what preparations I could safely make for my departure. And then when my heart would choke me, and my eyes would fill in spite of me, I would come back to my chair and try to tread under foot these merely personal troubles, in awe of the fearful future impending over the nation. The twilight faded, and the moon made the shadows black under the trees. No one came near me. The clock below stairs struck seven, then in a strangely short time—for it seemed to me that an hour ought to appear an age—it struck eight, and then nine, and ten, and eleven. But I was growing weaker. The suspense and the utter helplessness grew heavier as the night deepened and the house became still. I took my Bible, but I put it away again. It told me too much of what had been mine in the dear North; what would be mine again if I could only be there once more. At last I came and knelt down before my chair and laid my head on my arms. I said not a word—I felt that there was no need. He knew the whole, and He could help me. And so by degrees came that other feeling, that He was near me—was my friend—would arrange every thing for me in His own way; and with that feeling came rest and patience, and finally forgetfulness.

Something startled me. It was something at the door. The whole must have flashed on me in an instant, for I was there when the door was flung open. Mr. Baker stood there with a lighted lamp in his hand.

"Pack up your traps," said he, "boat starts in half an hour. My compliments to Yankee-land!"

Did any other lady ever pack her trunks in fifteen minutes? I did that night, leaving chaos and wild misrule in the wake of the process. Just as it was finished I went out into the hall to take my hat from its nail and paused a moment—I must confess it, I suppose—at hearing Harry Kent's name spoken in Mr. Baker's tones in a side passage.

"The fellow kept us there," said he, "talking chivalry till after midnight. Con-founded shame! Such a case ought to have been dealt with some different way. That chap never would take No for an answer."

I found the "chap" at the hall door when I went down. He merely took my satchel in passing, and left me to his companion, a substantial gentleman of the place, going to Charleston on business, who politely offered to take charge of me. When I was seated in the carriage, my traveling companion choosing the outside, Harry looked in a moment to say good-by. At first he gave me his hand with all proper ceremony; then suddenly he looked up, in his quick way, and said, as if he hardly meant to say it,

"Will you think of me as a rebel, Miss Carr, or only as Harry Kent?"

"A rebel," said I, bending forward, and speaking very low. "Oh, think of it once more, Mr. Kent."

"Too late now," he answered. "I've enlisted."

And the carriage moved away.

Months afterward I was returning home late one evening, and there, talking with my mother in the lighted parlor, sat Harry Kent. He was so pale that my first astonishment changed to sudden alarm. "Was he ill?" I asked.

"No, only wounded," he replied, smiling. "A man's normal condition now, you know."

Even then I saw it, but it was not till long afterward that I realized fully how much he had changed. He had grown older, as men do grow older in these earnest times. The boy had passed at a step into full manhood, and the young, lavish overflow of energy had settled into enduring, effective purpose for all the future. I did not wonder when I heard his story. He had remained in the rebel service, he said, the misgivings which had entered his mind on that evening growing stronger every day. When the news came that his own State had been invaded by the Southern armies—then he had at once resigned his commission and returned home. His father received him as the prodigal was received. "Don't be false to your own State," said the true-souled Kentuckian; "go to work, if you must do any thing, to rid our own soil from these invaders." And Harry had obeyed. It was under his own country's flag that he received the wound which had sent him to the North for the healing. "I couldn't deny myself one day in Westminster," he said; but the day became six weeks before it was over. Then he went back again to his great work, with my mother's blessing upon his head. And ever since I seem to live only to read and answer those dear, brave letters, which become so faithfully to her office under the superscription—"Mrs. Ada Carr Kent."

DEVEREUX DARE, PRIVATE.

MRS. ASHLETON DARE always looked at her handsome, manly son with a maternal pride which was altogether excusable. They were a fine couple, for any one's seeing, the widow and her son. Mrs. Dare's fairly good looks did not lose her an enemies. The dark brilliance of her eyes was undimmed. Scarcely a thread of silver flecked the raven black set of her hair. Her complexion kept bright still as clear, dark tints, and even her figure had not lost its old stately grace. The heavy flood of blood in her veins was not chilled either. She was as fit to be the mother of a hero as she had been to be Colonel Dare's wife—Colonel Dare, whose rank no foeman ever saw.

Her son was after her own heart. He had her dark eyes and hair, her sparkling expression, and Huguenot temperament, all modified in his case, by the long-during, persistent nature of his father, which he had inherited along with a certain resolute contempt of all that was not the ethical signal of his paternity. For all the rest he was, outwardly, a Devereux. He used to call them which his courage came—neither Dare nor Devereux had ever reckoned a coward among their children.

They had been discussing, these two, an engrossing question. It was just after that terrible day at Bull Run, when the country needed so bitterly all her children, and every loyal heart was throbbing as one thought, all-indwelled in her passionate being filled up rapidly, and young Dare, just home, in the spring of '61, from his three years of foreign travel, was discussing the mother's opposition to enlist. He looked at her now with persuasive eyes.

"It should not be you, mamma, who would keep a heroic race, the widow of a man who got his death-blow in the front of the fray, who would hold back your son who the last of his fathers has need of him."

"I do not, Devereux. I unswilling you should enlist if only you will use the interest of your family to procure you a suitable commission."

"I may not be proud of one. I have not your peroyal my fitness to take."

"Your fitness! It is in your blood."

"Well then, seriously, I do not want a commission, because I feel sure that I can do more good by going as a private. All can not get shoulder-straps, and men men thus you think are lolling back because they can not get them say—" It is the duty of those who serve in the ranks; we will not fight unless our comrades can be gentlemen." Every one is willing for the service. I am not. I shall enlist as a ast men in Boston who will follow the flag the more readily if they march in company with my father's son?"

"Your father would not have done—did not do —what you wish to do."

"Because he was needed otherwise."

He knelt down beside her, just then, that handsome, gallant fellow, whom all women must be fascinating. He rested his head on her knee—it was an old, loyalty trick, and she loved him with a thou great, persuading, dark eyes of his up into her face. His voice was full of appeal—his tones grew solemn in their earnestness.

"Mother, I must go. I can only go as a private, for my conviction that duty is to be done where it calls. If it is a sacrifice, it is one that must be made. Will not you make it with me? If you kept me back I should hardly be willing to accept it in such terms. It would only be a long misery, with the ghost of the unfulfilled duty that should haunt me forever. Be brave, mother, brave and kind. If I should fall in battle, and lie beside some Southern stream with my life-blood staining it red, you would not have to think, when your voice and your smile come back to haunt me, that I went away without your blessing."

The heart, the quick, impulsive, woman's heart, through which the experience Dare had inherited was softened. Tears fell from the proud eyes, and glistened a moment in the short curls of his head upon her silken lap. Then she put her hands and those thick curls with a caressing touch, and said to him:

"You have conquered. I will not keep you back from the duty you express so so clearly. You may be right. At any rate, if you go, I will go with my blessing, and remember that one at home prays for you always."

Tears, not hers, wet the hand her son drew to his mouth. Strongest hearts in the fray are tenderest oftentimes at the beginning.

That was one struggle and one victory. The soldier had yet another conflict to wage, harder one possibly—in the bosom of Clara Gage, known to all her friends as Clara.

He went there that night after his enlistment had been registered. She was his betrothed wife, and he loved her as a brave man can love a true woman. It may be that he loved her better for this. If he did, forgive him, for there was nothing else out of heaven that he did fair. In her case it was only because she was to prove herself true in his calamity, save loss of honor, could have been bettered by the same measure as loss of her. Sorrow he shrank from telling her his plan, and meeting the look he fancied her eyes would wear when she heard it; and so he had unfolded it to her in a note which she had received that morning. He hoped that she would have reconciled herself to his yiewa before he saw her.

I think he could have done a good many starrier things with less fluttering of the heart than he felt when he walked into the little azure-hung room where she waited for him.

She was a beauty of a different type from his handsome mother; but of one no less haughty. She was pure SAXON, with hair of dun gold, and blue eyes which could swim in seas of passionate tenderness, but which knew how to flash scorn, or scintillate anger. Just the woman for long loving or long hating. Your dark-eyed beauties are too stormy, their emotions exhaust themselves. For slow, strong patience in hating or loving give me a slight woman, with a fair skin and transparent blue eyes.

Miss Gage met her lover cordially enough—a wary general does not commence his attack till he has reconnoitred the field. If he can maintain his own line effectually, he may not even need to leave covert and begin the battle, so much the better the chances in his favor. Perhaps Miss Gage had read the situation.

She talked smilingly about the weather. She was fond going, and Mr. Newgrove—who does not persuade him to go too? They would have merry times.

"I shall have to do with other balls," he said, a little resolutely, determined that he should best no longer about the bush of his errand.

She raised her eyebrows slightly.

"Saratoga?"

"Virginia, rather, I think."

"A bad time to go South, in summer."

"Necessity makes all times alike. Did you not get my note?"

"What—that pleasantry you sent me this morning about enlisting? Surely you could not be in know you better? Fancy Devereux Dare trudging through the mud, and, even in a uniform, coldblooded, whatever they call it, on his back!"

"It is well to fancy it, Clara. It will to real soon. I am enlisted."

"Without asking me?"

"Forgive me. I felt that was God's and my country's before it was yours. I knew my duty. I dared not run the risk of having my resolution shaken by your natural grief at his going, and not be worth your loving, Clara, if I could shrink from the duty because it was hard to you to see it so."

"I thought Heaven's calls were of a more peaceful nature—to pray or preach to men, not shoot them. What will your mother do?"

"That she will pray for her absent soldier every hour in the day. Her prayers and yours will be my shield."

"I will not pray for you!" The girl's lips whitened with anger at the resolution as she spoke.

"Not pray for me?"

"No; unless I do so unwittingly, in the prayer we use together. I will not pray for success. You are my enemy if you go."

There was nothing weak or irresolute in Miss Gage's face. Her voice was quiet and even. Dare shivered as its firm tones fell on his ear.

"Clara, I do not know what you mean? You said that you loved me last night."

"It means what it has always meant women, I give in such measure as I receive. Last night I thought you loved me."

"And so I do, God knows!"

"Do you think I believe you Would a man who loved a woman leave her to the most eminent certain destruction without even the grace to tell her his purpose until after he had pledged himself? Why did you not tell me of your mad scheme?"

"Because I was too cowardly. You have the right to blame me. I was afraid you would use all your trust myself to your persuasions. My duty, I hope, I should have done in any case; but I shrank from the mistake that a woman would suffer in doing it when you were holding me back."

A half-suppressed triumph looked from Clara Gage's eyes. She was sure, then, of the confession of her power over him. She determined to test it fully. As his mother had done before her, she asked,

"Why do you not get a commission?—I know that is, I hope, the proper word into Army Circles with quick bravery. He answered her as he had answered his mother before—gave her, with calm patience, all his reasons.

Her eyes hardened, looking wide at him with a cold and steely brightness, as if comprehending what he had never seen in them before. She waited until he was all through, when she said—oh! so quietly.

"My mind is not changed. If you go, as you have planned, you go my enemy, not my betrothed."

Passion-heat of the dark-browed Devereux, transferred to fairer and more delicate blood, rose up in his nature and took the reins. Had he yielded then to the emotion, he ungently grieve, I believe that nothing could have appeased the measure of his self-contempt but to die by his own hand, like an old Roman. But he was strong to stop step too far. He had no more persuasion for her way, and some sense of justice in her conduct through her nerves like the sharp whir of a bullet.

"I accept the position toward you which you have fixed." Miss Gage had never said or felt to forgive you in time; your death-bed will not be easy without such mercy!"

She trembled. There was that in his tone and manner which appalled her. She began to feel that she was a woman, and weak; and he was a man, and strong. But she had a grain as stern and inflexible as his own. Among her set of rings, she had one from a dagger a ring, wherein a single diamond sparkled, and dropped it into his extended palm. Then rising, she bowed as she would have dismissed a morning visitor, as he stood, hat in hand, before her. He had known her mood, with her blue eyes and her pale hair. He looked at her bangrily. His soul clamored for one touch of her careless hand, her falsely-smiling lips. But he mastered the emotion, and only said,

"I shall fight the better for this, Miss Gage! More than one dead rebel will have you to thank for his death-wound. The man who leaves least at home can leave afford to throw his life away."

Two days after that he marched with his regiment. Clara Gage was Clara Gage again.

She did not go the next week to Newport. She had said he would be her only as her enemy, but a sickening longing took possession of her to trace that enemy's fate. She could not have danced—I think her pride was too unsteady. Her fashionable had no mother—was astonished at her resolution to remain in town all through the season. Clara was not to be moved from her intent; then became convinced that, after all, no place was more comfortable than home, and began to rejoice prematurely in the prospect of coming from business to an open house, and a home which a woman's presence made comfortable.

He knew nothing of the great wave that had swept over the Northern girl's life. He supposed that Devereux Dare, whom he knew to be his prospective son-in-law, had gone to the war as a private. Like every one else, he wondered, and grunted out, besides, a little personal dissatisfaction. He knew not that the man who loaned those two had been sundered; and if the face opposite to him was pale, he had not too much perception to joke his daughter about her sweetheart, until one day she showed him with them words, at which he experienced something near to remorse, that the child had fallen suddenly at his feet and exploded there:

"Father, there are some things which I can not bear—this one I can name Mr. Dare's name is one again."

Thompson she retired into her shell, and he was left outside wondering. He had thought to please her by talking of her lover; to give her an opportunity to express her grief at his absence, and ask for sympathy; but it seemed she did not like to talk of him. He was puzzled, and said no more.

Little he knew what to bear that name or to speak it cost her!

The autumn had not passed before, in the depths of her soul, she had repented; but her stubborn pride would scarcely acknowledge it even to herself. It would not open her heart to one emotion of tender ruth. Yet there was something feverish in her restlessness, and she grew quick at every day's paper. Scarcely his own mother followed the footsteps of that regiment as constantly as Clara Gage did in hope. Once persuaded to consent to her son's wishes, she had gone with him hours and days, and said the words that gave him bounty, and she did. Perhaps those prayers were mighty to turn aside Southern bullets. Perhaps the Northern heroism—somewhat slightly sometimes; but, so far, he had seemed to bear a charmed life. Clara Gage could cause near him.

Before he went away he had told his mother that all was at an end between him and Miss Gage, and given her reasons. He had not entered into particulars, but the little he said had been enough to enlist an old woman's most ardent sympathies. The two women had been almost friends before—drawn together by their love for one object—from the time when away they had never spoken. They had met in the street a few times, passing with averted eyes, and that was all. Mrs. Dare saw at these times that the girl was growing pale, and it did her heart good.

At length the news came from Winchester, of the retreat where the Massachusetts boys brought up the rear, forming a line of battle and fighting as they went. In the list of the wounded two women read with strained eyes these words:

"Private Devereux Dare—dangerously."

One with white lips, and a cry of passionate bewilderment—"Oh, my boy! my boy!" The other with fearless face, and a look of a yet deeper agony—" And I told him I would not pray for him!" Each with the same purpose of forgiveness in her hero.

Miss Gage did not delay. She put on her bonnet and ran out in once to his mother's house. Mrs. Dare received her coldly.

"I do not understand your coming here now," she began. "I am in too much trouble to receive visitors. Do you not know—have you not heard—?"

"Every thing. Can't you see that it is killing me? Devereux! you are his mother, you would forgive me if you knew what I have suffered. I love him. I did love him all the while. I—"

"I will go first. I must hear him speak my pardon before he dies."

Mrs. Dare's stern, impulsive heart softened to the poor, anguish-torn creature, who sank imploringly on the floor at her feet. She knelt down beside her and threw her arms round her, and rained her up.

"I shall go, Clara; you shall go with me, and I pray God that we may yet look upon his face again in this life's life. The train leaves at four. Can you get ready?"

"You will find me waiting for you at the depot."

It was well for Clara Gage that she had a proud woman's fortitude. Once assured that she might go to him, she did not flutter and faint or tremble, or her face to betray her. With step as lofty as ever she went home. She met her father going up the steps.

"Father," she said, speaking with the calmness of one all whose plans are fixed—"Devereux is dangerously wounded, and I am going to him. I shall start at four with Mrs. Dare."

Seldom is a woman in any position more entirely her own mistress than was Miss Gage. Her father never interfered with or knew her act, or interfering with her purposes. Moreover, he had never been informed of the dissolution of her engagement, and thought it but natural that she should resolve to go to her lover. She encountered no opposition from him, therefore, but rather help. Hurriedly her preparations were made, and when Mrs. Dare reached the station she found her companion waiting for her.

It was midnight of the second day when, after long travel and many delays, they reached the hospital. For a moment Mrs. Dare held parley with the surgeon.

"Was it safe to go to him? Would he know them? Where was his wound?"

Clara Gage listened for the reply, clasping Mrs. Dare's arm with her nervous fingers till it ached.

"Yes, they might see him and tend him; it would do no harm; but he would not know them, he was delirious. His right arm was shot away, and he had, besides, a severe wound in his chest."

"Was there any hope?"

"A little—there might be a chance for him with good nursing. It looked more than doubtful but a day two days ago."

They were led to his bedside—these two women who loved him.

He lay there, his cheeks flushed, his eyes wild with fever. He was talking incoherently—living over again, as it seemed, the brave charge in which he had fallen. At last he murmured, in tender tones,

"You said you would pray for me, mother. Are you praying for your boy now?"

Then, indeed, tears rained from his mother's eyes as she knelt beside her son. But Miss Gage could not weep; but she not said she would not pray for him?

Her face never tended him—almost, it seemed, without sleep or rest; hardly knowing, in their anxiety, what time of we one or the other had been, were slow steps from despair toward hope; and by-and-by there came an afternoon when he looked at them with a faint calm eyes, and knew them in his own voice.

"Mamma, you here? This makes home in a strange land. And Clara—?"

Miss Gage was not too proud then to sink on her knees at his bedside, and her voice was low with her sobs that he could hardly hear her say,

"Forgive me, Devereux, can you? I will never ask it when I said you were my enemy, and I would not pray for you. I have prayed for you, Devereux."

"I have prayed to forgive you, Clara. Not at first, though; the senses of wrong was too bitter then. It was just before the battle. I knew I should have wrong thick, and I knew it was an even chance whether I came out of it alive. Then I prayed that I might remember that I had loved you. The bitterness went out of my heart, and that mighty love surged back. When I was shot in the head I knew every Lady cried 'Clara!' and on we swept."

He wore talking, listen, unless you would lose again all we have gained."

It was the surgeon's voice, as he went his round, and it put an end to a conversation that gave back to Clara Gage hope and youth.

It was a month before he could been able to remove the beloved patient by easy stages to Boston that any thing was said about the future. Then, one day, Clara Gage took from a ring fastened to his neck by a blue ribbon.

"This is Clara's."

Miss Gage obeyed him, as he reached it toward her.

For a moment he held the ring, sparkling and glittering in the fingers of his one hand. Then he said

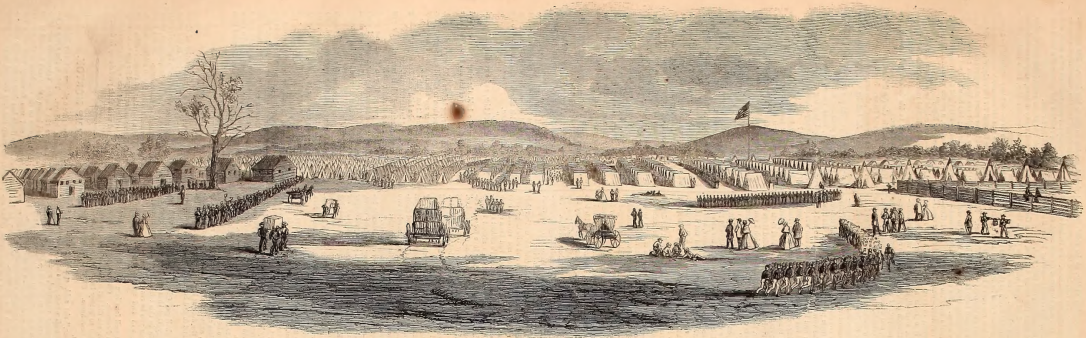
"I put on this ring before with my right hand. I had a strong arm then to shield and support you. I have only my left hand to put on it now. Will you my left hand to put it on with?"

For answer she held out her finger, waiting for the ring. He hesitated still.

"Do you understand all it means? Do you care to accept me—so-armed man?"

"I care to be yours, if you think me good enough for your wife—so-armed man! I shall only be prouder of my hero because he bears about with him a token of how dear he held his country and his honor."

And so the ring was placed again on Clara Gage's finger, and the next week found the wedding. She had wanted her before, but he needed her now; and she had come too near to losing him to delay her happiness for any coy pretenses.



He has gained strength rapidly—perhaps because his wife is by his well, because he was so happy. His country had yet work for him to do. As one who had a right to say "come" and not "go," he has asked in the cause of reconstructing under the recent calls. He who has given so much has a right to ask more to risk something. To those who know him his example is more eloquent than his words.

On page 588 we give a representation of CAMP CURTIN, near Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, the great camp of instruction for Volunteers in Pennsylvania. It is situate on the bank of the Susquehanna about one mile northwest of Harrisburg. At the time our sketch was made some 20,000 soldiers from the various counties of Pennsylvania, were being drilled there and equipped for the war. Many had already been forwarded, and appeared himself much pleased with their proficiency in drill.

CAMP MORTON.

On page 588 we give a picture of CAMP MORTON, at Indianapolis, Indiana. This is the camp of instruction where the Indiana Volunteers are mustered and drilled before being sent forward to the war. It is situate on the suburbs of the town of Indianapolis, and was formerly used as a fair ground. Now it has been more nearly into line. ground. No State has done more nobly than Indiana; for more than seventy-five thousand soldiers to the war than Camp Morton.

CHAPTER VIII.

ON returning to the house Captain Wragge received a significant message from the servant. "Mr. Noel Vanstone would call again at two o'clock that afternoon, when he hoped to have the pleasure of finding Mr. Bygrave at home."

The captain's first inquiry, after hearing this message, referred to Magdalen. "Where was Miss Bygrave?" "In her own room." "Where was Mrs. Bygrave?" "In the back parlor." Captain Wragge turned his steps at once in the latter direction, and found his wife for the second time in tears. She had been sent out of Magdalen's room for the whole day, and she was at her wits' end to know what she had done to deserve it. Shortening her lamentations without ceremony, her husband sent her up stairs on the spot, with instructions to knock at the door, and to inquire whether Magdalen could give five minutes' attention to a question of importance, which must be settled before two o'clock.

The answer returned was in the negative. Magdalen requested that the subject on which she was asked to decide might be mentioned to her in writing. She engaged to reply in the same way—on the understanding that Mrs. Wragge, and not the servant, should be employed to deliver the note, and to take back the answer.

Captain Wragge forthwith opened his paper-case, and wrote these lines: "Accept my warmest congratulations on the result of your interview with Mr. N. V. He is coming again at two o'clock, no doubt to make his proposals in due form. The question to decide is, whether I shall press him or not on the subject of settlements. The considerations for your own mind are two in number. First, whether the said pressure (without at all underrating your influence over him) may not squeeze for a long time before it squeezes money out of Mr. N. V. Secondly, whether we are altogether justified—considering our present position toward a certain sharp practitioner in petticoats—in running the risk of delay. Consider these points, and let me have your decision as soon as convenient."

The answer returned to this note was written in crooked blotted characters, strangely unlike Magdalen's usually firm and clear handwriting. It only contained these words: "Give yourself no trouble about settlements. Leave the use to which he is to put his money for the future in my hands."

"Did you see her?" asked the captain, when his wife had delivered the answer.

"I tried," said Mrs. Wragge, with a fresh burst of tears—"but she only opened the door far enough to put out her hand. I took and gave it a little squeeze—and, oh poor soul, it felt so cold in mine!"

When Mrs. Lecount's master made his appearance at two o'clock he stood alarmingly in need of an anodyne application from Mrs. Lecount's green fan. The agitation of making his avowal to Magdalen; the terror of finding himself discovered by the housekeeper; the tormenting suspicion of the hard pecuniary conditions which Magdalen's relative and guardian might impose on him—all these emotions, stirring in conflict together, had overpowered his feebly-working heart with a trial that strained it sorely. He gasped for breath as he sat down in the parlor at North Shingles, and that ominous bluish pallor which always overspread his face in moments of agitation now made its warning appearance again. Captain Wragge seized the brandy bottle in genuine alarm, and forced his visitor to drink a wine-glassful of the spirit before a word was said between them on either side.

Restored by the stimulant, and encouraged by the readiness with which the captain anticipated every thing that he had to say, Mr. Noel Vanstone contrived to state the serious object of his visit in tolerably plain terms. All the conventional preliminaries proper to the occasion were easily disposed of. The suitor's family was respectable; his position in life was undeniably satisfactory; his attachment, though hasty, was evidently disinterested and sincere. All that Captain Wragge had to do was to refer to these various considerations with a happy choice of language, in a voice that trembled with manly emotion—and this he did to perfection. For the first half hour of the interview no allusion whatever was made to the delicate and dangerous part of the subject. The captain waited until he had composed his visitor, and when that result was achieved came smoothly to the point in these terms:

"There is one little difficulty, Mr. Vanstone, which I think we have both overlooked. Your housekeeper's recent conduct inclines me to fear that she will view the approaching change in your life with any thing but a friendly eye. Probably you have not thought it necessary yet to inform her of the new tie which you propose to form?"

Mr. Noel Vanstone turned pale at the bare idea of explaining himself to Mrs. Lecount.

"I can't tell what I'm to do," he said, glancing aside nervously at the window, as if he expected to see the housekeeper peeping in. "I hate all awkward positions; and this is the most unpleasant position I ever was placed in. You don't know what a terrible woman Lecount is. I'm not afraid of her; pray don't suppose I'm afraid of her—"

At those words his fears rose in his throat, and gave him the lie direct by stopping his utterance.

"Pray don't trouble yourself to explain," said Captain Wragge, coming to the rescue. "This is the common story, Mr. Vanstone. Here is a woman who has grown old in your service, and in your father's service before you; a woman who has contrived, in all sorts of small underhand ways, to presume systematically on her position for years and years past; a woman, in short, whom your inconsiderate but perfectly natural kindness has allowed to claim a right of property in you—"

"Property!" cried Mr. Noel Vanstone, mistaking the captain, and letting the truth escape him through sheer inability to conceal his fears any longer. "I don't know what amount of property she won't claim. She'll make me pay for my father as well as for myself. Thousands, Mr. Bygrave—thousands of pounds sterling out of my pocket!!!" He clasped his hands in despair at the picture of pecuniary compulsion which his fancy had conjured up, his own golden life-blood spouting from him in great jets of prodigality under the lancet of Mrs. Lecount!

"Gently, Mr. Vanstone—gently! The woman knows nothing so far, and the money is not gone yet."

"No, no—the money is not gone, as you say. I'm only nervous about it; I can't help being nervous. You were saying something just now; you were going to give me advice. I value your advice—you don't know how highly I value your advice." He said those words with a conciliatory smile, which was more than helpless: it was absolutely servile in its dependence on his judicious friend.

"I was only assuring you, my dear Sir, that I understood your position," said the captain. "I see your difficulty as plainly as you can see it yourself. Tell a woman like Mrs. Lecount that she must come off her domestic throne to make way for a young and beautiful successor armed with the authority of a wife, and an unpleasant scene must be the inevitable result. An unpleasant scene, Mr. Vanstone, if your opinion of your housekeeper's sanity is well founded. Something far more serious, if my opinion that her intellect is unsettled happens to turn out the right one."

"I don't say it isn't my opinion too," rejoined Mr. Noel Vanstone; "especially after what has happened to-day."

Captain Wragge immediately begged to know what the event alluded to might be.

Mr. Noel Vanstone thereupon explained—with an infinite number of parentheses all referring to himself—that Mrs. Lecount had put the dreaded question relating to the little note in her master's pocket barely an hour since. He had answered her inquiry as Mr. Bygrave had advised him. On hearing that the accuracy of the personal description had been fairly put to the test, and had failed in the one important particular of the moles on the neck, Mrs. Lecount had considered a little, and had then asked him whether he had shown her note to Mr. Bygrave before the experiment was tried? He had answered in the negative, as the only safe form of reply that he could think of on the spur of the moment; and the housekeeper had thereupon addressed him in these strange and startling words: "You are keeping the truth from me, Mr. Noel. You are trusting strangers, and doubting your old servant and your old friend. Every time you go to Mr. Bygrave's house, every time you see Miss Bygrave, you are drawing nearer and nearer to your destruction. They have got the bandage over your eyes in spite of me; but I tell them, and tell you, before many days are over I will take it off!" To this extraordinary outbreak—accompanied as it was by an expression in Mrs. Lecount's face which he had never seen there before—Mr. Noel Vanstone made no reply. Mr. Bygrave's conviction that there was a lurking taint of insanity in the housekeeper's blood had recurred to his memory, and he had left the room at the first opportunity.

Captain Wragge listened with the closest attention to the narrative thus presented to him. But one conclusion could be drawn from it—it was a plain warning to him to hasten the end.

"I am not surprised," he said, gravely, "to hear that you are inclining more favorably to my opinion. After what you have just told me, Mr. Vanstone, no sensible man could do otherwise. This is becoming serious. I hardly know what results may not be expected to follow the communication of your approaching change of life to Mrs. Lecount. My niece may be involved in those results. She is nervous; she is sensitive in the highest degree; she is the innocent object of this woman's unreasoning hatred and distrust. You alarm me, Sir! I am not easily thrown off my balance; but I acknowledge you alarm me for the future." He frowned, shook his head, and looked at his visitor despondently.

Mr. Noel Vanstone began to feel uneasy. The change in Mr. Bygrave's manner seemed ominous of a reconsideration of his proposals from a new and an unfavorable point of view. He took counsel of his inborn cowardice and his inborn cunning, and proposed a solution of the difficulty discovered by himself.

"Why should we tell Lecount at all?" he asked. "What right has Lecount to know? Can't we be married without letting her into the secret? And can't somebody tell her afterward, when we are both out of her reach?"

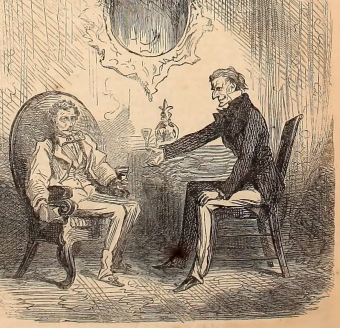
Captain Wragge received this proposal with an expression of surprise, which did infinite credit to his power of control over his own countenance. His foremost object throughout the interview had been to conduct it to this point—or, in other words, to make the first idea of keeping the marriage a secret from Mrs. Lecount emanate from Noel Vanstone instead of from himself. No one knew better than the captain that the only responsibilities which a weak man ever accepts are responsibilities which can be perpetually pointed out to him as resting exclusively on his own shoulders.

"I am accustomed to set my face against clandestine proceedings of all kinds," said Captain Wragge. "But there are exceptions to the strictest rules; and I am bound to admit, Mr. Vanstone, that your position in this matter is an exceptional position, if ever there was one yet. The course you have just proposed—however unbecoming I may think it; however distasteful it may be to myself—would not only spare you a very serious embarrassment (to say the least of it), but would also protect you from the personal assertion of those pecuniary claims on the part of your housekeeper to which you have already adverted. These are both desirable results to achieve—to say nothing of the removal, on my side, of all apprehension of annoyance to my niece. On the other hand, however, a marriage solemnized with such privacy as you propose must be a hasty marriage—for, as we are situated, the longer the delay, the greater will be the risk that our secret may escape our keeping. I am not against hasty marriages where a mutual flame is fanned by an adequate income. My own was a love-match, contracted in a hurry. There are plenty of instances in the experience of every one of short courtships and speedy marriages which have turned up trumps—I beg your pardon—which have turned out well after all. But if you and my niece, Mr. Vanstone, are to add one to the number of these cases, the usual preliminaries of marriage among the higher classes must be hastened by some means. You doubtless understand me as now referring to the subject of settlements?"

"I'll take another tea-spoonful of brandy," said Mr. Noel Vanstone, holding out his glass with a trembling hand as the word "settlements" passed Captain Wragge's lips.

"I'll take a tea-spoonful with you," said the captain, nimbly dismounting from the pedestal of his respectability, and sipping his brandy with the highest relish. Mr. Noel Vanstone, after nervously following his host's example, composed himself to meet the coming ordeal, with reclining head and grasping hands—in the position familiarly associated to all civilized humanity, with a seat in a dentist's chair.

The captain put down his empty glass, and got up again on his pedestal.



"We were talking of settlements," he resumed. "I have already mentioned, Mr. Vanstone, at an earlier period of our conversation, that my niece presents the man of her choice with no other dowry than the most inestimable of all gifts—the gift of herself. This circumstance, however (as you are no doubt aware), does not disentitle me to make the customary stipulations with her future husband. According to the usual course in this matter, my lawyer would see yours—consultations would take place—delays would occur—strangers would be in possession of your intentions—and Mrs. Lecount would, sooner or later, arrive at that knowledge of the truth which you are anxious to keep from her. Do you agree with me so far?"

Unutterable apprehension closed Mr. Noel Vanstone's lips. He could only reply by an inclination of the head.

"Very good," said the captain. "Now, Sir, you may possibly have observed that I am a man of a very original turn of mind. If I have not hitherto struck you in that light, it may then be necessary to mention that there are some subjects on which I persist in thinking for myself. The subject of marriage settlements is one of them. What, let me ask you, does a parent or guardian in my present position usually do? After having trusted the man whom he has chosen for his son-in-law with the sacred deposit of a woman's happiness, he turns round on that man, and declines to trust him with the infinitely inferior responsibility of providing for her pecuniary future. He fetters his son-in-law with the most binding document the law can produce, and employs with the husband of his own child the same precautions which he would use if he were dealing with a stranger and a rogue. I call such conduct as this inconsistent and unbecoming in the last degree. You will not find it my course of conduct, Mr. Vanstone; you will not find me preaching what I don't practice. If I trust you with my niece, I trust you with every inferior responsibility toward her and toward me. Give me your hand, Sir; tell me on your word of honor that you will provide for your wife as becomes her position and your means, and the question of settlements is decided between us from this moment, at once and forever!" Having carried out Magdalen's instructions in this lofty tone, he threw open his respectable frock-coat, and sat, with head erect and hand extended, the model of parental feeling, and the picture of human integrity.

For one moment Mr. Noel Vanstone remained literally petrified by astonishment. The next, he started from his chair, and wrung the hand of his magnanimous friend in a perfect transport of admiration. Never yet, throughout his long and varied career, had Captain Wragge felt such difficulty in keeping his countenance as he felt now. Contempt for the outburst of miserly gratitude of which he was the object; triumph in the sense of successful conspiracy against a man who had rated the offer of his protection at five pounds; regret at the lost opportunity of effecting a fine stroke of moral agriculture, which his dread of involving himself in coming consequences had forced him to let slip—all these varied emotions agitated the captain's mind; all strove together to find their way to the surface through the outlets of his face or his tongue. He allowed Mr. Noel Vanstone to keep possession of his hand, and to heap one series of shrill protestations and promises on another, until he had regained his usual mastery over himself. That result achieved, he put the little man back in his chair, and returned forthwith to the subject of Mrs. Lecount.

"Suppose we now revert to the difficulty which we have not conquered yet," said the captain. "Let us say that I do violence to my own habits and feelings; that I allow the considerations I have already mentioned to weigh with me; and that I sanction your wish to be united to my niece, without the knowledge of Mrs. Neucent. Allow me to inquire, in that case, what means you can suggest for the accomplishment of your end?"

"I can't suggest any thing," replied Mr. Noel Vanstone, helplessly. "Would you object to suggest for me?"

"You are making a bolder request than you think, Mr. Vanstone. I never do things by halves. When I am acting with my customary candor, I am fettered by considerations of the most unimportant nature. When exceptional circumstances compel me to take an opposite course, there isn't a slyer fox alive than I am. If, at your express request, I take off my honest English coat directly, and put on a dishonest one, I, purely out of sympathy for your awkward position, cannot be answerable for the result. Am I correct—I must have no unnecessary scruples to contend with on your part. If it is luck or nothing on my side, and luck or nothing on yours also?"

"Luck or nothing by all means," said Mr. Noel Vanstone, briskly, "on the understanding that you go first. I have no scruples about keeping Lecount in the dark. But she is devilish cunning, Mr. Bygrave. How is it to be done?"

"You shall hear directly," replied the captain. "Before I develop my views I should like to have your opinion on an abstract question of morality. What do you think, my dear Sir, of pious frauds in general?"

Mr. Noel Vanstone looked a little embarrassed by the question.

"Shall I put it more plainly?" continued Captain Wragge. "What do you say to a pious frauds accepted maxim, that 'all stratagems are fair in love and war?'—Yes, or No?"

"Yes!" answered Mr. Noel Vanstone, with the utmost readiness.

"One more question and I have done," said the captain. "Do you see any particular objection to practicing a pious fraud on Mrs. Lecount?"

Mr. Noel Vanstone's resolution began to falter a little.

"Is Lecount likely to find it out?" he asked, cautiously.

"She can't possibly discover it until after you are married, and out of her reach."

"You are sure of that?"

"Quite sure."

"Play any trick you like on Lecount," said Mr. Noel Vanstone, with an air of considerable relief. "I have had my suspicions lately that she is trying to dominieer over me; I am beginning to feel that I have borne enough already. I've had enough. I wish I was well rid of her."

"You shall have your wish," said Captain Wragge. "You shall be rid of her in a week or ten days."

Mr. Noel Vanstone rose eagerly and approached the captain's chair.

"You don't say so!" he exclaimed. "How do you mean to send her away?"

"I mean to send her on a journey," replied Captain Wragge.

"Where?"

"From your house at Aldborough to her brother's bedside at Zurich."

Mr. Noel Vanstone started back at the answer, and returned suddenly to his chair.

"How can you do that?" he inquired, in the greatest perplexity. "Her brother (hang him!) is much better. She had another letter from Zurich to say so, this morning."

"Did you see the letter?"

"Yes. She always worries about her brother she would show it to me."

"Was it from? and what did it say?"

"It was from the doctor—he always writes to her. I don't care two straws about her brother, and I don't remember much of the letter, except that it was a short one. The fellow was much better; and if the doctor decided to write no more it might take it for granted that he was getting well. That was the substance of it."

"Did you notice where she put the letter when you gave it her back again?"

"Yes. She put it in the drawer where she keeps her account-books."

"Can you get at that drawer?"

"Of course I can. I have got a duplicate key—I always insist on a duplicate key of the place where she keeps her accounts. I go to her allow the account-books to be locked up from my inspection: it's a rule of the house."

"Be so good as to get that letter now, Mr. Vanstone, without your housekeeper's knowledge; and add to the favor by letting me have it here privately for an hour or two."

"What do you want it for?"

"I have some suggestions to ask before I can tell you. Have you any intimate friend at Zurich whom you could trust to help you in playing a trick on Mrs. Lecount?"

"What sort of help do you mean?" asked Mr. Noel Vanstone.

"Suppose," said the captain, "you were to send a letter addressed to Mrs. Lecount at Aldborough, inclosed in another letter addressed to one of your friends abroad? And suppose you were to instruct that friend to write a mysterious pretical joke by posting Mrs. Lecount's letter at Zurich? Can you know any one who could be trusted to do that?"

"I know two people who could be trusted!" cried Mr. Noel Vanstone. "Mrs. Bygrave and Sydenham's—both bitter enemies of Lecount's. But what is your drift, Mr. Bygrave? Though I am not usually wanting in penetration, I don't often offer one your drift."

"You shall see it directly, Mr. Vanstone." With these words he rose, withdrew to his desk in the corner of the room, and returned to it with a sheet of note-paper. After first reading them carefully to himself, he beckoned to Mr. Noel Vanstone to come and read them too.

"A few minutes since," said the captain, pointing complacently to his own composition with the feather end of his pen, "I had the honor of suggesting a pious fraud on Mrs. Lecount. There it is!"

He resigned his chair at the writing-table to his visitor. Mr. Noel Vanstone sat down, and read these lines:

"MY DEAR MADAM,—Since I last wrote I deeply regret to inform you that your brother has suffered a relapse. The symptoms are so serious that it is my painful duty to prepare you for the worst. The doctor, in his anxiety to exert every effort to retain the renewed progress of the malady, does not hesitate to put last night's letter of yours, which you have sent to my conscience to leave you in ignorance of a serious circumstance. I refer to the worse, which may be attended by fatal results. With much sympathy, I remain, etc., etc., etc."

Captain Wragge waited with some anxiety for the effect which this letter might produce. Mean, selfish, and cowardly as he was, Mr. Noel Vanstone might feel some compunction at sacrificing entirely his brother-in-law's interests, and on a woman who stood toward him in the position of a mother. On the other hand, if he acted faithfully, however interested her motives might be—she had lived, since he was a lad, in the full possession of his father's confidence—she was living now under the protection of his own roof. Would he fail to remember this; and, remembering it, could he find in the letter any hesitation to the scheme which was now proposed to him? Captain Wragge's experienced mind found relief enough in human nature to doubt it. To his surprise, and, it must be added, to his relief also, Mr. Noel Vanstone gave no sign of hesitation whatever. He looked up from the letter with unfeigned astonishment.

"Why, Bygrave, you are as good as Figaro in the French comedy. Talking of Frenchmen, there is a terrible mistake in this clever letter of yours—it is written in the wrong language. When the doctor writes to Lecount he writes in French. Perhaps you meant me to translate it? You can't manage without me, I see, after all. Let me help you, I pray, as I have done before. Just look at me! I'll translate it, while I sit here, in two strokes of the pen."

He completed the translation almost as rapidly as Captain Wragge had produced the original. "Wait a minute!" he cried, in high critical triumph at discovering another defect in the composition of his ingenious friend. "The doctor always dates his letters. Here is no date to yours."

"I leave the date to you," said the captain, with a sardonic smile. "You have discovered the fault, my dear Sir, you correct it!"

Mr. Noel Vanstone mentally looked into the great pool which separated Zurich from that can discover a defect from the faculty that can apply a remedy—and, following the example of his instructor, wrote at the top of the letter:

"I couldn't think of taking the liberty," he said, politely. "Perhaps you had a motive for leaving the date out?"

"Perhaps I had," replied Captain Wragge, with the utmost composure. "The date must depend on the time a letter takes to get to Zurich. I have had no experience on that point—you must have had plenty of experience in your father's time. Give me the benefit of your information, and we will add the date before you leave the writing-table."

Mr. Noel Vanstone's experience was, as Captain Wragge had anticipated, quite adequate to settle the question of time. The railway communication between Continent (in those days hundred and forty-seven) were but scanty; and a letter sent, at that period, from England to Zurich, and back again, rarely left the writer's hands occupied ten days in making the double journey by post.

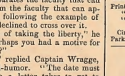
"Date the letter, in French, five days on from to-morrow," said the captain, when he had heard this answer. "I am sure it is the safest thing is to let me have the doctor's note as soon as you can. I am obliged to procure a certain extra before I can copy your translation in an exact imitation of the doctor's handwriting. Have you any other little commissions, my dear? have a few sheets; and send, at the same time, an envelope addressed to one of those long blue envelopes that Zurich, accompanied by the necessary request to post the inclosure. That is all I can think of at present, Mr. Vanstone. Don't let me seem inhospitable—but the sooner you can supply me with my materials, the better I shall be pleased to get to work."

Mr. Noel Vanstone rose, and looked at his companion for some moments in silence. Was this man going to grave treachery in six sparks upon the smooth and honorable surface of his own nature? He asked the question mentally, but not, even in his own mind, in so many words.

"We must be careful," replied Captain Wragge. "I don't forbid to-morrow; but I make no promise beyond that. Permit me to remind you that we have got Mrs. Lecount to manage for the next ten days."

"I wish Lecount was at the bottom of the German Ocean!" exclaimed Mr. Noel Vanstone, fervently. "It's all very well for you to manage her—you don't live in the house. What am I to do?"

"I'll tell you to-morrow," said the captain. "Go out for your walk alone and drop in here, as you dropped in to-day, at two o'clock. In the mean time, don't forget those things I want you to send me. Seal them up together in a large envelope. When you have done that, ask Mrs. Lecount to walk out with you as usual, and while she is out of doors putting her bonnet on send the servant across to me. You understand? Good-morning."



An hour afterward the sealed envelope, with its inclosures, reached Captain Wragge in perfect safety. The double task of exactly imitating a strange handwriting, and accurately copying words written in a language with which he was but slightly acquainted, presented more difficulties to be overcome than the captain had anticipated. He grew clever o'clock before the employment which he had undertaken was successfully completed, and the letter to Zurich ready for the post.

Before going to bed he walked out on the deserted parade to breathe the cool night air. All the lights were extinguished in Sea-View Cottage, when he looked that way, except the light in the housekeeper's room. Captain Wragge shook his head suspiciously. He had gained experience enough, by this time, to distrust the wakefulness of Mrs. Lecount.

THE SHADOW UNDER THE YEW.

THERE sits a shadow under the yew,
Who, sun or moon, or light or dark,
Waits with a cruel glober and grin
In the blind night or by the star-spark;
Or whether it rain with lashing rage,
Or whether it blow with a devil's force,
Sitting and counting the fresh-graved graves,
And the big spider, each one o'er a corse.

Under the shade of the church-yard yew
The dark thing sits and counts the graves,
That Dead Sea—lulled in a treacherous calm
That billows around him in grass-green waves.
And when I see him I read so soft,
And I scarcely dare to draw my breath,
For hearse-plume black is the yew-tree's shade,
And the name of that terrible shape is DEATH.

A GALLANT COLOR-BEARER.

We publish on the preceding page an illustration of the incident recorded in the following paragraph:

"TOUCHING DEVOTION TO THE FLAG.—H. ALEXANDER, Fifty-first Colonel of the 10th New York Regiment, deserves to be placed high upon the roll of our heroes. He received three terrible wounds in a recent engagement, but clung to his color-staff with tenacious grasp. While being taken into the hospital he became insensible, and an attempt was made to take the flag away, but his unconscious hand held it more powerfully; even then his rolling position was strong. Such men in life and death are glorious examples."

Our picture is a just homage to distinguished gallantry.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1862.

THE NEW CAMPAIGN.

THE leading events of the week which has elapsed since we last wrote have been the retreat of the national forces to Washington, after a series of battles, and the invasion of Maryland by the rebels. These transactions have filled the public mind with chagrin, and, loud complaint against the Administration and its generals in the field have appeared in leading journals. Presses not suspected of lukewarmness in the cause have not scrupled to declare that the campaign has thus far been productive of nothing but disgrace to the national arms, and that useless new radical changes—meaning, we presume, in the military leaders, or in the general policy of the war—be instantly effected, we may as well ascertain at once.

It is quite likely that the practical effort of this sort of writing may be beneficial. It may spur some conservatives generated to unwonted exertion. It may rouse the Administration to fresh efforts on behalf of the country. In this point of view such complaints are not wholly to be regretted.

But they are none the less very unjust and very unmanly. There can be nothing more contemptible than the habit of whining and abusing our Generals, and demanding changes in the Government whenever reverses befall our arms. Reverses are inevitable in war. No General is always successful—not even Napoleon, or Alexander, or Cæsar. A wise people will be satisfied with winning two battles out of three, and will not reproach their General for losing the third. If we were contending against but a handful of Mexicans or Chinese it might be singular to see our armies fall back and our territory invaded. But it must always be remembered, especially by those who are forever praising about the superior power of the North, that we are contending against some of the best, if not the best, army of whom is under arms, and whose energy is fired by confiscation bills, the fear of negro emancipation, the love of independence, and the dread of subjugation. We at the North who, ever since the war began, have carried on our peaceful trade as usual, do not sufficiently realize that at the South no other business is being prosecuted but the war. Agriculture, industry, trade, even pleasure, have all given way to the war. Every man's hand and every man's purse have been thrown into the scale without stint or limit. We have the rebels been destitute of commanding intellects to guide them. Though it is generally admitted that there is no soldier in the South whose military capacity is equal to M'Clellan's, it would be idle to deny the ability of such men as Stonewall Jackson, Price, Lee, Stuart, and a score more of the rebel leaders. They have had to struggle against great disadvantages. But they have surmounted them, and have produced the contest with a vigor which can not be admired. To expect a uniform, unvarying, and rapid succession of triumphs in the contest we are now waging against this people, time fed, is entirely unwarrantable. We shall do well, and all that could be expected, if we win more than half the battles fought, and preserve strength enough to achieve our purpose when, in the nature of things, the strength of our enemy shall have been exhausted.

A retrospect of the events of the current year will justify the assertion that our armies have, on the whole, done well; that we have accomplished as much as reflecting men expected us to accomplish in the time; and that there is nothing in the present condition of affairs which was not foreseen, or which involves any serious danger for the future.

In February last the rebels held three-fourths of Kentucky, including Bowling Green and Columbus; five-sixths of Missouri; all of Virginia except the mountain region; and the whole of the Gulf States except a sea-island or two on the coast of South Carolina. Their pickets were in sight of Washington, and completely blockaded the Potomac. They had, notwithstanding the blockade, a considerable foreign trade. The Mississippi and the Tennessee and Fort Pickens was the only spot in the original Confederacy which was still held by the United States. Such were the conditions of the country months ago. It is understood that it was General M'Clellan's intention not to commence the attack toward the end of March. Accident and outside pressure hastened matters, and the fall of Forts Henry and Donelson, the evacuation of Bowling Green and Columbus, and the expulsion of the rebels from Missouri, opened the campaign in the West. Then followed, in rapid succession, the capture of Roanoke and the expulsion of the rebels from Northern Tennessee, the substantial victory of Shiloh, the evacuation of Corinth, and the capture of Island No. 10—transactions gave us the command of West Tennessee and the Mississippi River as far South as Memphis. Simultaneously General Curtis had annexed Northern Arkansas, General Mitchell recovered Northern Alabama, General Butler took the most important city in the whole Confederacy—New Orleans, and General Morgan occupied the valuable strategic position of Cumberland Gap. Not one of these victories was since lost. Our troops still hold Nashville, Fort Donelson, Memphis, Corinth, Helena, Huntsville, New Orleans, Cumberland Gap, and our vessels hold the river, with the exception of a few miles above and below Vicksburg. Meanwhile, at the East, the blockade of the Potomac has been mixed, we have retaken Norfolk and Yorktown, and we have rendered the coast blockade so perfect that not a single vessel there is now captured. The Peninsular expedition has proved a failure, through the interference of politicians, but not by the fault of the generals in command; but the James River is controlled by our gun-boats; we hold Albemarle and Pamlico Sounds and their rebel fleet, the Dismal Swamp Canal, and the town of Beaufort and Fort Macon.

We don't know what other people may think, but we consider the above a very great amount of work, and a pretty substantial list of victories and conquests for a single summer. With the exception of capture of Richmond, they have accomplished every thing we undertook; and considering the number, energy, and leadership of our enemy, it may well be doubted if more is done well to have only failed in one undertaking when we risked so many.

The programme for the future on both sides can be readily guessed at. If General M'Clellan had taken Richmond in June last, as was expected, and the rebel army been destroyed, his army would probably have lain quiet till the end of September, and would then have moved forward on Raleigh and Fort Fisher, and simultaneously with a move of the Western Army from Corinth upon Vicksburg on the one side, and Memphis upon the other, upon the other. The failure to take Richmond required the adoption of a new plan. Simultaneously, however, with M'Clellan's retreat, the call for 600,000 more men appeared; and this, by forcing the rebels to take the initiative in attacking us, deprived them of the advantage of the indefinite enjoyed by remaining on the defensive, and saved us the trouble of devising a new plan of campaign.

The plan adopted by the rebels has been obvious and simple. They dispatched the bulk of their army toward the Potomac, hoping to destroy Pope on the way, and resolved to carry the war at any cost into Maryland and Pennsylvania. Another column, which left Richmond the Sound stronger than is at present reported, was thrown into the Blue Grass Region of Kentucky, with a view to an invasion of Ohio. A third army was left under Bragg to watch Buell, and a fourth under Van Dorn and Breckinridge to attack Butler.

It may be said that this plan is suicidal, and that the invasion of the North by rebel armies can only exasperate the citizens whose armies but leaves the South exposed. This is very true; but what could the South do? With nearly 450,000 men in the field, the North had wrested three great States from the rebels, taken two leading sea-ports, destroyed a great rebel army, and overrun a great portion of the Confederacy in the course of six months. What might we not be expected to do with a million of soldiers, and a fleet of iron-clads? Can the rebels be blamed for acting with desperation?

From the hour that M'Clellan was ordered to evacuate Harrison's Landing the events which have since occurred were inevitable, and were foreseen by General Halleck. That evacuation, coupled with the call for 600,000 men, rendered a rebel advance on Washington certain; and the retrograde movement of Pope's army, which, which have filled as many minds with anguish, were foreseen and directed by General Halleck. It never was the intention of that accomplished soldier to prevent the rebels cutting their own throats if they were so minded.

THE LOUNGER.

GOOD CITIZENSHIP.

Good citizenship at this time does not consist in abject submission to every action of the Government, but in an obedience accompanied with candid criticism. This war is emphatically a people's war. The Government sincerely wishes to know the popular desire. Every mean and disloyal man will speak out, and therefore every loyal and true man must speak out also, that the Government may understand that meanness and disloyalty are not the characteristics of the nation.

The people lavishly give life and money at the call of the Government, which is but their representative. They yield to its action even when it seems harshest and unwisest. They see the labor corps organized and the right of speech abridged, because they fully understand that summary measures are necessary in time of war, and they yield patiently because they see that, upon the whole, the action of the Government is wise, and that they are sure that the men at the head of affairs are personally honest and unselfish.

But if, while they lose no opportunity to support the most summary of fundamental rights, they come to see that the action of the Government is not wise, but foolish—if they see incompetency promoted and ability cashiered; if they see imbecility honored and energy repudiated; if they see that the active energy and ability which prevails over that of hearty faith in the cause and the people; if they see that the Government apparently doubts whether the people sincerely wish to conquer the rebels—there is no way left for them but to insist that they are not cynical; that they mean victory and union, and peace, and not surrender.

But if they hold their tongues, under pretense of good citizenship, how is the Government ever to know what is essential for it to comprehend? Obedience is necessary, but silent obedience may easily be the worst treachery. To co-operate with the Government is at this moment the duty of every good citizen; but to enlighten and stimulate the Government is not less his duty. If the Government knows that the people are ready to resist its execution, but to endeavor to procure its repeal. Not to endeavor is to betray the country. It is treachery, and not loyalty. It is disloyal rebellion, not good citizenship.

Good citizenship consists not only in holding up the hands, but the heart and the head of the Government; and that we do not by sullen and hopeless silence, but by free discussion.

TWO WAYS.

THERE are but two ways out of the war.

The rebel runs with the iron fence having failed, the rebel armies having failed, and the Grand Duke having sold his men that they had tried to hold too much, they are now trying to hold more. In the agonies of failure the strain upon the energy of the rebellion being exhaustive, they have gathered their force for one desperate and frantic blow, feeling that what they demand from Europe will not be refused them if they demand it from Washington and the whole North at once.

At this moment they threaten both the capital and the Northwest. At this instant the barbarous hordes of slavery menace Ohio, the Northern confederation under the American Union. With a military force which they have never before put before admiration, with a rapidity of movement and a power of concentration which accord with the audacity of their effort, they have crossed our armies across Eastern Virginia and to the Ohio River; and while we write the issue of the struggle which we shall see in Richmond, we are now wondering how soon Washington will be seen.

Behind this army we see the sources of its strength. We see a perfectly united population. There are no divisions of opinion. The most successful General is by acclamation called to the head. Jackson is every where; Beauregard, the idol of last year, is every where. The disputes about policy, for their policy is to strike and wound the enemy wherever they can reach him, at once are no party feuds, for the overwhelming party is that of Southern separation, and all other voices are forcibly hushed. There is no such unity, important information, for the Union men are pardyzed, and war correspondence is practically forbidden. The Northern region is one. The Southern whites are an army. Not a word to weaken, not a thought to distract, is uttered or prayed, nor a dead dose, but for the success of the war which is consuming their very vitals.

But although it all, why, with all our overwhelming numbers, with our amazing power and resources, with the substantial political unanimity of our cause—why have we not long ago swept them away as these autumn winds sweep the red leaves from the trees? Why are we on this day watering our horses in the Gulf instead of turning their heads to the Susquehanna?

Simply because, while we are confessedly fighting for the Union, we are not united. Because while the enemy has one purpose, we have two. Because we have had to be taught by tragical and bloody experience that fifty thousand men, and a terrible earnestness of purpose, moving with concentrated unity of thought, and handled by skillful leaders, who hate the cause of their foe more than the foe himself, will beat and rout five times their number of doubtful, hesitating, quarreling opponents.

Why, with a population so disproportionate to theirs, have the rebels met us every where in force? Simply because we have allowed them to. Because we have not made the whole North a camp and a breast-work of the many mouths of the Mississippi, and a fleet of iron-clads to send our best and bravest against guns which we have ourselves loaded.

Long ago, just after Sumter, Braxton Bragg told us why they would always beat us. Last month the Richmond Examiner told us why they would meet us man for man wherever we came. The South, it said, will send all its youth. The women and old men can take care of the crops and themselves who rains Bragg in Tex," said Braxton Bragg. "the Northerners can't come; they must look out for their crops and mine work."

They say it to our faces, and we fall back stumbling over our mountains of dead. They say it to our faces, and the world rents with contemptuous laughter at the people which insists upon helping its enemies who work for life, while the hearts of breaking the back-bone of a rebellion which it has not dare to touch.

What is the consequence? The rebels see that we are not in deadly earnest. The whole world is forced to see it. The rebels, with their zeal, how can we help failing back? For the rebel, mean victory at every cost whatever. We mean victory if we can have it without losing the slaves. We might as well say that we mean victory if we can have it by squirting molasses at the rebels.

Mr. Thomas, at the Boston meeting, says that the war can be ended only by the people. That thing will not do it, nor voting, nor confiscation bills, nor tax bills, nor emancipation bills. But why did he not finish his sentence?—Rightly will not do it, gun-boats will not do it, nor Armstrong cannon, nor Columbiads, nor Parrott guns. Not one method will end it, but all combined will crush it. And the failure or unwillingness to employ one method paralyzes all the rest.

Our own knowledge and experience, the nature of the struggle, and the events of the campaign, show us that slavery is a source of immense strength to the rebels—a thousand-fold more than any sort of power in the northern free states in the South. Well, can we afford to present them gun and ammunition? We do not mean to give them guns as well as mean to use those they have. And we do give them men to use their guns so long as we do not know how not to stop at arms and hoe corn, or look after those who do.

Let us repeat that the issue of the struggle for the foe in slavery we will destroy it. And that there is both strength and terror for them in the late order of Gen. Hunter, by which Messrs. Hunter and Phelps show plainly enough. The man who whispers the word Freedom to the slaves shall in a twinkling of an eye, be a free, good friend, and is the very man we want. Jeff Davis knows what will hurt him, if we do not.

There are but two ways.

Either we must give it up, which no sane man will think of for a moment, or we swing that the Government will do what we the people wish, the solid mouse of the North must demand of the Government, with unmistakable resolution, that we wish all means, including an edict of emancipation, to be used, so that the end of the rebellion may be sudden, swift, overwhelming, and final. The rebels, Europe, and our own people will understand that we are in deadly earnest, and then we count every chance less dangerous to mankind than that of the success of the rebellion.

THE DUTY OF THE HOUR.

THERE has been some discussion in consultation of Governors. Let us hope that the result will be the putting under arms of every capable man in the Free States. Pennsylvania, the State hardest especially threatened, moves first. Her people, natural to the manner, are going to do now what the people of Louisiana, furthest from their enemy, did a year ago. If we had learned of the rebels and followed them, step by step, we could at this moment have an organized and disciplined army in every State.

Shall we wait in each State until it is threatened? Are we never to understand that we are to maintain a standing army at all times? Let New York, at least, move. Let the whole uniformed militia be armed and called out and regularly drilled. Let the militia system be thus suspended by command of the State, until we are in a condition that the State Government can rest at six hours' notice wherever they are wanted, and be effective soldiers when they get there.

This thing only is certain, that it will be thoroughly aroused. Then we shall insist that we have the right to command the whole military capacities of great commanders, and that war shall be made as war ought to be made—to cripple and destroy the enemy.

The proof that we are aroused will be the arming and drilling of the unenlisted militia.

THE FOE AT HOME.

THE true enemies of the country at this moment are not in the field, but are found frankly in arms, but they are those among ourselves who constantly oppose the measures of the Administration for vigor. They do this by declaiming against all who wish to save the Government at every cost, and to the end of the rebels of the abolitionists as their slaves, of "abolitionists" and "radicals."

The real friends of this city are the men who were the active sympathizers of the conspiracy until the mass of earnest and loyal citizens compelled their silence. These men, who, when they dared, they have bawled with equal lustiness for the Union and against secession, they call abolitionists and radicals. They are the men who bate the American doctrine of liberty and equal rights for all men, and say that they do the rebellion to establish the principle that rich men shall own poor ones. They are the men who support the slaveholding aristocracy of the country against the great mass of honest and hard-working free laborers. They are the men who by their sympathy with the leaders of the North-West, now allow the rebellion to be strengthened by slavery, the colored man still bids the worst use of his hands and the bread out of the mouths of the North.

ers while men. They are the men who, if Jeff Davis should send to-morrow, would rush and fall upon him, and say that they did all they could to help him by preserving slavery and shooting the North.

Those are the men who assume to denounce as radicals, and fanatics, and impracticables those who wish to use common sense in war, and to beat the enemy instead of allowing him to beat us. Those are the men who will be responsible for any real catastrophe that may befall the great cause of the country. Those are the men who will compromise that country with the vengeance of Mr Chief-Justice Army if the people do not decide that the people should require its removal. These are the men who menace the President with terrible consequences if he listens to the pure and patriotic impulse and counsel of the country, instead of allowing himself to be led by those who love party more than they hate anarchy.

Let every honest man in the land judge this thing by what they were and what they are. Let us not ask himself whether they would seriously injure if the country were not saved, but whether they are not the men at the North whom the rebels most love. Above all, let him ask whether such men are radically false to Liberty and humanity can be true to a Union which was formed to help both.

A FACT.

A FRIEND, and a well-known gentleman in the city, writes: "I enjoy the leaders in your last week's Harper's Register. It is important now as a fact. Will you give it circulation among the sons of Spaniards of the states of Harper's Weekly?"

"The following are extracts of a letter from a gentleman of great distinction, high in the public confidence, and in his private character, as I believe, one of the best of men:

"DEAR SIR,—I have read with great delight the article—'The State Question,' in the Register of March 1, 1862. It is worth all, and more than all, that has been said in Congress on the subject. The paragraph, 'As the ground to the people,' etc., is the very essence of true and true.

"I own 400 of acres of land in Georgia. It is on sea. My agent has given me a statement of its product for year 1861: 1100 bushels of corn, 200 of rice, 100 of sweet potatoes, 300 pounds of cotton, 100 gallons of molasses, 100 pounds of pork, 100 of beef, 100 of chickens, etc., of fruit.

"Only 150 acres are cleared: my object was rather preservation of timber and the log-houses than my profit.

"The above product was from the labor of seventeen hands, and two of his sons, with one yoke of oxen and two horses. Not a slave touched the process. For the farm I receive annually from one of the largest products in market was fairly worth $1600, which is exclusive price I paid for the land.

"As you and I are, I am happy to say, like-minded, I am sure you will think with some satisfaction."—Miller's Register, vol. xviii. p. 41.

"PHILIP."

THACKERAY'S new novel is now published. Those who have not read it in the serial form will very have ample opportunity to do so, and at small opportunity, because the war has stopped so many persons that very few books of any kind demand attention except those about the war.

The new story has the old flavor, the old excellence. The same neat, simple, clear English style; the same homely, simple, affectionate moralizing; the same reality of portraiture in the characters; the same wit and sharp satire; the same masterly boldness for tender, long-loving, long-suffering women; the same manly sense and sound and unperturbed bodies. The work is sure to take away the taste of "Loved the Widower" from those who like it or like that story; and I believe that it is destined as "Pendennis" and the "Newcomes."

The interest of Thackeray still clusters about persons in "Philip." Those who have not liked him may find what is called his cynicism less salient here, and they will see what it is that has made the author of "Vanity Fair" one of the chief English novelists. Tompkyns preserved is a story which they are fat and touchsome, it will be long before you tire.

In a late Roundabout Paper Thackeray tries a little to placate criticism. A man must do what he can, he says. A pear-tree can bear pears, and no more. Let us think about the things and the people that we daily see, and like to see. If you are lucky, go on. As for us, we will not be made the author of "Vanity Fair" one of the chief English novelists. Tompkyns preserved is a story which they are fat and touchsome, it will be long before you tire.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A PROPOSITION of a cotton-mill, who is something of a philosopher, posted up on the factory-gate the following notice: "No operative will be discharged unless detected." When asked for an explanation, he said, "The one will set a thousand others to thinking how they can escape the gain. I won't admit such inflammable and dangerous things into my establishment as a bad habit."

Sydney Smith tells of a maid who used to boil the eggs very well by her master's watch, but one day he could not find it in the house. It was at last found in the pot of tea, time from the kitchen clock, and the eggs came up nearly raw. "Why, you stupid girl," said her master, "the clock as you do from the watch, Mary?" "Well, Sir, I thought there was not much in the breakfast, and the watch larger."

Miss Betty inquired of the servant-girl if she came from the Hungarian parts of Ireland? On being told that her questioner's brain was somewhat defective, she excused herself by saying, "I hasn't much brain'r; I never would be called on one, for I have only room in the upper story, and we hasn't no candle, and the master didn't come."

A clergyman at a funeral, when at the grave-side, said to the chief mourner, "Sir, I am sorry to see you weep. I received the painting answer, "Neither; it is only a watch."

Malherbe having dined with the Bishop of Rouen, who was a dull preacher, was asked by him to adjourn from the table to the church. He replied, "I am going to preach."

"Pardon me," said Malherbe, "but I can sleep very well where I am."

The Court of Divorce has been engaged in hearing a case of incompatibility of temper. The husband says he was on the ground that he was a lunatic at the time of the marriage. Counsel replied that the plaintiff's case will not be granted, as it may separate half the young couples in the country.

A man in Rochester, who has suffered from dums, makes the following proposition: That in order to save time and unnecessary trouble, he will hand one hour every day for a week at a certain corner of the town, where all who feel disposed to pay him can do so, making impertinent questions may have the opportunity of a hearing, always provided that the knowledge of each such day shall not be disturbed by applications of any kind.

"How much to publish this death?" asked a customer of a newspaper-man. "Only a dollar, Sir." "Four shillings, you mean." "Not two shillings the last time I published one."

"That was a common death; but this is shockingly recognized."

"I'll tell you what," said the applicant, "your secretion will not be put to that expense."

A man who owned a farm in Sacramento, California, during the late floods, went to see if his fence was washed away. He found that he had not his fence, but had caught a fine strawberry bed, which made him a good deal better off than before.

Be not angry that you can not make others as you wish them to be, since you can not make yourself as you wish to be.

SUCH IS LIFE!

OUT there fifty cannon over heads with hair,
Afterward quickly mown them bare!
First cuts our teeth with a mighty fun,
Anon takes care that our teeth "cut" us;
First tumbletowns us tinkle legs,
And then converts them to "old old legs."
Teaches a boy to be a man,
Teaches a man to be a child again.
Heaves thereafter by care and doubt,
Fighting for stars we might do without,
Hoping and trusting for bliss to come,
Which, when it comes, we reach the tomb!

EVEN DON'T LIE.—It is more difficult to make the eye lie than any other organ we are possessed of. To tell what is wrong, and what is right, is no language. If you wish to ascertain what she means, pay attention to her eyes. Such is a peculiarity which is one of the noblest gifts to the world; to look this opposition, however, is more difficult than to speak.

An old sailor, passing through a grave-yard, saw on one of the tombstones, "I still live." It was too much for the tar, and striking his cap, he ejaculated, "Well, I'm hanged say that there are cases in which a man may lie, but I've never seen one."

Two boys, of tender age, who were by the names of Tom and Jack, became members of a district school in a certain town. One day the master, Mr Simmons, the teacher called them up before the assembled school, and proceeded to ask them a few questions in geography. "Now, Tom," said he, "where is Boston?" "Please, Sir," said the teacher to ask, "what is your name?" "Tom, Sir," very promptly responded the boy. "Then you may ask your school. Remember always to speak the full name. You should have said Thomas, Sir," turning to the other boy, whose appearance has suddenly lighted up with the satisfaction of a newly-acquired knowledge. "I am," he answered. "Now, then, can you tell me what your name is?" "Jack-son, Sir," replied the lad, in a tone of confident decision.

There is a class of people who ask you why you "don't write a book for the times, as every body else?" They are nearly related to the gentleman who has always got a "bill to file" in his pocket, and who is afraid to draw it out from him.

A lecturer was dilating upon the powers of the magnet, defying any one to show or name any thing surpassing its power. "Why," replied a young urchin, "I can pull you, who, when young, used to attract him thirteen miles every morning."

"Are you there?" said an Orangeman to a Ribbonman in "grub," being about to be hanged. "I always said you would come to this, you scoundrel." "You're a liar, and Tat," if it was the last word I had to speak! I did not say I would not."

"Well, Sambo, how do you like your new place?" "Oh, massa, I likes it very well, but I has to get up mighty early in the morning?" "Why?" "Why, you massa bind two eggs for breakfast, and I has to get up before I knows it."

A countryman perceiving one of his friends take much upon him because he was born in London said, "Have not we as much right to be born there?"

"Are you thinking of what I'm saying," said a poor music-master to young Nox —, after explaining to her as many times as he could, the difference between sol and minor key. "Why, Sir," replied Miss —, "I've been thinking of no time whatever; keys are very or less."

What is most likely to become a woman?—A little girl.

"I stand upon the soil of freedom!" cried a stump orator. "No," exclaimed his shoemaker; "you stand in a pair of leather boots, which I made for you."

"Let each one strive with all his might
To be a decent man,
To love a woman for himself,
Upon the golden plan.
And if his lordship chance to be
A pretty female woman,
Let him be sure to marry her—you see,
That's only acting human."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

☞ For an account of the movement on Cincinnati see page 600.

THE INVASION OF MARYLAND.

FREDERICK CITY, the capital of Frederick County, Maryland, was occupied by the rebel army on the morning of the 6th o'clock on Saturday morning. Part of the force then entered Hagerstown, and the remainder took the direction to the Washington road to the Baltimore pike. The crossing of the Potomac was effected at three points, of which Noland's Ferry was one. Colonel Geary left Frederick Saturday. His report that General Hill is in command of a force of five thousand men, cavalry, infantry, and artillery. He had issued a proclamation promising protection to private property, and to those who remained peaceable. Private accounts state that the enemy crossed the Potomac Friday night, and that Jackson joined them in the morning, and threw to White Oak Springs, within three miles of Frederick. Geary's force, consisting of but two regiments, was ordered to do as he speedily and quiet a manner as possible. They left at once, and burned the railroad wires, and the railroad bridges over the Monocacy, which was done. The rebels entered Frederick at 10 o'clock, and occupied it on Friday. Rebpacs were hastily sent to Harrisburg and Baltimore, announcing the fact. A dispatch from Harrisburg announces that the rebel pickets are extended within twelve miles of Hagerstown. They took possession of all the stores and banks in Frederick, and paid for them in United States Treasury Notes.

PREPARATIONS TO MEET THEM.

On Saturday night the following orders were made aware of the facts, and General Sumner's corps left at once for Frederick City. Gen. Mc Clellan Burnside and Geary left, and in the afternoon the General himself and staff followed. General Sumner's corps came up on the rear Mc Clellan's staff. General Sumner's corps has not with his corps. At the time of writing Gen. Burnside is in command of Washington, and General Heintzelman are believed to be operating on the south shore of the Potomac.

THE BATTLE OF CHANTILLY.

A severe engagement occurred on 1st inst., near Chantilly, about two miles north of Fairfax Court House, between a portion of General Pope's army and Stonewall Jackson's command. The enemy was finally repulsed and driven back. Over four hundred of their dead were buried, and many Sixteen were killed. The field of battle is described as covering a space of about three miles square. Gen. Kearney and General Stevens were killed. The whole army then fell back to the fortifications.

MCCLELLAN IN COMMAND.

GENERAL MCCLELLAN, in an order dated on the 5th inst., has assumed command of the fortifications of Washington, and of all the troops for the defence of the capital, and has required such retirees to be made to him as will enable him in the shortest possible time to understand thoroughly the positions of the various corps, and to place them in comfor he immediate service. All the troops of the army of Virginia have been placed under his command.

SEIZURES OF ARMS.

Brigadier-General Julius White, in command in Maryland, General Wool, at Baltimore, Virginia, on the 5th, states that four hundred of the enemy's cavalry who attempted to capture Leesburg had been defeated, with loss of about fifty prisoners, horses and arms, which are now in the possession of the Union troops. The rest was in a wounded and eight wounded.

PENNSYLVANIA AROUSED.

Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, has issued a proclamation recommending the immediate organization throughout that State of volunteer companies and regiments to drill every week for action out of doors, in order to enter active operations for defence and instruction, all places of business be closed on Saturday, and that the citizens of that all persons employed therein may, after that hour, be at liberty to attend to their military duties.

Arrangements are being made to dispatch to the army of General Wool, at Baltimore, a large force of heavy artillery, and other regiments from this State and New Jersey, to defend Baltimore and Washington. The rebels are approaching themselves into compact under the Governor's proclamation, and the Governor has issued orders for the organization of Home Guards in Harrisburg, Chambersburg, Franklin County, Pennsylvania, is thoroughly aroused. Governor Curtin has issued his call for 50,000 men for the organization of the Pennsylvania militia. The citizens are reported to have already 30,000 recruits at Harrisburg.

GENERAL BUELL'S ARMY.

It is stated that Stevenson, Alabama, was recently attacked by Kirby Smith, but without success. It is said the same State, has been burned by our troops. General Buell has left Chattanooga and is said to be marching on Nashville. In confirmation of the latter report a dispatch from Chattanooga says that General Buell has ordered the evacuation of that city.

THE CONDITION OF NEW ORLEANS.

General Butler's order for a general disarmament of the population of New Orleans has been carried out, and all has transpired, but the authorities intend to endeavor to give no trouble. On the 26th ult. a number of rebel flags and guns were dispatched by General Butler to make a reconnoissance in the direction of Lake Pontchartrain, and they had not been stopped by the approach of a band of guerrillas and secession sympathizers, the result would have been the wounding of most of our men, who were compelled to retire to the fortifications without having accomplished the undertaking. At last accounts Baton Rouge was still in the hands of the rebels. A company of artillery left the evacuation of two gun-boats. The place had not been destroyed by the rebels when the Federal troops left it on the 21st inst. Vicksburg. Carrollton was occupied by our forces, who were also in possession of Algiers, opposite the city. The Mississippi was in a satisfactory condition. Admiral Farragut and Flagler was personally superintending operations. The First Louisiana Regiment, Colonel Kenner, was still stationed at Carrollton, and a second is being raised. The Fifth Regiment was also in camp. Many families of rebel volunteers under General Butler's order has been commanded at New Orleans, and the order of the city continued good.

FROM Fortress Monroe it is reported that the Merrimac No. 2 has been seen before Hatteras Inlet, and also off Newport News. Rumors were prevalent that she had been seen off the coast of Newport News, but had no encounter with two of our gun-boats, driving them before her.

THE PIRATE "OCMULGEE."

The rebel steamer Ocmulgee, built at Liverpool and Nassau, was still at Cardenas at last accounts, and is reported to be loading with sugar. She has been there eight days. Her commander is John S. Maffit. A Spanish gun-boat has been sent from the city to watch her movements. The naval force at Key West had been augmented by the addition of several vessels, and the force ordered as requiring repairs, and not to leave for several days.—Another account says that the Ingraham is the vessel not so say matched.

THE "NEW IRONSIDES."

The Philadelphia Press says: "The New Ironsides, which has been undergoing repairs at the Navy-yard, has returned from her trial trip. She comes here to get her guns, ammunition, and stores on board, and then to proceed to sea. She is reported as being a complete success, and will extend the operations of the blockade."

THE DEATH OF MINNEGYA.

Under date of Fort Leavenworth, August 29, President Lincoln telegraphed Governor Ramsey, of Minnesota: "Absolved to die then. If the Indians will not forgive, of course it will not proceed. Necessity known no law. The Government can not control the case."

PERSONAL.

General Pope has, at his own request, been relieved from the command of the army of the Potomac, and has been assigned to the command of the Department of the Northwest.

General McDowell having been created leave of absence from duty for fifteen days, General Sumner has been assigned to the command of the corps.

Brigadier-General Stanley M. Mitchell has been assigned to the command of the Department of the West, and will immediately repair to Hilton Head.

General Thomas F. Meagher, Rhode Island, resigned his rank in the United States Senate last week, and the General Assembly of that State has been elected Governor Samuel G Arnold to fill his place for the remainder of the term, which expires March 4, 1863.

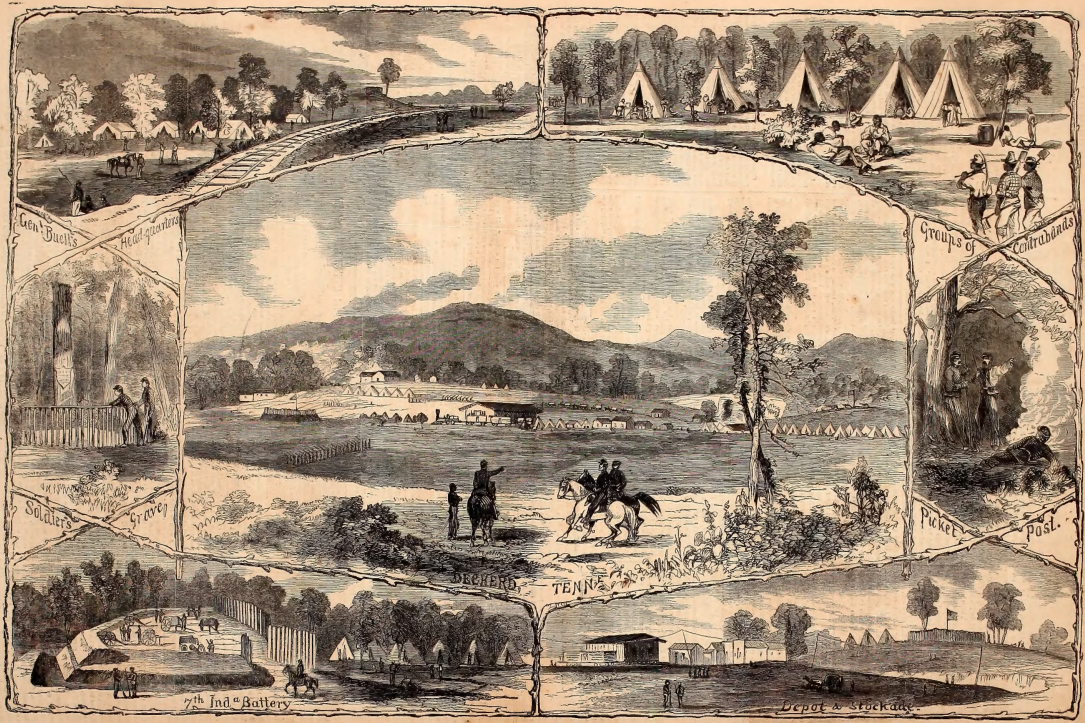
FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE "ORESCENT" NOT ALLOWED TO SAIL.

The United State gun-boat Tuscarora, after sailing at a British port, returned heavenly upon the arrival of the Oreto, a rebel vessels instead of proceeding to the Federal blockading squadron off the coast of Atlantic. Having been prevented from putting into Kingstown by the British revenue cutter Valiant, the Tuscarora then, according to a previous arrangement, she received a hundred tons of coal. From that port she was ordered away by a British revenue cutter. She is said to have gone to Queenstown.

LORD PALMERSTON ON THE "TRENT" AFFAIR.



Lord Palmerston, in the House of Commons, said that the affair of the Trent was "ended." The Premier said that the "honor, principles, and dignity of England" had been "properly maintained, and that to the settlement there was no triumph about it."

ITALY.

GARIBALDI'S MOVEMENTS.

A paragraph in the Opinione, attributed to the Emperor himself, states that France will defend the Pope. It was reported that Garibaldi and a portion of his followers had left Milan in Calabria. There was great excitement in the latter province, and several towns had pronounced in favor of Garibaldi. The Neapolitan Province had been declared in a state of siege.

The latest news from Italy is that a battle has taken place between the royal troops and the Garibaldians, in which the latter were worsted. Garibaldi was wounded and taken prisoner.

GUY.

"Come into the den of lions! just step into this nice den of lions!" Notwithstanding which commencement there is no need for picking up of skirts or smelling-bottles, as this story is guiltless of sawdust, hurdle-races, and a clown, and dates not from a menagerie, but from the wide airy parlors where, in the centre of four little gilded chairs, turned as reception-chairs were never meant to be, sate a stately and fearful as three-year-olders could utter issued from the bottom of Master Bertie's blue Garibaldi, varied by appeals to Dr. Guy loose leg soar.

"I say, Dr. Guy, why don't you come into the den of lions? I'm Daniel, and you shall be the angel. Come in now—there's a good fellow!"

Dr. Guy glanced over at the lions—where they were visible two slender figures, and much white drapery.

"The angel article isn't in my line, Bert, though, if you want a good first-class lion, I will rour that I will make Clara and Violet there say, but I will do any boy's heart good to hear me. I will rour that I will make Clara and Violet there say, but I will do any boy's heart good to hear me. I will rour that I will make Clara and Violet there say, Let him roar again; let him roar again!" making his words good by a series of howls and a good deal of firm white teeth that left Bertie ecstatic.

A little figure came at him from the bow-window with a swift, gliding rush.

"Hush! do stop, Guy! How can you be so absurd?"

"Was I too loud? I will aggravate my voice so that I will rour you as gently as a sucking dove. I will rour as 'twere any nightingale."

"What child's play!"

"Pardon, Mignonne. Not every one like you can appreciate only deep and serious things—Le Follet, for instance."

A little hand was laid lightly over his arm. Guy caught it and held it in both of his.

"Laugh as much as you like," she said, pettishly, "Le Follet is a serious thing. I have been puzzling over this fashion-plate till my head really aches, trying to decide if I should have that lovely Grenadine made like number three. You, Guy, if it shouldn't fit as perfectly as that it would be such a fright."

Guy glanced down at his undress, and thought of those breeding-cake that to-morrow was filled with an instant's keen pain. If it had been Clara sitting so quietly in the window-seat—perhaps she have been puzzling over Le Follet? But there was the rosy little hand lying so lovingly in his, and the clear appreciation that she had for the lovely glamour of youth and beauty; for though Miss Aigre did declare that Violet was "only a child in affection, on Violet's pink-and-white complexion, that her mouth was not finely cut, that all her beauty was in her color and her youth, and added that when old she would be positively ugly (and very likely was quite right), Dr. Guy knew that her not with the eye of a prophet, but of a lover; and albeit a sensible man in other matters, thought her children electrical thunder-clouds, gave unto her secretly to roses, humming-birds, golden-haired Aurroras, and all other lovely, flower-like things. Violet's color came under his kindling look.

"It is so absurd altogether," she said, uneasily. "To think that I am going to be a child in affection and be shot perhaps, when (if you are very conscientious) it would be so easy to feel a little flutter in some common person who would be glad to run the risk for one-third of what you will lose."

"What does Clara say?" what does, Gravely.

"She says, 'Woe to that nation whose young men stay at home for pleasure, and send hirelings to battle for the right!'" answered a full, deep voice, unmistakable for a curious distinctness of utterance.

"Clara has become a perfect phonograph. She lately a stock of such pet phrases on hand," said Violet, almost crossly. "What does she mean by the battle of Bull Run? This is a war of principle, has, gotten up to please those New England fanatics people. Every one knows that the slaves are perfectly happy, and I like the Southerners ever so much. They have such lovely eyes, and look at us all the same as if they would eat us up alive."

"Excellent reason!" answered Clara, coming out from the window-seat. "I will go to war with a people fighting for their Constitution, their laws, their very lives."

Violet held up one hand in affected horror.

"Now don't be strong-minded, Clara. It is too bad of you. I always was a peaceable person about these things; and I don't believe that there would be any trouble if our people would only let the Southerners alone."

Guy instinctively dropped her hand.

"I think the mind of every reasonable woman should be strong enough to entertain such thoughts," he said, much displeased; "and it is a singular development of childishness that it should not. Violet. It looks altogether Southward."

Violet pouted an instant; she had half a mind for a quarrel, but tact triumphed. With a sigh she sank down on the sofa beside him, murmuring close to his ear.

"Please don't be angry, Guy. I know I am a silly little thing, but I will be good and clever as Clara; but then, you know, she has no Guy to leave to the war, or she would hate it as I do for taking you away."

O Guy! what man ever was inexorable toward the fair-committed for his sake? Violet did just what you, sensible reader, "who have no nonsense about you," would have done in his place; relented at the soft whisper and the piteous face, and drew the smiling little figure closer to him, hating himself for having in his heart called this angel a fool.

A little triumphant smile edged itself out at the further corner of Violet's mouth, while Clara, quite forgotten of both, went back to the window and sat down again to read:

"This summer, though the snows be down,
Thinks Kinslie of the bird of June;
The little red blip on the tree
Is ripe for such. What is for me.
Whose days on winteringly go on?"

But the words blurred. Her eyes were swimming, her lip quivering; the sharp pain would not down; her heart would re-echo the poeten's bitter cry. She was not envious—she tried not to be; she hated herself for the very thought of such a possibility: but she had so by heart all those pretty affectations—she had so frequently watched the shallow depths of that worthless nature—and it was so hard to see the treasure that she would have counted priceless carelessly seen and little esteemed by her who had won it. It was bad enough that a sensible man should be fooled by such shallow artifices; but that she should care, should feel her heart sink down at the going of one who thought of her only as of any other familiar object about the house, was intolerable. If it had been possible she would so gladly have accepted the half-contemptuous pity that Violet gave to her open arrow like Violet. All her pain and desolation must be crushed down, concealed from human eyes by more than ordinary coldness. Guy looked hurt when she gave him only the tips of cold, listless fingers, and she had a sharp pang of pain thinking that he must believe her heartless and unfeminine. "But after that," she said to herself, "than self-betrayal."

Very different was Violet's grief. It didn't "grey like a storm in the lea," but was rather of the sunflower order. It flourished specially in public; it found vent in fits of what resembled sobs and tears, and everyday folks temper. It was a perfect maelstrom, and drew in every body and every thing by way of consolation.

"You see I am in such an unfortunate position," she said, appealingly, to Miss Aigre, "that I really should go distracted if I stayed at home; and if I dare to walk or ride with any body, then all the good people will be shocked. I am sure I don't think it was so selfish in Guy to leave me. He just went for the excitement of the thing—all the men do."

"Would it be very dreadful if you should go with me?" was the answer. "I am going to-morrow. Suppose you consider me in a fatherly light (he was six years her senior), and if Mrs. Grundy is very severe about us, we can quiet her apprehensions by a placard, or something in the personals, stating that Guy is but a dozen miles distant."

What sort of filial affection is that which a girl of nineteen is apt to cherish for a handsome, invisible parent on the wrong side?

When Clara looked grieved, and people hinted that Mr. Lewis's attendance was a little altogether disinterested, Violet resented it with proper indignation: yet Guy's image was growing very dim in her heart. She read his letters aloud, and Clara answered with effort. She had Peyton's carte de visite; she had a dozen others, and was not how common, how almost ugly looked Guy's miniature beside Peyton's sparkling face! Presently society made out openly, and Guy's name was in full-dress enough to repeat the dots on Violet.

"If people would only not trouble themselves about us," she said, fretfully.

"Why should you care?" Gossip is like sea-foam, my child; it will pass away enough before the one stubborn fact of Guy's return."

Violet colored, and bent over her hands.

"Oh! hush, hush! how can I ever meet him?"

Peyton's arm stole around her, his other hand over hers that lay on it.

"Let me meet him for you, Violet. Give me the right," he whispered.

Since Guy's departure had sprung up something almost like coolness between Violet and Clara; but exactly after the same fashion that Violet came and nestled down at her cousin's feet, laying her handsome head in her lap as she spoke of delicate, meeting Clara with a look as steady as her own. Clara dropped the pictured hand in dismay.

"It isn't possible! You have not dared—" that word Violet flamed up.

"I have, and you may spare your arguments. I never really loved Guy. It was a delusion. He is positively ordinary. He has none of that tact and delicacy which are the chief requirements."

"Oh, how will you answer for this!" groaned Clara.

Violet, rearranging her hair before the étagere, laughed carelessly.

"I shall tell him that to my husband."

Clara stood aghast.

"Peyton and I were married this morning, and as—as nobody—need—know—Guy—I thought that—perhaps you would write to him."

Tell him! What words could she find! By her own hopelessness she knew a little of what would be his pain. Tell him that his trust was betrayed; strike him in the face with the fact of loved him! While she was hesitating and shrinking came a letter that made writing out of the question.

"Guy had been badly wounded—he might recover—he was dangerously wounded—he could not wrote one of his brother officers: "but it was as well to be prepared for the worst." And then for a moment Clara fiercely hated Violet, for she seemed almost glad. Followed six blank weeks, rendered tolerable by occasional brief lines.

"Guy was living—had improved slightly—was better—was coming home." Then last in his own handwriting—irregular, uncertain—speaking so potently in Clara of weakness and suffering in every lifeless line. Guy writhing in pain, trying with grief and pity almost to bursting.

Close on his letter followed Guy, ghastly pale, weak as a woman, but coming in the full flush of hope, almost childishly eager to see Violet. No one had told him: not the mother who had gone to watch over him; not the sister who welcomed him: it was left for her who during those six weeks had gone through the valley of the shadow of death in silence and utter solitude of heart.

She sat as he entered, making pitiful pretenses of work, scarcely able to force out articulate answers from her tired lips. But Guy never saw the trouble on her face, did not even find space to wonder at her strange manner, so feverishly was he watching for the first glimpse of that golden head, listening for the first tap of the little foot on the marble vestibule.

"She is so long coming," he said at last, "and I thought she would have been the first to meet me."

Clara's heart stood still, but she found no words to answer him.

"Or is she away?" he went on, uneasily. "I should hardly— Why, Clara, what is the matter?"

For the work had dropped from her nerveless fingers, and she was looking at him with eyes brimming over with tears.

He seized her hands; he pressed them till she shrank from the pain; he looked down into her eyes as if he would tear the truth from them.

"What is it?" he asked, hoarsely. "You are not in mourning—she is not dead?"

Words dropped out as if independently of her volition.

"Better that she were, Guy. She is married."

"Dead!"

Only that; but what a crazed and anguished face was that turned toward her! In the cruel, bitter pain, indignation blazed up. They would out; they would find vent; and she never knew how—but somehow, the story, the whole story, decorous girl was on her knees beside him, her arms about his neck, her soft cheek against his, crying, incoherently.

"Guy, dear Guy, better this pain than life-long torture! Love, Guy, hush! you break my heart!"—drawing down his head on her shoulder; holding him close, like some suffering child; murmuring words of comfort; softening the first fierce despair, the angels only knew how much. No one questioned her right to act as mother during the relapse which followed on this shock. Guy would have it so—that was sufficient. Her care surrounded him like a pleasant atmosphere; and he received it, reasoning no more about it than of vital air, till relatives, in fear of Mrs. Grundy, suggested that the good people always lose health and strength in sick rooms; ergo, that Clara, in spite of the doctor's fiery protests, hung out on her cheeks, must have lost hers, and must be dragooned into them again; so parental authority sent her to look for them in a Scotch mountain.

Guy rebelled and chafed in vain; there was only one consolation, that the girl would be with him on her in her evening dress. He tossed and fidgeted on the sofa while watching for the roll of wheels and her step on the stairs, and when she came to him he had fallen into a doze; opened his eyes consequently without hearing in her footfall, and saw the faint color rising and deepening under his averted head, the rest of the face hidden by a screen away from the wide forehead, and gleaming here and there golden-brown in the light: her tulle dress floating about her mist-like and spiritualizing her loveliness—for she was lovely—and Guy, blind so long, had opened his eyes to see it. The pleasant little surprise saluted him as she moved. A little hand passed regretfully over his hair. A spirit of the mist, or something of the kind, for it hardly shook up his pillows, pulled up his table, sighed softly, and vanished, leaving him alone with a book and a medicine bottle.

He looked at neither. To think that Clara was so lovely and so sweet—so unspeakably dear! Suppose other people should make the same discovery; and there rose before him a vision of those eyes beaming with tears, and the sad, sweet mouth just now shone so shadester-like close about his neck, and the low, trembling cry of pain, so unlike stonately, "You break my heart!" Forms had shriveled up in that hour of bitter affliction; spirit had met spirit, and been knit to it: yet who knew when he took that united them might be severed? Who knew but some angel might tell her? He had no warrant had he that the vague somebody was not about it that very moment? With his speculations he wearied himself into a fever, and when Clara came and tart enough when Clara made her appearance in the morning.

"I did not expect to see you," was his salutation.

"Oh! I am not tired. I came home early."

"Then it was not pleasant."

"On the contrary I enjoyed it."

"Oh, of course," answered sulky—"confined as you have been to this wretched room! No wonder!"

Clara looked in reproach she would not come.

"Come," he pursued, "don't you see that I am waiting for details? Chained here, you should not have left me. Which was it, or both, who was so agreeable? You see I can translate your delightful evening."

"Guy!"

"Well, what have I said now? I thought you were above the silliness of social affectation. There is nothing very unnatural about my question. You are both very attractive. You will marry some day, of course."

"Never, Guy."

"A bad symptom: for 'Never,' when it is the dictum of a young lady, read 'As soon as possible.'"

Cruel, unjust, ungenerous, thought Clara, but she went and sat down by the work-stand without answering. Guy watched her in silence. There was neither frown nor angry flush on her face, only an unwonted drooping of the lashes and a quiver about the mouth. She was too far away. He wanted her near him.

"My head aches intolerably," he said in his meekest tone.

Clara rose, as he knew she would; poured out the Cologne in her little rosy palm and chopped it gently on his head, pushing the thick hair away, and passing her soft, clinging fingers over his fore-head, her eyes full of a pity and tenderness to sweet that it thrilled him through and through.

"Oh, Clara!" burst out suddenly from the very depths of his heart, "is there any forgiveness for such blindness, such intolerable folly as mine but mean I God indeed restrains us after we have tried our idols and found them wanting; but can human nature approach the divine near enough, to forgive and love after it has so basely misjudged that one inferior? Dear Lisk you to love me after—"

A little hand on his lips prevented the rest of the sentence. Need of recording her answer then is none. Was she not a woman?

THE TRAGEDY OF THE WHITE VILLAGE.

A RUSSIAN STORY.

Not until 1859, when the act takes complete effect, shall we know the results of the emancipation of thirty millions of serfs. While among the peasants, generally, the change is tending, at the time of the first edict on the subject, I tried to ascertain what value the peasants themselves set on the promised boon; but I could not find my way far into the mass of their ignorance and stupidity.

One day I had the following conversation with a serf, who brought me a message.

"Your name is Evan Vassiovitch; to whom do you belong?"

"I am the serf of Karmovitch."

"How many are you?"

"Two thousand souls we are."

"You will all be free then."

He looked at me from the corners of his eye, and shook his head.

"Yes. If God and our Father wills."

"It will be better for you, Evan; will it not?"

"God knows, but who can say what I know?

"How much obrok do you pay?"

"Thirty rubles a year."

"Do you pay it in work or in money?"

"I work four days a week in the sugar fabric by the sloboda, and the rest, I pay."

"How much are the passport and taxes?"

"About three rubles and a half, besides other things."

"That is thirty-three rubles and a half you have to pay, and the rest you work for nothing but love in the sugar-mill?"

"It is so, barne, and hard work it is."

"And then you get your freedom you will not require to pay obrok, or work for to do it. You will be free as the birds, and will own your ground. Will that not be better for you?"

"God give it. I don't know. But I am tired of working."

"How much land have you?"

"Three and a half desiatines" (ten acres).

"Well, that is plenty to keep your family on if you spend all your time on it and pay no rents; it is not possible?"

"I don't know, baron, but I am tired of working in a fabric."

"Now, tell me, Evan, what do you intend to do when you get your freedom? Will you send your children to work ground, or will you send them somewhere else?"

He turned his eyes first up, then down, then to both sides, as if seeking to evade an answer, and in the peculiar peasant's shrug, and slowly muttered:

"I shall sleep, barne."

"And after you have slept, Evan?"

"I shall eat, baron."

"And after you have eaten, Evan?"

"I shall sleep again, baron."

I saw that the matter ended in game, and with the pig and poultry are all eaten, and when the potatoes, carrots, and cabbages are all eaten, and then there is a fire-wood to procure, what will you do then, Evan?"

"I shall sleep, baron. Now, my God give you health, and thank you for the treasure you are going to give me. Give you good-day."

And with that the man suspected all the rest. The condition of many of these people at this time may be judged from the following statement: I paid a girl with difficulty from a peasant village I work in a cotton-mill:

"I work hour eleven (twelve and sixpence) a month. My time is all spent in the mill, from five o'clock in the morning until eight o'clock at night. My wife and children work on the fields belonging to the baron five days every week in return for their wages. In winter they do all kind of work required of them by the steward of the estate. We are only free on Sundays and holidays. We have a cow, and two horses, sheep and carrots. The women do this work. When I have saved enough money I shall buy me and a pig, and we have some ducks. We cannot sell the stock [meaning the manure] (the steward's tommy-shop); this is deducted from our wages. We pay no rent for the house we live in. Our work is counted for this; the steward manages all that. Somehow I am always in debt to the steward. I have worked ten years in the mill, and am a good spinner. I don't know what I shall do when we get our freedom. We shall not work any more, I suppose. I may go begging, but my son is able; he has cultivated land. We are three thousand souls on this estate, and about three rubles and a half, per fifty rubles a thousand nearly are saved, and per fifty rubles each is paid. They pay their own passport and taxes besides."

This is a sorry but true picture. Eleven pound

a year had this man and his family to live on! For that sum the father and son gave all their time to the mill, and the mother and two daughters five days a week in other work. The father and son alone were on the free principle, the father and son alone were worth, and were sure to receive, about sixty pounds, and the two daughters thirty; but then they could be forced to pay out of that what their master chose to exact for shock and taxes. Many of the men had taken off, and some are worse. The serfs belonging at one time to the crown are now free, and those possessed by the rich families have only to pay their labor obrok, and those what they pleased with their ground or themselves.

Intelligence reached us one day that something serious had happened among the serfs at a place called the Old Village, twenty miles off. I started off to the place in company with my Scotch friend Saunderson, who was then my interpreter. While Volkovo is a village of considerable size, and the houses seemed to have once been of a more comfortable class than any I had seen in other parts. Now it was a most desolate picture of extreme penury and woe; soldiers were in possession, delivery door. Cossacks patrolled the streets and the adjacent roads, so that but for my friend's clever assistance we should not have been allowed to enter. The steward's house, with all his property and stores, had been burned down, and he himself had been murdered. His family—a wife, son, and two daughters) could nowhere be found. Some ten peasants were dead, many severely wounded. A gang of serfs in irons, or bound with ropes, followed by screaming women, some with babies in their arms, were leaving the place under an escort of Cossacks, who were joining the poor wretches and probing them with their lances, as if they were a government town prison, whence they would pass ultimately to the Siberian mines, no doubt.

This is the story of the outbreak:

General Obrassoff died and left his widow two estates: this of the White Village, and that of Ivanovo into his possession only a short time before his death, was one: the other was that upon which my friend Saunderson and I has experienced hospitality. The lady was a person of a tender heart, who had been well educated, and mixed in the best society. At her husband's death she left the capital and its pleasures, in order to devote herself to the education of her daughter, taking with her a resident governess and a little English girl as companion and English otter. The little English girl, by name Fanny Stevens, was fabulously rich, and was unable to educate her, and she was glad to give her companionship to the little Russian girl, and in exchange for good treatment and an education in German, French, and music.

Arrived at the White Village, which she had never seen before, the "generalsha" ("Mrs. General") decided upon living there for a time. It was the old family house which was prepared for her reception she staid in a friend's house in the nearest town. The former proprietor of the White Village had been rich, and easy with his serfs. He had possessed several estates of considerable extent lying widely separate from each other in the country, where he had never been but once: in fact, he knew only the bulk of the White Village, except that it was his, and that the steward sent or brought him plenty of excuses for non-payment, but little money. He did not trouble his head much, therefore, when the people on the estate passed to the general Obrassoff at cards or died, as the merely the General Obrassoff or herself my authority here) that if the General made no more of the place than he had made of them, he should not be of much use to him. The General determined, however, to make the most possible of it. He was, however, to make the most possible of it. He was the same estate as his other property, and would form a large addition to his income if well handled. But soon after he had sent off a confidential agent with the discharge of the old steward in his pocket, and with orders to repair the house, lay stock, and raise the obrok from ten rubles to thirty, he died. Thus Madame, good, tender-hearted, compassionate Madame Obrassoff ruled in his stead until the child's majority.

On the morning after she had taken possession and installed herself comfortably in her large wooden house, before she had quite got out of her the large plot of grass (which never fails to turn up, from) was filled with a mass of human beings clad in the most filthy rags, waiting to pay their respects to their master-owner: the old men with their beards, the ragamuffins with evident pride and pleasure. English rags are bad, Scotch rags are worse, but Irish rags are worse still. Russian rags are beyond all conception. When the lady appeared on the lawn among the "souls," she was perfectly shocked by their wretched appearance; and the steward having marked with cunning satisfaction the effect of this sympathy, advanced first with a "welcome present," a lean goose, and laid it at her feet. He then kissed her feet and the feet of her children, and wished that all imaginable blessings might be poured down on their "high-born" heads. He then said that the present he had brought was not fit to give to a steward's clerk far less to such a high-born personage, but it was all he had left to give, he was so poor! The rest of the ragged host advanced and followed suit, no one coming empty-handed. Some gave one egg, others a few berries or a bit of black bread, some a jug of kvass or an old partridge: this one had caught a young rabbit, that one a small paper of salt or a few carrots. The speeches delivered on this great occasion by more or the older peasants were similar to that of the old steward. "High-born lady, we are your humble slaves. Forgive us for having no thing better to offer you. We are poor. Look at us with the golden-eye and have pity. God give you health and long life to live among us. We are poor but obedient. We will all die for you. It is God's truth, lady, we are poor." Many of them shed tears profusely. The kind-hearted woman wept in sympathy, and pitied the degraded beings from the bottom of her heart. How could she exact thirty rubles a year from such people? How could she put a hard steward over them to grind more out of them? Had this not been already carried too far?

"Starost," she said, "hear me. My husband gave orders before he died that each man should pay thirty rubles obrok. Has the steward told you so, and are you willing to pay it?"

"High-born lady, it is truth. We have been told, but God knows we can not pay it. All we have is a bad thirty rubles each. Our lands have beautiful eyes to look with. See these people. Is it possible that we can pay all this large obrok? I shall have compassion and be an angel, and make the obrok ten rubles as it was before."

"Steward," said the lady, "give me your opinion."

"My lady, honored and obeyed, it is my opinion that all this is a farce got up to deceive you. Don't believe them. They are rich. They have no right to be the reverse. I can not prove it yet; but I soon will. Follow, Madame, your father's plan, and all will go well. I shall soon by myself to find the obrok. I have done."

Here the whole body of the peasants, about fifteen hundred, at a secret sign from the starost, surrounded the lady and fell on their knees, howling and crying:

"My children," she said, "I pity you. It is sad to look on you with these rags. I will not ask you to pay what you can not pay, but I must have some obrok, and shall be content with ten rubles each. If it is paid cheerfully, so much the wish to be kind and to live among you happily."

The starost commanded the bells to be rung, and shouts the starost thanked the lady, and with many bendings and bowings waved that this sum should be paid by the village as if he made it him self every thing they had. They then parted: the lady rejoicing in having made so many happy, and the starost chuckling at the success of his trick: the new steward, finding his occupation gone, gave notice to the lady, and anticipated his dismissal.

Next day, while the generalsha was giving orders in her new house, and the starost, accompanied by the daughter and Lucy Murray were at their first lessons, the cunning old starost and twenty other peasants, all in good comfortable circumstances, and looking healthy and well to do, unearthed some thirty or forty very fine young horses of their own breeding all the best horses of the estate, in which they had been hidden, and were soon on their way to the large fair in the neighborhood of which we have spoken from one thousand to fifteen hundred rubles: the greater part of which money, after being divided, was destined for the lady's benefit as soon as it could be turned into hard cash. (Perjure has no chance against the compassionate and generous. A dozen of this village were to a manderers, breeders, and rearers of horses, who, attended all the fairs for many miles around, and who and only used their own land and that of the estate for the pasturage. Instead of being poor they were the richest of the village, and none could have paid a higher obrok. But they had never paid more than the old proprietor chose to accept, not, if cunning could save their pockets, under the new.

The lady remained under her delusion for a year. When the time came for the obrok to be paid in, a few months after the birth of her little son and heir, the crops were of every thing were nothing; they were all miserably starved, and the people had only paid the ten rubles; her high-born ladyship might come and see for herself; she might take all they had, but she should not have the obrok not pay. (Not a word was said about horses.)

Again this trick succeeded. The lady and estate were deceived in every thing; this estate might improve with a little patience and kindness; and the kind woman not only forgave the whole of the obrok, but reduced it to five rubles for the next year. "Only remember, good lady, that it is a gift and not a promise. If this five rubles each is not paid in good time, and if you associate these people without the starost, you will be robbed. It will sell the place and leave you. I will not struggle and fight to get my money. I will go, and you will see that I must have it, and that it is a shame to you that I have to draw all my means from other poor serfs to eat with you in your house."

There is nothing more certain than that if you give a Russian serf an inch he will take an ell. The poor peasants were glad to pay five rubles not. The poverty trick was again rehearsed, but this time her high-born ladyship was not deceived. Her time her high-born ladyship was not deceived. Her wrath, pride and anger, advertised the estate for sale, and, as she had threatened, sold it. All the horses, "souls" on it, their wives and children, horses, cattle, goods, and chattels, became the property of a certain Count Ivan Ivanovitch Ivanoff, who had part of his life in official service on a salary of some forty-five or sixty rubles per month, and who managed to live on it, pay five rubles obrok, and to save money enough to buy the White Village at twenty thousand rubles.

The new steward whom Madame Obrassoff allowed to leave her—was appointed by Gregorin Popoff; but this steward had left with his eye on the estate ever since, knew more by this time of its capabilities, and of the character of the peasants, outwitted and driven away by the cunning old starost.

The lady now understood what was to be expected now. The venerable old starost, and twenty of the principal peasants, were seized on their return home of the purchase, and received a very liberal supply of "stick." The stanovoy's much kept the stick going for half a day, and were well paid to lay it on hard: while Herr Hausen smiled complacently. This was the first turning of the tables, and they went on running round from had to worse. Each serf was served with a demand for three years arrears of obrok, passport-money, and taxes at a high rate. Failing to pay on the instant, the secret was confiscated, and all their property, goods of studs of horses, and the more apparent goods of every kind, were appropriated and sold without the least computation. The peasants were not allowed to leave the village, but were driven to work on the fields. Having formerly attended to the thing but bread-eating, they were now almost destitute of the kind of produce necessary to human life. The old starost had to chop wood for the steward, the children gathered oak nuts and cut grass in the woods for his cows and pigs; his barns, stables, and storehouses filled as those of the peasants emptied. He became corpulent in substance as they grew lean in flesh and gaunt and hungry.

A sum equivalent to the purchase-money of the estate had already been realized; but this was not enough satisfied Herr Hausen and his employer. They had not yet found any money; and money in hard cash there must be somewhere. Domiciliary visits had been made, the floors of the huts had been dug up, and every place the searchers could think of had been explored without success. At length a few—one of those prevailing, lamp-fanciers, or Hausen's fellows, who were parents, easily-colored prints, handkerchiefs, and money, to exchange for corn, flax, feathers, and other peasant produce, at a profit of eight hundred per cent. or so—gave a hint to Herr Hausen for a percentage on the discovery. The searchers were taken accordingly, and one day these peasants—already shorn to the bone of every thing else—were deprived of their next-egg. Where it was found, or how much it was, I did not hear, but had bullion to a considerable amount was transmitted to the man safe in the strong room of the steward's house. The peasants were now poorer a thousand times than they had been when visited the kind generalsha to believe them.

What follows of the story I had partly from the old starost as he lay in his hut dying from a gunshot wound, and partly from Lucy Murray at an afterdinner.

One evening four men stood at the end of a hut shaking something in a felt hat. On coming up to his hand in a sack, and satisfied in the result and the operation was repeated. Then the four separated, and took different routes through the village, saying a few words quietly at every door. It was a cold clear night, soon after twilight, and the moon had risen in a cloudless cloudless sky. Just as the old starost passed the steward's gate he met little Lucy Murray.

"How do you do, starost? I hope your health is good. Good-night. I must run to the house."

"Stay, young lady," said the old starost and the laughing eyes, tell me who there is now in young noble house besides the steward and his."

Madame Obrassoff and her daughter sleep there to-night. You know we came for the last instalment of the purchase-money, and to dine."

"When do you go?"

"To-morrow morning. We should have gone to-day, but it was time to begin a journey, and the horses want rest. Why do you ask, starost?"

"Listen, daughter of the English. I put my words go into your heart and remain there. Tell the generalsha from her old starost that the people of the estate have been often deceived her, that she must—do you hear me say must?—leave that house in two hours after you hear this word. Tell all in it, to destruction. Now tell her noon and secretly; but as you value her life and your own, do not let any one but her. Go, child, and remember my words. Good-by, English child, and may God give you happiness."

So the starost passed on with the Russian fiery cross.

In about an hour after this groups of men in noiseless felt boots went their way to the church front. Each man was armed with only one weapon, but it was a deadly one opposed to any thing but fire-arms: the tapere, or Russian hatchet. Each of the Russian hatchets can hew down trees, cut them into pieces and slabs, build houses, make carts, and, with a sharpened point, can even mend pens or pencils, kill a wolf or a bear, make tables and chairs, cleave his enemy's skull, and perform the crown in the midst. Some met at the church, each with his tapere stuck in his belt and resting on his hip. At a given signal the men round the church every individual turned his body so as to face the holy emblems, imagine, and kissed the sacred cross on the altar. Each was with more than ordinary devotion bowed and crossed himself.

The starost lifted up his voice: "Brothers, many words, little deeds. Are you all ready and willing?"

Each man drew from his back the tapere, flourished it over his head, and answered, "Ready!"

"Then, brothers, the cast lots whether it should be to-night, and the answer was 'Yes:' we cast lots again, and the answer was, 'All.' Follow me, then."

The body of men moved on, and, but for the dull rustling of their felt boots, they moved like noiseless phantoms. They were in number about five hundred men, all in the prime of life, and the steward's gate a carriage drove up; they opened to let it pass, and locked it again. Arrived at the house, they surrounded it, duly, pale as spectres, and quaking in every limb, sat inside. Every sign of life was extinguished, and the house stood and bowed. The old starost said, "O in peace, kind woman and innocent girl, and God bless you for your kind words!" He little knew that Herr Hausen's two daughters and his wife were concealed in the house, and that Hausen's wife, Lucy had warned not only Madame Obrassoff but the steward and his family. Ah! then, a young man in the house, who started out on the instant, mounted a fleet horse, and galloped to the nearest town for soldiers.

Then was the steward left alone to meet the storm he had raised. Most tyrants are cowards, and Herr Hausen did not belie the statement. When the hatchets began to beat at his doors and windows he became at last convinced (for he had until then derided the idea) that he had raised a demon he could never lay. He fled for refuge to the most frenzied fanatic, as if any place in the great house could hide him from those who were now seeking his blood. His own domestics, all of them serfs to the village, joining the assailants, each hurried him away, and dragged him to the door, when he was commanded to give up the money he had robbed them of. With trembling limbs and pallid cheeks he obeyed, yielded the keys, and begged on his knees for mercy. In the most abject fear and cowardly despair he offered them all he possessed, promised forgiveness, and that he would replace the obrok—any thing, every thing, for life. But they were deaf to his prayers, and mercy they did not show him. The axes of fifty men glittered in the cold moonlight and descended on his head. Then, when he was hewed to pieces, began the work of destruction. The rooms and galleries found in their progress a frantic madness to the madness of ignorant despairing vengeance, and morning found the revolted serfs standing within the once dying enemies of what had lately been the steward's house, offices, stables, and stores. The fruits of their misdemeanors entered their benighted heads. They had received the last money and a great deal more; they had feasted to satiety on the stores of the steward; best of all, they had killed their enemy as they would kill a wolf. But consequences were not slow to come. A cry of "Soldiers!" was raised. Surprised, they ran this way to be met by the soldiers, cavalry, and that way to be met by the soldiers, cavalry, and that way to be met another volley. Dead and wounded fell like rotten sheep. Then a desperate wave swept over the peasants fell on their knees screaming for mercy, and surrendered at discretion.

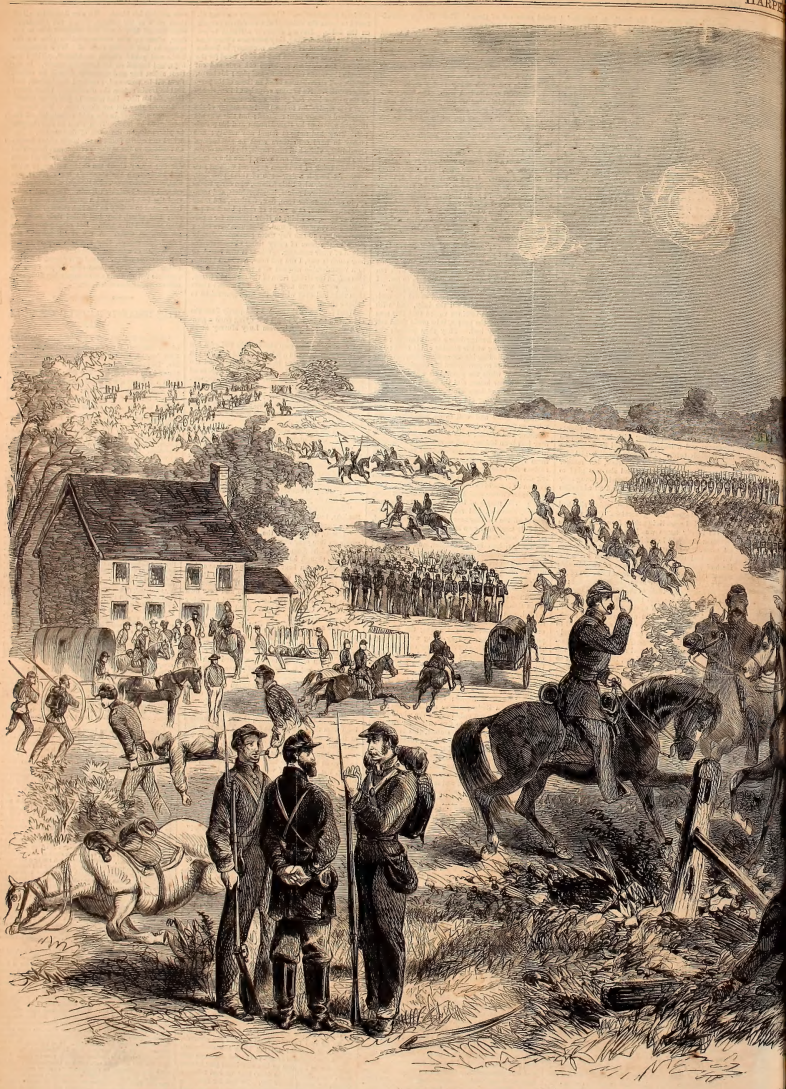
THE SECOND BATTLE OF BULL RUN.

On pages 600 and 601 we publish an illustration of the SECOND BATTLE OF BULL RUN, fought on 29th August, from a sketch by our special artist, Mr. Edwards, who was with General Pope throughout the battle. The following description from a Tribune correspondent, who was also on the field, is appropriate. He says:

The first position taken by the rebels was about noon, when Sigel was throwing out regiments to right to protect our left from flanking attacks.

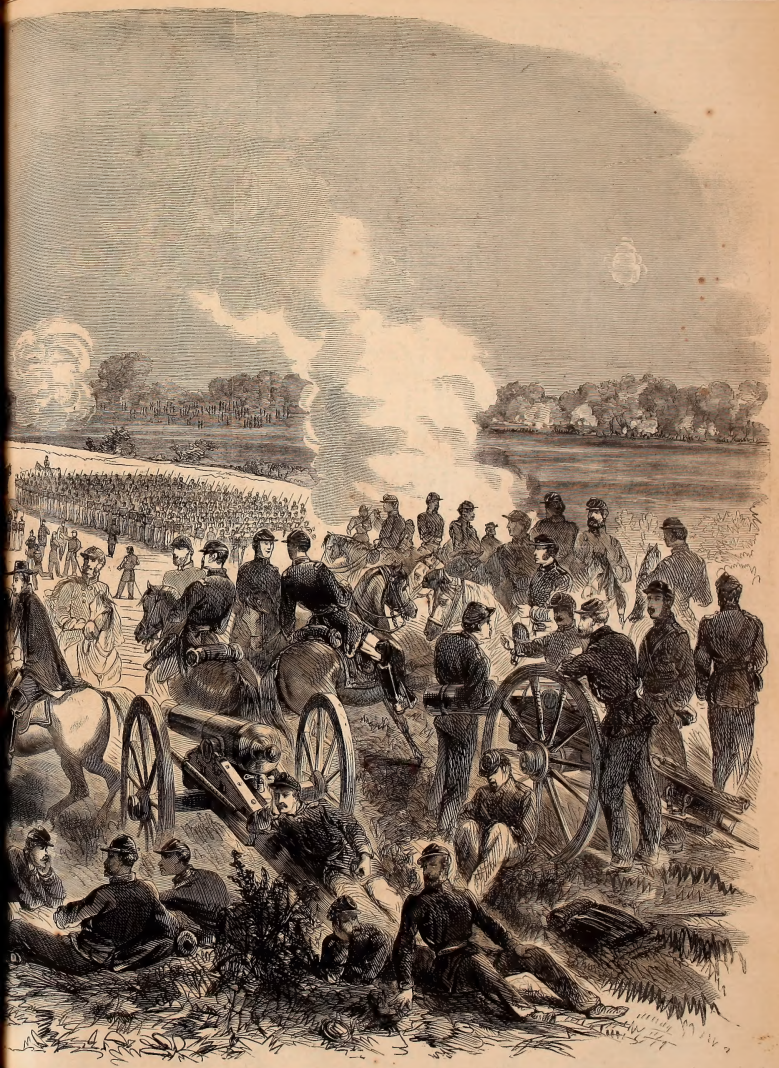
In the order of battle for the day Heintzelman commanded the third, Porter and Sigel the center, and McDowell the left. The first fighting was between Sigel and the rebels on the road to the right of the Stone Bridge, and Reynolds's brigade found itself assailed by a few troublesome bushwhackers. These were soon driven off, and the regiments were got off and passed to the rear.

The fight was then continued as far as I formed protect. At any rate I got upon ground where the corpses attended the burying of the fight and where the dead bodies lie thick. There were our fellows. With there were the rebels. Here and there lay those of both armies mingled. That ground had been fought over. A little further they lay thicker. Then they were piled upon each other more thickest. Upon ground that I judged to be not over half a mile square there were lying not less than a thousand men. Advancing further still, I saw a Union soldier raised, not dead, but with his head resting upon his knapsack. I pushed on good order, satisfied that the enemy's line extended from right to left, I started directly for the centre of that line. Soon I came to the edge of the field. By this time our men were coming out of the woods in front. Pushing on, I got further advanced, our left withdrawn, so that we found ourselves in front of the enemy's line, from right to left exactly south.



The rebel General Stevens attacked at the right, and soon after General Butterfield at the left. The enemy's line was overlapped, outflanked, and driven back, and at each point of attack he met us with musketry.

The rebel General Hood's brigade was first. Gen. Grover was certain the enemy intended to turn one or the other flank, and ordered the Eighth Connecticut to the left. The exit was at the best doubtful; for his assute had just retreated from it with the entire brigade of the rebel army, had come up and assumed command. The assute was repulsed, and Hood's brigade driven back in disorder.



During myself in the centre, within view of both portions of the field where infantry were engaged, I could not distinguish the movements of the left. Reinforcements for troops were engaged, and I surmised that we were fighting against the whole force of the rebel army. Gen. Pope and I bought our forces up to the front. Gen. Porter's corps had been engaged all day, and Gen. Pope had been ordered to the left. He moved men at a double-quick from right to left, and exactly south.

A gentleman of an hour later I wished he had moved a still greater proportion to the left. I have heard the musketry of the contending armies from Yorktown to Richmond; I say unhesitatingly that the fire which broke out at the left and up to the right of the line was the heaviest of any. Bulk of volleys, and rolls, and crashes! It was all these continually succeeding each other. Sometimes there was a swelling volume—the wrestle of rioting terrapins such as never was heard before. Then the sharp concussion that artillery played from each of the cardinal points upon the rebel columns as they came out of the woods in front. I could not see them struggling. The smoke of battle was between us. But I saw the rebel columns, and I trembled for the result. Gen. Pope was in the midst of the fight. He was then ordered to the left. Before he could get fairly there the rebels had driven back the Union regiments before. Their soldiers fought like brave men: if mowed down they were met by their comrades in columns, as they surely did fight well. I doubt not they plied the assault with the fury of fiends. Their officers led them on by Decatur's hand. I believe they can not be a man who would not be perfectly willing to see the rebel columns the hour between 4½ and 5½ o'clock the severest fighting he ever knew. It was a contest of giants. The rebel right of the line the contestants seemed to desist in exhausted fatigue. Then the rebel left—the left of the rebel army that we were beaten—undertook to drive back the right of the Union army. Apprehensive about the hospitals and the wounded, I rode to the rear. Before I reached the centre of the latter could be seen making for the Bull Run bridge and the ford. Then the rebel line came on in literal in competitive order. I saw the term not as a mild one, but the disgraceful one of a rout. I saw it even before the actual fact in the case.

I saw on Gainesville road a brigade that could not, as it came from the field, show its distinct regiments, or rather the colors of its distinct regiments. I saw a brigade in a mass marched a mile in scattered men gathered. Still there were streets, and lanes, and avenues of flying men, and when they were hastily in condition for another battle Sunday. Then I saw Gen. Pope, with his staff, ride down the road leading to the field—he was known to be at Manassas early in the day—he was known to be at Centreville, and beside Alfred. I saw all done in two hours.

GENERAL SIGEL'S CORPS AT THE SECOND BATTLE OF BULL RUN

HIT AUGUST 29, 1862.—Sketched by Mr. Davenport.—[See Page 599.]

WAR MAP OF KENTUCKY AND TENNESSEE, SHOWING THE PRESENT THEATRE OF OPERATIONS IN THE WEST.

GENERAL BUELL'S ARMY.

ON page 596 we publish several pictures of the army under command of General Buell, from sketches by Mr. Hubner. The following account of the pictures will serve to explain them:

A VIEW OF DECHERD, TENNESSEE.

Decherd is a station on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, boasting a dépôt, hotel, and half a dozen dwelling and store houses. It has shared the usual fate of small towns in districts occupied by the army. The quarter-master has fallen heir to the dépôt, and has filled it with his stores. The Provost Marshal and the convalescent soldiers have taken possession of the rest of the town. Having grown to be a point of military importance, it has been strongly fortified. The stockade forts in different parts of the town are observable in the view. The camp of the Third Ohio occupies the right of the drawing, with the dépôt and store-houses in the fore-ground and centre. The mountains in the back-ground are spurs of the Cumberland.

THE SEVENTH INDIANA BATTERY.

In a neat and strong fort west of the town the Seventh Indiana battery has been stationed to defend the approaches from the mountains. These forts and stockades were built to defend the troops stationed here against guerrilla raids.

THE CONTRABAND CAMP.

All the work of fortifying in General Buell's Department is done by the negroes of rebel masters. General Buell was very prompt to obey the order of the President on that subject. Thousands of negroes are now in his camps doing duty as laborers in various capacities. Many of the wagon trains are driven by negroes.

GENERAL BUELL'S HEAD-QUARTERS.

The sketch of General Buell's head-quarters is particularly faithful. The tents on the left are those of General Buell and Colonel Fry, his Chief of Staff. That of the military telegrapher is seen on the right. General Buell invariably lives in camp. He is now in the field for a long and tedious campaign, which his brilliant military genius and recognized abilities will bring to a successful termination.

In the woods near our camp is the grave of one of General M'Cook's men, shot in defending his General. His name is John Lochbihler, Company D, Ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, born in Bavaria, Germany. The boys mourn their brave leader, and have sworn to revenge him. The Ninth Regiment is a fine regiment, though they had to suffer much from heavy marchings.

The Third Ohio and Forty-second Indiana marched in two days from Huntsville to Decherd. It was a heavy march, and they were highly complimented for it.

THE INVASION OF KENTUCKY.

ON page 597 we publish three pictures from sketches by our special artist, Mr. H. Mosler, illustrating the preparations made at Cincinnati and Covington to resist the rebels. Early last week it was known that Kirby Smith, at the head of a large body of troops (15,000 or 20,000), advanced into Eastern Kentucky. Having defeated a small body of raw volunteers under Nelson, they pushed forward and seized successively Cynthiana, Frankfort, and Lexington, menacing Louisville and Cincinnati. General Lew Wallace was at once placed in command at the latter city, and issued the following order:

ORDER FROM GENERAL WALLACE.

The undersigned, by order of Major-General Wright, assumes command of Cincinnati, Covington, and Newport.

It is but fair to inform our citizens that an active, daring, and powerful enemy threatens them with every consequence of war—yet the cities must be defended and the inhabitants assist in the preparations.

First—All business must be suspended at nine o'clock to-day. Every business house must be closed.

Second—Under the direction of the Mayor the citizens must, within the hour after the suspension of business, assemble in convenient public places ready for orders, and as soon as possible they will then be assigned to their work. This labor ought to be one of love, and the undersigned trusts and believes that it will be so. Any how it must be done: the willing shall be promptly credited—the unwilling promptly visited.

The principle adopted is, "Citizens for the labor, soldiers for the battle."

Martial law is hereby proclaimed in the three cities. Until they can be relieved by the military, the injunctions of this proclamation will be executed by the police.

Third—Ferry-boats will cease plying the river after four o'clock in the morning until further orders.

LEWIS WALLACE,
Major-General Commanding.

The citizens responded with enthusiasm. The Gazette says:

"The streets are fairly alive with moving columns of armed men. The city military companies filed through the streets yesterday in splendid style, and made a magnificent appearance. From the interior we learn the country is fairly alive. Men are rushing to arms, and every train comes in loaded with volunteers armed and ready for action. They are pouring in by thousands. The Governor of Ohio is doing his part fully, and the military authorities at the State capital are promptly and efficiently performing their duties. Ohio regiments are coming in freely, and Governor Morton, as usual, is ready with a large force to swell the columns that are concentrating for operations in Kentucky. Major-General Wallace has certainly reason to feel proud of the spontaneous outpouring of the people in response to his demands. Nothing has been done grudgingly. With liberality and even enthusiasm the people have rallied to the standard of the commander."

On 5th a reconnoissance was made from Cincinnati over the Kentucky Central Railroad to a point ten miles north of Cynthiana where evidences of the enemy were found; and a dispatch from Falmouth, dated at 1 o'clock on 6th, states that the National scouts had discovered the rebels within four miles of that place with artillery.

On 7th Major-General Wright issued an order relieving General Wallace from duty at Cincinnati, and directing him to proceed to Covington, Kentucky, where he is to organize into brigades the troops mustered into service and concentrating at and in the vicinity of that place and Newport. Other changes in the service are also made. The resumption of all lawful business in Cincinnati except the sale of liquors is authorized until 4 o'clock in the afternoon daily. All the military organizations of the city are to assemble for drill every afternoon excepting Sunday, and the members of such organizations will hold themselves in readiness to rally at the place of rendezvous at a moment's warning. The organization of all able-bodied citizens into a working corps is to be perfected with the aid of the civil authorities.

TALKING OF SELF.

IT is a nice and curious inquiry how far it is desirable, or even tolerable, for people to talk of themselves. There is no broader distinction between man and man than the manner and the degree in which this is done. There are people who never talk of themselves. There are others who never talk of any thing but themselves—that is, who can pursue no subject unless the vista can be made to terminate in self. Wherever it comes to this, the question admits but of one answer—indeed, society has put the too frequent use of the word "I" under an interdict. No person who mixes much with mankind dares to turn the conversation habitually upon himself, except under some feint or disguise. Nevertheless, we all of us know persons who talk only of themselves, and families who never get farther from themselves than one another. These are probably the dullest people and dullest families of our acquaintance; for, when we come to think of it, all prominent dullness has a touch of egotism at bottom, and this is the point that tells. It is the part we have to play in their company that oppresses us both at the time and in recollection. Not only is their intelligence chained to themselves, but ours also. All interchange and variety of thought are impossible, not only because they are a heavy, unimaginative sort of people, whose flights are circumscribed to their own prospects, but because their one subject is precisely that on which we can neither speak our own mind nor satisfy expectation. We could discuss the man merrily enough behind his back; but to be forced to follow his lead, too polite to be candid, yet full of inward revolt, is a false position, and the inevitable subservience leaves a flavor of annoyance and failure which intercourse with mere dryness and insipidity can not be charged with.

We all know men and women tethered, by a string whose length we instinctively measure, to themselves. Every subject under the sun reminds such people of themselves. Nothing is too remote for this alliance—they can not hear of the stars without wanting their own horoscopes. Their sole notion of conversation is to display themselves. They are ready to unveil their whole idiosyncrasy to whoever will look and listen. Their loves, and hates, and prospects are at any body's service. Their experiences, successes, every fine thing ever said to them or of them, are common property. The whole world is their confessor in the matter of their faults, temptations, whims, grievances, doubts, and weaknesses. They expect to interest strangers by an avowal of their taste in meats and drinks and clothes. They confide their diseases and their remedies, their personal habits, their affairs to any chance comer, never for a moment visited by the misgiving pressed upon them by the preacher—"Is it possible that it should never come into people's thoughts to suspect whether or not it be to their advantage to show so very much of themselves?" Society, or rather their own little world, is simply a tablet on which to subscribe self. When forced by some strong counter-will out of this indulgence, they are visibly at sea, vacant, disturbed; they have nothing to say; we feel for them as painfully out of their element, and are prone in weak good-nature to help them into port again. Now a good deal of this is mere ill-manners. People who talk in this way are either underbred or incapable of nurture, or they suffer the want of certain wholesome restraints that keep the rest of the world in order. Miss Austen, whom few forms of social folly escaped, has more than one character representing this habit of mind, and revealing its source. Every reader can recall that elaborate and inimitable impersonation of self-display, Mrs. Elton, who, once received into the memory, has too many counterparts in real life ever to be forgotten.

Vanity is of course the leading motive to this obtrusive display. Yet the habit of perpetually reverting to self is not always to be confounded with vanity. Mere paucity of ideas and deadness of fancy drive some people into it who have a willingness to talk, and yet so little perception of things out of themselves that nothing apart from their own routine of sensations presents itself to say. No doubt it gives them a general sense of importance to clothe themselves in words, but they have hardly a choice as to the means. There are men who will tell any body how often they have been jilted, under the vague sense that honor will somehow redound to themselves from the confession; or they will found a claim for distinction upon a weak digestion, or the difficulties they encounter in shaving. But these aspirations are something apart from vanity. There is a mild satisfaction in being not a mere insignificant unit, but possessed of differences and peculiarities, which is worth all the world besides to some people, and indeed to which none of us are quite insensible. Others talk of themselves from a nervous desire to cover their defects—a restless impulse to set off their presentable points. They are alive to some weak side, which preys on their sensitiveness. As some people are most apt to talk of their fine friends and grand relations, there are those who are deeply conscious of a preponderance of the other sort. Thus very few persons who talk much about themselves talk the truth. The impression they want to give is one-sided. There are, probably, a hundred things about themselves which, in the midst of ostentatious candor, they suppress.

Some faults we own; but can you guess?
Why, virtues carried to excess.

And the side represented swells to inordinate dimensions, and takes an aspect bearing it out of the region of fact. Or perhaps, like Goethe and Rousseau, they have a notion that every thing becomes them—that even meanness or baseness is glorified when made a matter of frank confession.

As excessive talk of this kind is presumption, the habit is most odious in young people. Children in their natural state never talk of themselves. They show egotism by a peculiar appreciation of the pronouns "my" and "mine;" but they are not yet self-conscious. They could not, if they would, unveil themselves—their vanity takes another direction. All attempts, unless very systematic and insidious, fail to rouse self into expression. Precocious children now and then talk of themselves, especially if forced and excited by a certain sort of religious teaching. Then they can be heard to enlarge with a horrible glibness on their feelings, their convictions of sin, their schemes for setting the world to rights; but this is mostly a sign of an overtasked brain, accompanied sometimes by an exceptional, grotesque form of naughtiness, and sure to pass off as the health improves and the cleverness vanishes. When childhood, and even boyhood, is fairly over, is the time for self to assert itself in talk. Then it awakes full armed in a sort of bloom and overflow of conceit, an invasion of arrogance never to be matched in after-life. There are not many more unpleasant things in the social world than a pert, forward young man, whose theme is universally himself—who entertains every company with himself, and breaks up every conversation that does not concern himself. These insufferable youths are of all sorts, from the flippant and most bearable who clamors of his own exploits, boasts himself the envy of one sex and the idol of the other, to the deep, oracular, and enlightened youth who will not allow us to remain in the dark as to his views on any of the topics that occupy mankind. Or there is the sententious, didactic young man, more than endured, probably, by some small admiring circle—a teetotaler, perhaps, or a stringent Sabbatarian, or engaged in a course of lectures to "the lower orders," or in some way or other a conscious example, reprover, and guide to his fellow-men. Whatever their line, they are intrinsically the same—all alike patronizing or indifferent to their betters—all blind to the impression they make—all lavishing the fullness of their admiration, reverence, and talk on one central figure—all flaunting the same self in our eyes—keeping up the one chorus, "I, I, I," "I say," "I know," "I do."

And yet all people must sometimes talk of themselves—all ought to be able to do it on fitting occasions freely and naturally. No man is interesting who never talks of strictly personal matters; indeed, we can not be said really to know any body till he has talked of himself to us. Until there has been a mutual interchange of such confidences people are acquaintances not friends; and the man who has no such confidences to make has no friends. It is not, then, the practice itself, but how and when to indulge it that is the point. We use the word "indulge" designedly, for unquestionably the subject most interesting to every one must be himself. It is in recognition of this fact that all popular forms of religion agree in spiritualizing egotism. Methodism enjoins all its members to enlarge periodically each on himself—the only check being that all have to listen in their turn. Romanism makes asceticism endurable by enjoining an immense amount of self-scrutiny and proportionate self-portraiture; and attempts at conventual life in our own Church all bring out the fact that unlimited dwelling on self and lengthy confession—that is, the talking of self—is the one indemnity for a life of unnatural constraint and bondage. To persons open to the active interests of life and the relaxations of society, however, a great many circumstances ought to combine to make the subject of self a natural or even a pleasurable one. Talking of self is one of the strongest proofs of confidence that can be given by a mind of due delicacy and reserve—a confidence that ought to be bestowed with such discretion as to make it always welcome. With ordinary people, under ordinary circumstances, the subject, at any length or particularity, must be either a favor or an impertinence. There are, however, a great many people who have a right to talk of themselves with freer latitude than it is wise to give ourselves—old people, for instance, who have the instinctive longing to leave some record of themselves behind them. And even where old age "is given to lying" of past achievements, it is not so bad as the boasting of younger men. There is generally some quaint savor about it—some illusion of a failing memory claiming our indulgence in the worst cases, and softening contempt. Invalids and persons of weak nerves and spirits must be allowed to talk of themselves. Pain, weariness, and seclusion throw them upon their inner consciousness. When every nerve and function of the body makes itself felt, and every feeling is morbidly excited, they must be excused if nothing out of themselves can command their attention. It is needless to say that persons under some immediate shock unhinging to the whole being must be not only allowed but encouraged to talk of themselves; for a personal grief put into words is infinitely lighter and more bearable than trouble pressing on the heart. There is something in every effort at expression which brings relief; and when sorrow can be brought to describe itself the worst is over. Again, persons of notoriety may be pardoned if they fall into this habit. We hear of great poets, authors, preachers, philanthropists, soldiers, who talk too much of themselves; and it is true that vanity is often a conspicuous element in conspicuous greatness, acting as a sort of spur, and indemnifying itself with words. But society itself takes the part of flatterer in their case—first leads them on, and puts them off their guard by the importunity of its interest, and then of course betrays them.

And lastly, wits make great capital of themselves. Many of the best things of our most delightful humorists are about themselves. We not only excuse it in their case, but this perpetual consciousness of and reference to themselves is of the essence of their wit, and gives it its careless, genial character. So far from any sense of restraint, when Falstaff or Sydney Smith talk of themselves, it has the effect of making us all partners in the joke. But in every case where it is so it is not the man's real self, but one or more of his personal or mental characteristics that he plays with. We are conscious all the while of an inner self which he keeps as jealously guarded as the most reserved of his hearers. That talk of self, or any part of self, which connects the speaker with grotesque, remote, abstract, or strongly contrasted ideas is more than tolerable. That which keeps down both speaker and listener, in whatever seeming variety of subject, to one tedious, obtrusive idea, is the propensity under which society rebels. After all, it is a matter of sympathy. The sinners in this line have no fellow-feeling. They do not do as they would be done by, for they see no parallel between themselves and others, their own affairs and other people's. They believe in a distinct superiority in all that concerns themselves. Trifles in the abstract are not trifles with them, but subjects of legitimate interest to the world; and that obtuseness which constitutes want of sympathy is at the bottom of their error. Any person who can make his inner self or his family affairs amusing has perception enough to secure his hearer's interest before he tries it. Indeed, a man may say and do any thing—he may enumerate his charities, he may detail his last quarrel with his wife, he may repeat a string of his own bon mots, or press upon strangers the perusal of his manuscript poem—he may offend against every principle, and every canon of taste: but so long as he excites a genuine interest, and relies on real sympathy, he is not the man we mean, and does not offend in the particular direction which has given rise to our strictures.

THE LATE GEN. PHIL KEARNEY.

ON page 604 we publish a portrait of THE LATE GENERAL PHIL KEARNEY, who was killed in battle near Fairfax Court House on 1st September.

Philip Kearney was born in this city on 2d June, 1815. He was born a soldier, and in spite of the wishes of his family, who desired him to study law, enlisted in the First United States Dragoons when quite a boy. His uncle then commanded them, and through his influence he succeeded in obtaining a commission as Second Lieutenant. He was shortly afterward sent to Europe by the Government to report upon the cavalry tactics of the French; and the better to inform himself he joined the Chasseurs d'Afrique, and made several campaigns with them in Algeria, winning golden opinions from the officers for his gallantry and military skill. When the war broke out with Mexico, Phil Kearney accompanied the army as a Captain of Dragoons, whose equipments and horses he provided at his private expense. In the march from Vera Cruz to Mexico he won high honor, and was shortly afterward brevetted Major for his gallantry. At the San Antonio Gate, City of Mexico, he was ordered to charge a battery. He gave the order to charge. A murderous volley checked his advance, and caused his troop to waver. Alone, with his sword erect, Philip Kearney dashed upon the enemy, and his men, electrified by his example, charged and took the battery. In this affair Major Kearney lost an arm.

After the Mexican war Major Kearney was sent to California, and commanded an expedition against the Indians of the Columbia River. He displayed during this campaign, as the annals of the War Department will prove, such tact, coolness, and courage as won him the praise of our best military judges. When returned from this expedition Major Kearney resigned his commission, and returning to Europe devoted several years to military studies.

During the Italian campaign of 1859 Major Kearney served as volunteer aid to General Morris, a distinguished officer in the French army. The American aid made good use of the facilities offered him during the series of brilliant victories which brought the contest to a speedy conclusion. He was ever observing, studying with unflagging zeal and ardor each movement of the army. He was unconsciously preparing himself for his future position. At the conclusion of this campaign the French officers, who had witnessed with delight the evidences of the military ardor and enthusiasm of Philip Kearney, called the Emperor Napoleon's attention to the American officer. His Majesty immediately bestowed upon him the Cross of the Legion of Honor.

When the news of the breaking out of this hideous rebellion first reached Europe, Major Philip Kearney was residing in Paris. He lost not a moment. He hurried back to offer his services to his country, and was shortly afterward appointed a Brigadier-General of the forces of New Jersey. In the army of the Potomac no officer has won higher praise than General Kearney. General M'Clellan is said to have wept when he heard of his death, and to have said: "Who can replace Phil Kearney?"

A writer in the Herald says:

During his residence in Paris General Kearney was the constant companion of those officers in the French army most celebrated for valiant deeds. He delighted in the society of such as himself—soldiers in every sense of the word. He profited by their experience, discussed with them military matters, adding thus to his own acquirements the results of the study and experience of others. Before the commencement of the present struggle his dwelling in Paris was the rendezvous of all American officers passing through France. His hospitality was unbounded, his courtesy that of the high-toned gentleman. We have seen gathered around his table there those now prominent in the rebel army—Beauregard, Lee, the Johnstons, Stonewall Jackson, Magruder, and others; and no doubt many a pang will visit their hearts when they learn that Phil Kearney was their victim. We are assured that these rebel leaders repeatedly expressed, in their letters to secessionists in Paris, their dread of the military skill and dash of "Brave Phil Kearney," and their wonder that he was not long since appointed to some high and responsible post.

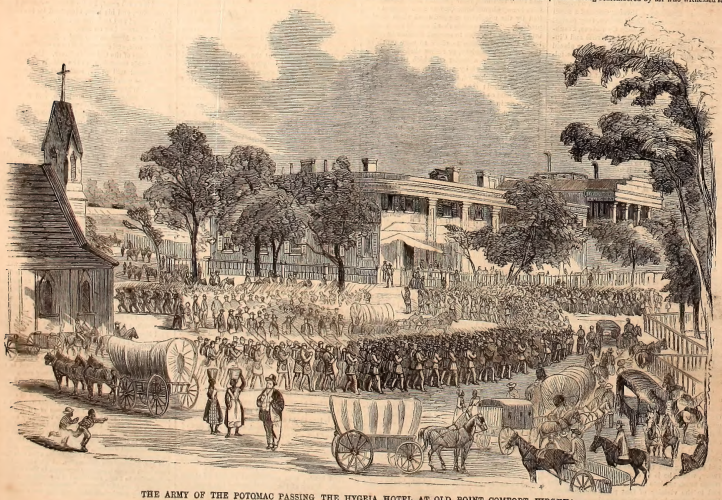
THE LATE GENERAL STEVENS.



BRIGADIER-GENERAL ISAAC INGALLS STEVENS, whose portrait we give on this page, was born at Andover, Massachusetts, in the year 1818, and was killed on 1st September, in Virginia. He graduated at the head of his class at West Point in 1839, and entered the Engineers. At the time the Mexican war broke out he was Adjutant. At Contreras and Churubusco he won the brevet rank of Captain, and at the assault upon the San Cosme gate of the city of Mexico his gallantry won for him the rank of Major. After the war he was connected for a time with the Coast Survey, and subsequently with the surveys for a Pacific Railroad. He had chosen to make his home in Washington Territory, and Mr. Pierce appointed him its Governor. Subsequently, when Mr. Buchanan became President, he represented Washington Territory in Congress. He acted with the Southern Democracy in Congress, and when the late Presidential campaign was commenced he was selected as chairman of the Breckinridge National Executive Committee. During the fall of 1860 he remained in Washington, administering the affairs of the Committee; when the election took place he went back to the Pacific. At the outbreak of the rebellion Mr. Stevens cut loose from his associates, and tendered his services to the Government. He was at first appointed Colonel of the 79th New York Volunteers, to replace Colonel Cameron, killed at Bull Run. Subsequently, he was selected as one of the Brigadiers who accompanied General Sherman in the expedition to Port Royal. His eminent capacity was frequently shown in the operations at and around Port Royal, and his friends were not shaken in their confidence by his defeat near Charleston. When his army was sent North he was appointed to a command in the division commanded by General Reno, and took part in the various fights on the Rappahannock and near Manassas.

When he fell, shot through the head by a Minié ball, he was bearing aloft the colors of one of his regiments, and cheering on his men in a furious charge upon the foe. General Stevens was small of stature, wiry and compact in form, with an elastic step which betokened great energy, and an eye whose keen glances evidenced rare genius. Modest in mien, quiet in demeanor, and reticent of speech, he was resolute in will, heroic in conduct, and, far beyond most men, insensible to fear.

THE HYGEIA HOTEL.

ORDERS have been given for the destruction of the Hygeia Hotel at Old Point Comfort, and we take this opportunity of publishing a picture of the building, which will soon figure in history alone. For many years the Hygeia Hotel will be well remembered, not only by the gay crowds which used to throng its verandas in peace time, but by the thousands of soldiers who have monopolized it since the war broke out. The artist who sketched it for us thus describes a memorable scene in its last days:

"Never before was such a connection seen at Old Point as during the passage of the Army of the Potomac through it after the evacuation of Harrison's Landing. The water crowded with transports, literally swarming with troops, and multitudes of other vessels of every kind and shape, from the proud man-of-war to the sutler's barge; the wharves, hotel, and every avenue teeming with military men, wagons, ambulances, and army material of every description, presented a scene that will be long remembered by all who witnessed it.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC PASSING THE HYGEIA HOTEL AT OLD POINT COMFORT, VIRGINIA.

"The accompanying sketch, taken in front of the famous Hygeia Hotel, will give a fair idea of the appearance of the place for several days during the transit of General M'Clellan's army, with its endless array of infantry and cavalry passing in every direction. In the centre of the picture is that portion of the Hygeia building at present exclusively used as a hotel, the partially-concealed building to the right being a portion of what has been hitherto used as a hospital. In the nearest corner of the latter are the offices of the Provost Marshal and the Medical Director.

"On the left of the picture is seen a portion of the small Roman Catholic Church—the only place of worship at Old Point. Although very small, and nothing but a frame structure, it exhibits considerable architectural skill in the design, especially the interior, which, with its open timber roof, stained glass windows, and tasteful altar furnishings, produces a picturesque and striking effect that one would scarcely expect from so simple an exterior. In the distance, between the church and the Hygeia Hotel, may be discerned a portion of the fort and two of those ominous-looking black tubes with which the ramparts are bristling."

THE LATE COLONEL FLETCHER WEBSTER.

On this page we publish a portrait of COLONEL FLETCHER WEBSTER, of the Twelfth Massachusetts Regiment, who was lately killed in battle in Virginia. The Twelfth Regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers, which he led, he was mainly instrumental in raising and organizing. The regiment, which has always been known as the Webster regiment, was among the earliest to rally at the first call of the President for three years' volunteers, and for some little time was stationed at Fort Warren, Boston harbor; but after the battle of Bull Run it was sent to Washington, and organized in the Grand Army of the Potomac with the fifth army corps, then under General Banks. Colonel Webster was the first and only surviving son of the late Hon. Daniel Webster, and was, when he died, the senior Colonel of the First Brigade of the First Division of the army corps of the Army of Virginia, commanded by General Banks. Colonel Webster had always been considered a good officer, but was also remarkable for his quiet, unambitious temper; and although much with his father during his political career, he was never a candidate for public station. He was, however, appointed Secretary of Legation to Mr. Caleb Cushing, on the Chinese embassy of 1842, and held a position during the administrations of Presidents Pierce and Buchanan in the Customs-house at Boston. Colonel Webster was about fifty years of age, and leaves a wife and children.

CHAPTER IX.

IF Captain Wragge could have looked into Mrs. Lecount's room while he stood on the palisade watching the light in her window, he would have seen the housekeeper sitting absorbed in meditation over a worthless little packet of brown stuff which lay on her toilet-table.

However exasperating to herself the conclusion might be, Mrs. Lecount could not fail to see that she had been thus far met and baffled successfully at every point. What was she to do next? If she sent for Mr. Pendril, when he came to Aldborough (with only a few hours spared from his business at her disposal) what definite course would there be for him to follow? If she showed Mr. Noel Vanstone the anonymous letter from which her note had been copied, he would apply instantly to the writer for an explanation—would expose the fabricated story by which Mrs. Lecount had succeeded in imposing on Miss Garth; and would in any event set his clerk, on the evidence of his own eyes, that the test by the marks on the neck had utterly failed. The discovery of the trick, whose unexpected presence at Aldborough might have done wonders—whose voice in the hall at North Shingles, even if she had been admitted no further, might have reached her sister's ear, and led to instant retaliation—Miss Vanstone the elder was out of reckoning, and was not likely to return for a month at least. Look as anxiously as Mrs. Lecount might along the course which she had hitherto followed, she failed to see her way through the accumulated obstacles which now barred her advance.

Other women in this position might have waited until circumstances altered and helped them. Mrs. Lecount boldly retraced her steps, and determined to find her way to her end in a new direction. Resigning for the present all further attempt to prove that the false Miss Bygrave was the true Magdalen Vanstone, she resolved to narrow the range of her next efforts, to leave the actual question of Magdalen's identity untouched, and to rest satisfied with convincing her master of this simple fact, that the young lady who was charming him at North Shingles and the disguised woman who had terrified him in Vanne hall Walk were one and the same person.

The means of effecting this new object were, to all appearance, far less easy of attainment than the means of effecting the object which Mrs. Lecount had just resigned. Here no help was to be expected from others—no ostensibly benevolent motives could be put forward as a blind—no appeal could be made to Mr. Pendril or to Miss Garth. Here the housekeeper's only chance of success depended, in the first place, on her being able to effect a stolen entrance into the house; and, in the second place, on her ability to discover whether that memorable alpaca dress from which she had secretly cut the fragment of stuff happened to form part of Miss Bygrave's wardrobe.

Taking the difficulties now before her in their order as they occurred, Mrs. Lecount first resolved to devote the next few days to watching the habits of the inmates of North Shingles from early in the morning to late at night, and to testing the capacity of the one servant in the house to resist the temptation of a bribe. Assuming that results proved successful, and that, either by money or by stratagem, she gained admission to North Shingles (without the knowledge of Mr. Bygrave or his niece), she turned next to the second difficulty of the two—the difficulty of obtaining access to Miss Bygrave's wardrobe.

If the servant proved corruptible, all obstacles in this direction might be considered as removed beforehand. But if the servant proved honest, the new problem was no easy one to solve.

Long and careful consideration of the question led the housekeeper at last to the bold resolution of obtaining an interview—if the servant failed her—with Mrs. Bygrave herself. What was the true cause of this lady's mysterious seclusion? Was she a person of the strictest and the most inconvenient integrity? or a person who could not be depended on to preserve a secret? or a person who was as artful as Mr. Bygrave himself, and who was kept in reserve to forward the object of some new deception which was yet to come? In the first two cases Mrs. Lecount could trust in her own powers of dissimulation, and in the results which they might achieve. In the last case (if no other end was gained) it might be of vital importance to her to discover an enemy hidden in the dark. In any event, she determined to run the risk. Of the three chances in her favor on which she had reckoned at the outset of the struggle—the chance of entrapping Magdalen by word of mouth, the chance of entrapping her by the help of her friends, and the chance of entrapping her by means of Mrs. Bygrave—two had been tried, and two had failed. The third remained to be tested yet, and the third might succeed.

So the captain's enemy plotted against him in the privacy of her own chamber, while the captain watched the light in her window from the beach outside.

Before breakfast the next morning Captain Wragge posted the forged letter to Zurich with his own hand. He went back to North Shingles with his mind not quite decided on the course to take with Mrs. Lecount during the all-important interval of the next ten days.

Greatly to his surprise, his doubts on this point were abruptly decided, on his return to the house, by Magdalen herself.

He found her waiting for him in the room where the breakfast was laid. She was walking restlessly to and fro, with her head drooping on her bosom, and her hair hanging disordered over her shoulders. The moment she looked up, on his entrance, the captain felt the fear which Mrs. Wragge had felt before him—the fear that her mind would be struck prostrate again, as it had been struck once already, when Frank's letter reached her in Vauxhall Walk.

"Is he coming again to-day?" she asked, pushing away from her the chair which Captain Wragge offered, with such violence that she threw it on the floor.

"Yes," said the captain, wisely answering her in the fewest words. "He is coming at two o'clock."

"Take me away!" she exclaimed, tossing her hair back wildly from her face. "Take me away before he comes. I can't get over the horror of marrying him while I am in this hateful place; take me somewhere where I can forget it, or I shall go mad! Give me two days' rest—two days out of sight of that horrible sea—two days out of prison in this horrible house—two days by where in the wide world away from Aldborough, and I'll come back with you! I'll go through with it to the end! Only give me two days' escape from that man and every thing belonging to him! Do you hear, you villain?" she cried, seizing his arm, and shaking it in a frenzy of passion.—"I have been tortured enough—I can't bear it any longer!"

There was but one way of quieting her, and the captain instantly took it.

"If you will try to control yourself," he said, "you shall leave Aldborough in an hour's time."

She stopped his arm, and leaned back heavily against the wall behind her.

"I'll try," she answered, struggling for breath, but looking at him less wildly. "You sha'n't complain of me, if I can help it." She attempted confusedly to take her handkerchief from her apron pocket, and failed to find it. The captain took it out for her. Her eyes softened, and she drew her breath more freely as she received the handkerchief from him. "You are a kindhearted man, Captain Wragge," she said; "I am sorry I spoke so passionately to you just now—I am very, very sorry." The tears stole into her eyes, and she offered him her hand with the native grace and gentleness of happier days. "Be friends with me again," she said, pleadingly. "I'm only a girl, Captain Wragge—I'm only a girl!"

He took her hand in silence, patted it for a moment, and then opened the door for her to go back to her own room again. There was genuine regret in his face as he showed her that trifling attention. He was a vagabond and a cheat; he had lived a mean, shuffling, degraded life; but he was human, and she had found her way to the last sympathies in him which not even the self-profanation of a swindler's existence could wholly destroy. "Damn the breakfast!" he said, when the servant came in for her orders. "Go to the inn directly, and say I want a carriage and pair at the door in an hour's time." He went out into the passage, still chafing under a sense of mental disturbance which was new to him, and shouted to his wife more fiercely than ever: "Pack up what we want for a week's absence, and be ready in half an hour!" Having issued those directions, he returned to the breakfast-room, and looked at the half-spread table with an impatient wonder at his disinclination to do justice to his own meal. "She has rubbed off the edge of my appetite," he said to himself, with a forced laugh. "I'll try a cigar, and a turn in the fresh air."

If he had been twenty years younger those remedies might have failed him. But where is the man to be found whose internal policy succumbs to revolution when that man is on the wrong side of fifty? Exercise and change of place gave the captain back into the possession of himself. He recovered the lost sense of the flavor of his cigar, and recalled his wandering attention to the question of his approaching absence from Aldborough. A few minutes' consideration satisfied his mind that Magdalen must break had forced him to take the course of all others which, on a fair review of existing emergencies, it was more most desirable to keep.

"DO YOU HEAR, YOU VILLAIN?"

Captain Wragge's inquiries, on the evening when he and Magdalen had drunk tea at Sea View, had certainly informed him that the housekeeper's brother possessed a modest competence; but his sister was his nearest living relative: and that there were certain unscrupulous cousins on the spot who were anxious to usurp the place in his will which properly belonged to Mrs. Lecount. Here were strong motives to take the housekeeper by fiction when the illness of her brother's relapse reached England. But if any idea of Noel Vanstone's true position ever crossed the mind of one, who could say whether she might not at the eleventh hour prefer asserting her large pecuniary interest in her master to defending her small pecuniary interest as her brother's bedfellow? While these doubts remained undecided the plain necessity of checking the growth of Noel Vanstone's intimacy with the family at Combe Raleigh did not admit of a doubt, and of all means of effecting that object none could be less open to suspicion than the temporary removal of the household from their residence at Aldborough. Thoroughly satisfied with the soundness of this conclusion, Captain Wragge made straight for Sea-View Cottage, to apologize and explain before the carriage came and the departure took place.

Mr. Noel Vanstone was easily accessible to visitors: he was among the gentlest of living men in fact. His disappointment and vexation were freely expressed when he heard the news which the friend had to communicate. But the captain's potent tongue, however, soon impressed on him the necessity of resignation to present circumstances. The bare hint that the "pious fraud" might fail after all, if any thing happened in the ten days' interval to enlighten Mrs. Lecount, was the instant effect in making Mr. Noel Vanstone as patient and as submissive as he could be.

"I won't tell you where we are going, for two good reasons," said Captain Wragge, when his preliminary explanations were completed for the first. His dissatisfied and vexation were freely expressed when he heard the news which the friend had to communicate. "Your housekeeper's tongue, however, soon impressed on him the necessity of resignation to present circumstances. The bare hint that the "pious fraud" might fail after all, if any thing happened in the ten days' interval to enlighten Mrs. Lecount, was the instant effect in making Mr. Noel Vanstone as patient and as submissive as he could be.

"I won't tell you where we are going, for two good reasons," said Captain Wragge, when his preliminary explanations were completed for the first place, I haven't made up my mind yet; and in the second place, if you don't know our destination is, Mrs. Lecount can't worm it out of you. I have not the least doubt she is watching us at this moment from behind the window-curtain. When she asks what I wanted with you this morning, tell her I came to do good-by for a few days—finding my niece not so well again, and wishing to take her on a short visit to some friends, to try change of air. If you could produce an impression on Mrs. Lecount's mind (without overdoing it) that you are a little disappointed in me, and that you are rather inclined to doubt my heartiness in cultivating your acquaintance, you will greatly help the present object. You may depend on our return to North Shingles in four or five days at farthest. If any thing strikes me in the mean time, the post is always at our service, and I won't fail to write to you."

"Won't Miss Bygrave write to me?" inquired Mr. Noel Vanstone, piteously. "Did she know you were coming here? Did she send me a message?"

"Unpardonable on my part to have forgotten it!" cried the captain. "She sent you her love."

Mr. Noel Vanstone closed his eyes in silent ecstasy.

While he opened them again Captain Wragge had passed through the garden gate, and was on his way back to North Shingles. As soon as his own door had closed on him Mrs. Lecount descended from the post of observation which the captain had rightly suspected her of occupying, and addressed the inquiry to her master which the captain had rightly foreseen would follow his departure. The reply she received produced but one impression on her mind. She at once set it down as a falsehood, and addressed to her own window, to keep watch over North Shingles more vigilantly than ever.

To her utter astonishment, after the lapse of less than half an hour, she saw an empty carriage draw up at Mr. Bygrave's door. The trunks was brought out and packed on the vehicle. Miss Bygrave appeared, and took her seat in it. She was followed into the carriage by a tall, elegant sun and stature, whom the housekeeper conjectured to be Mrs. Bygrave. The carriage came, and stood waiting on the path. The last person to appear was Mr. Bygrave. He locked the house door, and took his place by with him to a cottage near at hand, which was the residence of the landlord of North Shingles. On his return he could be observed to cross the walked away by herself toward the hubbier quarter of the little town—and joined the party in the carriage. The coachman mounted the box, and the vehicle disappeared.

Mrs. Lecount had down the opera-glass, through which she had been closely investigating these proceedings, with a feeling of blank perplexity which she was almost ashamed to acknowledge to herself. The secret of Mr. Bygrave's object in suddenly emptying his house on Aldborough of every living creature in it was an impenetrable mystery to her.

Submitting herself to circumstances with a ready resignation which Captain Wragge had not shown, on his side, in a similar emergency, Mrs. Lecount wasted neither time nor temper in unprofitable speculation. She left the window to chicken or to clear as the future might decide, and looked exclusively at the uses to which she might put the morning's event in her own interests. Whatever might have become of the family at North Shingles, the servant was left behind, and the servant was exactly the person whose assistance might now be of vital importance to the housekeeper's projects. Mrs. Lecount put on her bonnet, inspected the collection of loose silver in her purse, and set forth on the spot to make the servant's acquaintance.

She went first to the cottage, at which Mr. Bygrave had left the key of North Shingles, to discover the servant's present address from the landlord. So far as this object was concerned her errand proved successful. The landlord knew that the girl had been allowed to go home for a few days to her friends, and knew in what part of Aldborough her friends lived. But here its sources of information suddenly dried up. He knew nothing of the destination to which Mr. Bygrave and his family had departed. He was, in fact, as perfectly ignorant of the number of days over which their absence might be expected to extend. All he could say was that he had not received a notice to quit from his tenant, and that he had been requested to leave the key of the house in his possession until Mr. Bygrave returned to claim it in his own person.

Baffled, but not discouraged, Mrs. Lecount turned her steps next toward the back street of Aldborough, and astonished the servant's relatives by inquiring for the girl at the wrong cottage.

Easily imposed on at starting by Mrs. Lecount's pretense of calling to engage her under the impression that she had left Mr. Bygrave's service, the servant was ready to answer the questions put to her. But she knew as little as the landlord of her master's plans. She could tell no more about them than that she had not been dismissed, and that she was to await the receipt of a note recalling her to North Shingles at the expiration of North Shingles. Nothing expected to hear from her mistress until the end of the week, when she would shifted her ground, and led the woman into talking generally of the extraordinary step which had removed Mr. Bygrave's family.

Profiting by the knowledge gained in this interest manner of the little secrets of the household, Mrs. Lecount made two discoveries. She found out, in the first place, that the servant having enough to do in attending to the concerns part of the domestic work was in no position to disclose the secrets of Mr. Bygrave's study, which were known only to the young lady herself and to her father. In the second place, the housekeeper ascertained that the true reason of Mrs. Bygrave's rapid seclusion was to be found in the simple fact that she had taken a fancy to an infant, and that her husband was probably ashamed of allowing her to indulge it openly. These apparently trivial discoveries enlightened Mrs. Lecount on a very important point which had been previously involved in doubt. They at once satisfied that the likeliest way to obtaining a private interview with Magdalen's wretched boy through deluding the imbecile lady, and not through bribing the ignorant servant.

Having arrived at this conclusion, pregnant with coming assaults on the weakly-fortified discretion of poor Mrs. Bygrave, the housekeeper returned to Aldborough, and obtained from the servant's relatives the address at which she was to find her. Here she knocked at the door—but, in the first possible words. He had been staying with a distant relative. The distant relative possessed two pictures—Gems by the Old Masters—which he was willing to dispose of, and which he had guaranteed for authenticity to Mr. Bygrave. Both of Mr. Noel Vanstone, as an amateur in such matters, wished to see the pictures before they visible in half an hour's time, when Mr. Bygrave would have returned to North Shingles.

Having already satisfied himself of the incompetence of the arch-conspirator had his sightless privilege along with it—of the his short human nose—said, "Fine weather, isn't it? Good afternoon!"—and sauntered out comfortably to continue his walk on the sea-beach.

On the expiration of the half hour Mr. Noel Vanstone presented himself at North Shingles, with the confession of a lover burning inextinguishably in his bosom through the superincumbent material fog of a thoroughly bewildered man. To his inexpressible happiness he found Magdalen alone in the parlor. Never yet had she looked so beautiful in his eyes. The rest and retirement for four days' absence from Aldborough had not failed to produce their results: she looked more than recovered her composure. Vibrating perpetually from one violent extreme to another, Mr. Noel Vanstone's first words expressed the joy of a fond boy at seeing a favorite exhibition of spirits which defied all remonstrance and confidence in consequences. Her eyes sparkled; her cheeks were bright with color; she talked incessantly, with a fearless recklessness of the girlish days of past days—she laughed with a deplorable perindecency in laughing—as Mr. Noel Vanstone's smooth voice and Mrs. Lecount's insinuating graces of manner, with an overcharged remembrance of the original, which spoilt her the coarse reflection of the delicately-accurate mimicry of former times. Mr. Noel Vanstone, who had never yet known her as he saw her now, was enchanted; his weak head whirled with an intoxication of admiration and love; he looked at Sarah as if they had caught the infection from hers. The half hour during which he was alone with her passed like a single minutes to him. The next time had elapsed, and when she suddenly left the room to fetch the previously announced picture for her aunt's presence—miser as he was, he would have paid at that moment five golden sovereigns out of his pocket for the five golden minutes more passed in her society.

The door had hardly closed on Magdalen before it opened again and the captain walked in. He entered on the explanations which his visitor naturally expected from him, with the unceremonious abruptness of a man hard pressed for time, and determined to make the most of every moment at his disposal.

"Since we last saw each other," he began, "I have been thinking up the chances for and against us as we stand at present. The result on my own mind is this: If you are still at Aldborough when I have had time to consult Mrs. Lecount, all the pains we have taken will have been taken entirely in vain. If your housekeeper had fifty brothers all dying together, she would throw the whole fifty over sooner than leave you alone at Sea View when I am your neighbors at North Shingles."

Mr. Noel Vanstone's flushed cheeks turned pale with dismay. His own knowledge of Mrs. Lecount told him that this view of the case was the right one.

"If you go again," proceeded the captain, "nothing will be gained; for nothing would persuade your housekeeper, in that case, that we have not left you the means of following us. You came here Aldborough on account of me; what is more, you must go without leaving a single visible trace behind you for us to follow. If we accomplish this object, even in the course of the next days, Mrs. Lecount will take the journey to Zurich, and will find us at the Estaire at Sea View to a dead certainty. Don't ask questions! I have got your instructions ready for you, and I want you to pay strict attention to them. Your marriage with my niece depends on your not forgetting a word of them. And I am ready to tell you—One question first. Have you followed my advice? Have you told Mrs. Lecount your real business with me, and your reasons for it?"

"I did worse than that," replied Mr. Noel Vanstone, piteously. "I showed her Miss Bygrave on my own feelings. I disgraced myself by saying that I doubted Miss Bygrave!"

"You do slightingly yourself, my dear Sir! Doubt us both with all your might—and I'll help you. One question more. Did I speak loud enough this afternoon? Did Mrs. Lecount hear me?"

"Yes. I cannot opened the door; Lecount heard you. What made you—you are that message? I see you pictures here. Is this another pious fraud, Mr. Bygrave?"

"Admirably guessed, Mr. Vanstone! You shall see the picture of my imagination—dawning in the very next words which I am now about to address to you. When you get back to Sea View this is what you are to say to Mrs. Lecount. Tell her that my relative's works of Art are two worthless pictures—copies from the Old Masters, which I have tried to sell you, as originals, at an exorbitant price. Say you suspect me of being little better than a plausible impostor, and pity my unfortunate niece for being associated with me in a retail of a lie. There is your text to speak from. Say in many words what I have just said in few. You can do that, can't you?"

"Of course I can do it," said Mr. Noel Vanstone. "But I can tell you one thing—Lecount won't believe me."

"Wait a little, Mr. Vanstone; I have not done with my instructions yet. You understand what I have just told you? Very good. We may get on from to-day to-morrow. Go on to-morrow with Mrs. Lecount at your usual time. I will meet you on the parade and bow to you. Instead of returning my bow, look the other way as you pass me, and—mind cut me! That is easy enough to do, isn't it?"

"She won't believe me, Mr. Bygrave—she won't believe me!"

"Wait a little again, Mr. Vanstone. There are two more instructions to come. You will go your directions for to-day, and you have got your directions for to-morrow. Now for the day after. You will meet me on the parade, and bow to see the letter to Zurich. On the seventh day decline to go out with Mrs. Lecount, on account of the annoyance of meeting me again. Grumble about the smallness of the place; complain of your health; and when you have got rid of Mrs. Lecount, and never made acquaintance with the Bygraves; and when you have worried Mrs. Lecount with your discontent, ask her on a sudden if she can't suggest a change for the better. If you put that question to her on the seventh day, what else can be dependent on to answer it?"

"She won't seem to be questioned at all," replied Mr. Noel Vanstone, irritably. "I have only got to say I am tired of Aldborough, and it can believe me or not, as it pleases. I'm quite positive, Mr. Bygrave, she won't!—she will have her suggestion ready before I can ask for it."

"Ay, ay," said the captain, coolly. "There is some place, then, that Mrs. Lecount wants to go to—this autumn?"

"She wants to go there (hang her!) every autumn."

"To go where?"

"To Admiral Bartram's — you don't know him, do you? He lives at Hampstead."

"Don't lose your patience, Mr. Vanstone! What you are now telling me is of the most vital importance to us. Admiral Bartram is the man Who is Admiral Bartram?"

"An old friend of my father's. My father laid him under obligations—my father lent him money when they were both young men. I am like one of the family at Mr. Crux's—my room is always kept ready for me. Not that there's any family at the admiral's except his nephew, George Bartram. George is my cousin. In as intimate with George as my father was with the admiral; and I have been told by my father, for I haven't lent my friend any money. Lecount always makes a show of liking George—believe to myself. She likes the admiral too: he flatters her vanity. He always invites her to come to stay with St. Crux. She says he has one of the best bedrooms, and treats her as if she was a lady. She's as proud as Lucifer—always talking about being a lady. She pesters me every autumn to go to St. Crux. What's the matter? What are you taking out your pocket-book for?"

"I want the admiral's address, Mr. Vanstone. Can't you remember it? Stop! I've got it again immediately!"

With those words Captain Wragge opened his pocket-book and wrote down the address from Mr. Noel Vanstone's dictation, as follows: "Admiral Bartram, St. Crux-in-the-Marsh, near Oscony, Essex."

"Good!" cried the captain, closing his pocket-book again. "The end is in sight. That used in our way is now cleared out of it. Patience, Mr. Vanstone—patience! Let me sum up my instructions again at the point where we dropped them. Give me five minutes more attention, and you will find your way as unerringly as plainly as I see it. On the day after to-morrow you declare you are tired of Aldborough, and Mrs. Lecount suggests St. Crux. You don't say yes or no on the spot; you take the next day to consider it, and you make your decision on the last thing at night to go to St. Crux the first thing in the morning. Are you in the habit of superintending your own letters? If not, you may easily shirk all the trouble of it on Mrs. Lecount's shoulders?"

"Lecount has all the trouble, of course; Lecount is paid for it. But I don't really go, of course."

"You go as fast as horses can take you to the railway station, without having half a dozen communication with this house either personally or by letter. You leave Mrs. Lecount behind to break up your establishment, to settle with the tradespeople, and to follow you to St. Crux the next morning. Are you quite sure of all this hanging on the tenth morning she receives the letter from Zurich; and if you only carry out my instructions, Mr. Vanstone, you will go you at there to Zurich she goes!"

Mr. Noel Vanstone's color began to rise again as the captain's extravagant dawned on him at last in true light.

"And what am I to do at St. Crux?" he inquired.

"Wait there till I call for you," replied the captain. "As soon as Mrs. Lecount's back is turned I will go to the church here and give the necessary notice of my approaching marriage for the or the next I will travel to the address written down in my pocket-book, pick you up at the railway station, and take you to London with me to get the license. With that document in my possession we shall be on our way back to Aldborough while Mrs. Lecount is on her way out to Zurich, and before she starts on her return journey you and my niece will be man and wife! There are your future prospects for you. What do you think of them?"

"What a head you have got!" cried Mr. Noel Vanstone, in a sudden outburst of enthusiasm. "You're the most extraordinary man I ever met

THACKERAY ON NOVELS.

NOVELS and their heroes and heroines are our present subject of discourse. Are you one of us, dear Sir, and do you love sentiment? If so, be reminded of your first novel with surely a pleasure to you. Hush! I never read quite to the end of my first, the Scottish Chief; I couldn't. I peeped in an alarmed furtive manner at some of the closing pages. Miss Fanny, with a kind look and tender-hearted creature, would not have Wallace's head chopped off at the end of Vol. V. She made me dine in prison," and if I cannot right Clara, notoriously I have not read the book for forty-two or three years), Robert Bruce must have been left to his fellows, in which he said, "And Bannockburn shall equal Cambuskenneth." But I repeat, I could not read the end of the Scottish Chief, for my dear delightful book for crying. Good Heavens! It was as sad, as sad as going back to school.

The glorious Scott cycle of romances came to me some four or five years afterward; and I think boys of my time especially fortunate in having such noble and those delightful books at that special time when we could best enjoy them. Oh, that sunshiny bench in half-holidays, with Claverhouse and Dalgetty for companion! I have remarked of very late days some little man in a great state with you about the romances of Captain Mayne Reid, and Gustave Aimard's Prairie and Indian Stories, and during occasional holiday visits, looking off to the shelf with the volume under their arms. But are those Indians and warriors as good as Scott's Highland and warriors were? (I say, are they? Young gentlemen, mind, I do not say they are not.) But as an Elder I feel to be heartily thankful for the return of the-10 Leo. IV., let us say, and so downward to a period not extremely far off, when I, too, shall be under dear Scott. Whom do I love in the works of that dear old master? Amo—

The Baron of Bradwardine, and Fergus. (Captain Waverley is certainly very mild.)

Amo Ivanhoe; Locksley; Amo; the Templar.

Amo Quentin Durward, and specially Quentin's uncle, who brought the Boar to bay. I forget the gentleman's name.

I have never cared for the Master of Ravenswood, or fetched his hat out of the water, but I stopped it there when I last met him (circa 1825).

"I find, on reference to the novel, that Sir William died on the scaffold, not in prison, as I remembered.

"My prayer is heard. Life's end is not by Heaven, Beloved Hilda! Many happy years remain before we be stopped. He fell. And with that mighty shock the scaffold shook to its foundation."

The remark of Bruce (which I protest I had not read for forty-two years) I find in the Scottish Chief, which was uttered by the English barbels, Bruce turned to Ruthven, with a barbic smile. "Let him come, my brave barons! and he shall find that Bannockburn shall page with Cambuskenneth!" In the same amiable author's famous novel of Thaddeus of Warsaw there is more cry. Thaddeus sang novel verses, and Kosciusko wept. Not for singing, by the way,—incapable of speaking. Thaddeus left his wife-look to her carriage. His tears rushed out in spite of himself, and, hastily kissing the parent three times, these assurances, of assumed appearance through her tears, which, however, were the genuine of happiness." . . . And a sentence or two further, "Kosciusko fell from him, and embalmed the foundation with a shower of tears."

Also SALADIN and the Scotch knight in the Talisman. The Sultan best.

Also CLAVERHOUSE.

Also MAJOR DALGETTY. Delightful major! To think of him is to desire to jump up, run to the book, and get the volume down from the shelf. About all those heroes of Scott what a manly bloom there is, and honorable modesty! They are not at all heroic. They seem to blush somehow in their prettiest of boys, and as it were to say, "Since it must be done, here goes!" They are handsome, modest, upright, simple, courageous, and (I say, I say, I am a mother (which is absurd), I should like to be mother-in-law to several young men of the Waverley novels, and—

Let us like those most unassuming, manly, unpretending gentlemen, I have to own that I think the heroes of Bulwer writer, viz.

LEATHER-STOCKING,
UNCAS,
CHINGACHGOOK,
TOM COFFIN,

are quite equals of Scott's men; perhaps Leather-stocking is better than any one in "Scott's lot." La Longue Carabine is one of the great prize-men in the Book of Heroes. Uncas and Uncle Chingy, Sir Roger de Coverley, Falstaff—heroic figures, all—American or British, and the author has deserved well of his country who devised them.

At school, in my time, there was a public day, when the Duke of Wellington, or some big wig or two from the universities, old school-fellows, and the forth, came to the place. Boys were not paraded; prizes were administered; each lad being in a new suit of clothes—and magnificent dandies, with pockets stuffed with gold, we were. Oh, pockets, cheeks, clean collars, glossy new raiment, beaming faces, glorious in a small way! carved names, initials in bark, and mirth, and honor! To see a hundred boys marshalled in a chapel or old hall; to see their several masters, and the head master, and look in their brave, calm faces; I say, does not the sight and sound of such a scene awaken feelings in any sympathetic kindness? . . . Well. As about boys, so about Novelists. I fancy the boys of Fourteen hundred and Fifty to be as fine as those myself in that academy. I like our fellows to look well, upright, gentlemanlike. There is a fellow with a pimple on his eye. What a magnificent build of a boy! There is Master Scott, one of the leaders of the school. What is the use of the fellow more hearty and manly? Yonder lean, shambling, cadaverous lad, who is always borrowing money, telling lies, leering after the maid-servants, is Master Laurence Sterne—his bishop's grandson, and himself intended for the Church! for shame, you little reprobate! But what a genius the fellow has! Let him have a sound thrashing, and then see the young man at the top of the whipping-room give him a gold medal. Such would be my practice if I were Doctor Birch, and master of the school.

Let us drop this school metaphor, this birch and all pertaining thereto. Our subject, I beg leave to remind the reader's humble servant, is novel heroes and heroines. How do you like your heroes, readers of my acquaintance. The gentleman refers me to Miss Austen; the boy to Mr. Ainsworth, Captain Reid, and (with my rosy blushes) Colonel Esmond, and owns that in youth she was very much in love with Valancourt.

Valancourt, and who was he? cry the young people. Valancourt, my dears, was the hero of one of the most delightful romances which was published in this country. The beauty and elegance of Valancourt made my young grandmamma agents hearts to beat with respectful sympathy. He and his glory have passed away. Ah, who is not that the glory of novels should ever decay; that dust should gather round them on the shelves; that the annual cleaner of the Messieurs the publishers should dwindle, dwindle! Inquire at Mudie's, or the London Library, who asks for the Mysteries of Udolpho now? Have not even the Mysteries of Paris ceased to frighten? Alas, our novels are but for a season; and how characters vanish as a mist before the modest forbids me to mention, who shall go to limbo along with Valancourt and Doricourt, and the Children of the Abbey.

A dear old sentimental friend, with whom I discoursed on the subject of novels and novel heroes, had her favorite hero was Lord Orville, in Evelina, that novel which Doctor Johnson loved so. I took down the book from a set old [illegible] on a club, where Mrs. Barbauld's novelists repose: and this in the kind of thing, ladies and gentlemen, in which your ancestors found pleasure:

"And here, while I was looking for the books, I was followed by Lord Orville, who begged to know the cause of my alarm, and, approaching me with a look of anxiety, said, 'Is this the first time, Madam, you have been frighted?'

"'I believe so my lord,' said I, still looking for the books.

"'So sudden an accident must surely be very terrible.'

"'No great loss, my lord,' said I, endeavoring to speak with composure.

"'Such a passion,' said he, gravely, 'cannot be from double loss.'

"'I must beg pardon,' cried I, 'what Mrs. Selwyn has done with those books.'

"'Would to Heaven,' continued he, 'I might flatter myself you would allow me to grieve it!'

"I turned hastily from him, greatly confused, 'and ask what she has done with them.'

"'Is it possible,' said he, looking my hand, 'and you give me not the smallest hope of any return! Will you not, then, suffer me to hope that I may be allowed to fortunate like your own, to support your absence?'

"'My lord,' said I, 'this is no proper time to hear such language.'

"'Is it possible,' he, to my inexpressible confusion, dropping on one knee, 'that you can doubt my love?'

"'Pray, my lord,' exclaimed I, 'rise, I beseech you; indeed your humility is not so cruel as to mock me.'

"'Mock you?' repeated he, earnestly; 'no, I revere you. I esteem and admire you above all human beings! You are the friend to whom my soul is attached, as to its better half. You are the most amiable, the most perfect of women; and you are dearer to me than language has the power to express.'

"I attempt not to describe my sensations at this moment; I scarcely knew whether I was afraid, I was almost frantic my cheeks, and my feet refused to sustain me. Lord Orville hastily supported me to a chair upon which I sank almost lifeless.

"I can not write the scene that followed, though every word is engraven on my heart: but his protestations, his expressions, were too flattering for repetition; nor would he, in spite of my repeated efforts to leave him, suffer me to escape; in short, my dear Sir, I was not proof against his solicitations, and he drew from me the most earnest account of my heart."

Contrast this old perfumed, powdered D'Arlay conversation with the present modern talk. If the two young people wished to hide their emotions nowadays, and express themselves in modest language, the story would run:

"While I was looking for the books, Lord Orville came in, and immediately down in the mouth, as he said:

"'In this true, Miss Anville; are you going to cut me?'

"I replied, with a sickly smile, said I, still pretending that I was looking for the books:

"'You're very quiet about it,' said he.

"'You don't think I'm chaffin' said I, as cheerfully as I could.

"'You don't think I'm chaffin' said Orville, with much emotion.

"'What has Mrs. Selwyn done with the books?' I went on.

"'What, going?' said he, 'and going for good? I wish I was such a good-plucked one as you, Miss Anville.' etc.

The conversation, you perceive, might be easily worked up into a love story; and if the hero and heroine were modern, they would not be suffered to go through their dialogue on stilts, but would converse in the natural graceful way at present customary. By-the-way, what a strange custom that is in modern days for novelists to make the men bully the women! In the time of Miss Porter and Miss Anne D'Arlay the heroes were powdered love and courtesies, graceful courtesy from men to women. In the time of Miss Bronté, absolute rudeness. In the time, Blessedness, that you like rudeness, and are pleased at being ill-used by men? I could point to more than one lady novelist who so represents you.

Other people may not much like this extract, Madam, from your favorite novel, but when you come to read it you will like it. I suspect that when you were a little girl you liked it, and you read it a dear. Did you not yourself pass a winter at Bath, when you were the belle of the assembly? Are they not all there still in your ears to this day? You think of him eleven buttres pass away. You look at him with the bright eyes of those days, and your hero stands before you, the brave, the accomplished, the simple, the true gentleman; and he makes the same regard of love to one of the most beautiful young women the world ever saw; and he leads you out to the ceiling, to the door, unspoken music. Hark to the horns of Elfand, blowing, blowing! Bonne vieille, you remember that melody, and your heart-strings thrill with it still.

M'CLELLAN.

Once more we hail him, Chief! The nation's heart,
Faint and despairing, stricken to the dust,
Turns back to thee with the old hopeful trust,
And childlike confidence, and love. Thou art
Our Great Leader. We have watched thee well,
And marked how then hast borne the taunts and cares
Of those whose envious falsehood hamper'd full.
About thine head, how, unmoved by their jeers,
Thou hast rolled on with patient fortitude.
Wending from all the Legions under thee
A love which is almost idolatry!
The one man this Country greatest good.
From us, young Children, foremost in the van!
The Hour of need has come—be thou the Man!

THE REBEL RAID INTO MARYLAND.

AT the hour we write it is uncertain whether the rebel army in Maryland is being absolutely extinguished, or whether it is recuperating from the defeat it suffered at the hands of General M'Clellan on 14th. Between these lines reach the reader he will probably know the facts. Lee may possibly maintain himself in some strong position till reinforcements can reach him from Richmond, and may thus be enabled to renew the contest. But the chances are that he will suffer so much, and be so hardly pressed, that, by the time Beauregard reaches him with the 40,000 men who are said to have marched from Gordonsville, his army will be a wreck, and escape, not victory, will be his exclusive object.

Well-informed observers never could be made to believe that Lee would cross the Potomac. General M'Clellan is said to have replied, when he was told that the rebels had crossed, "It's too good to be true." He and most of us here give the rebels credit for more wisdom. It was evident, as we took occasion to show in our last number, that to cross the river and not to take Washington or Baltimore would be fatal to the rebel army. Nothing but the immediate capture of one or both of these cities could redeem the step, or save the army from its inevitable consequences. M'Clellan knew perfectly well that Lee could not take either Washington or Baltimore, and therefore argued that he would not cross the river. He did cross: he did not take Washington or Baltimore, or even seriously threaten, and the result will probably be the destruction of his army.

People are asking what was the object of the rebels in invading Maryland, if the invasion was so sure to be fatal to them?

In the first place, it is not likely that the rebel leaders were aware of the weakness of Washington, or of the defenses of Baltimore. They may, perhaps, have believed that they could easily capture both upon the rumored great noise one or other of these cities. If our armies had been handled awkwardly, if they had deployed to follow the rebels across the river, if M'Clellan had marched on Leesburg, as some of his generals are said to have advised, this hope might have been realized. It was only when Jackson discovered the enormous army of M'Clellan moving westwardly toward the Monocacy, and seeming itself in between the rebels and the fords by which they had crossed, that the realized its utter futility. Again, some of the rebel leaders seem to have been so flushed with success as not to rely upon what they called "a popular rising" in Maryland. We at the North, who have had plenty frequent occasion of late to doubt the measure of Maryland, know all along how much this reasoner amounted to. We had thought of the "popular rising" long before it was mentioned to the rebels, and had applied the antidote. Baltimore might have "risen" if her people had chosen; but it would only have been to be fall prostrate in holes in very short order. Annapolis might have "risen," very probably, but there would have settled her account with history. Whatever the opinions of the Marylanders may be—and we hope they are sound and loyal—they had no more chance of "rising" than the convicts in a well-ordered penitentiary.

We can not help thinking that the true secret of the rebel invasion of Maryland, and of the similar demonstration against Ohio, is simply the utter desperation of the rebel leaders. They have seen, in the course of fifteen months, a Union army of less than half a million of men overrun and conquer nearly the whole of fifteen large States, and parts of seven others; they have seen their strongest positions wrested from them, and their finest armies broken and dispersed; they have lost New Orleans and the Mississippi River; they have failed in every enterprise they undertook, and we have succeeded in every enterprise of ours save one only; they have seen their coast line, over 3000 miles long, which every one was sure could not be blockaded, hermetically sealed against commerce; they have lost every vessel they built, from the Merrimac to the Arkansas; they have seen their people enduring miseries such as no people in modern times have ever suffered before; and with this frightful catalogue of disaster and misfortune to dispirit them, they see that, if the contest is to be prolonged, they must wage it against an army of a million of men and a fleet of impregnable iron-clad vessels. Can any one wonder at their being desperate? What could they do except to attempt some wild, desperate scheme, such as the invasion of Maryland and Ohio, and trust to luck, accident, or the blunders of our generals for success? To remain where they were, and wait to be attacked by a million of men, was simply ruin without a chance of escape. To retire in safety was physically ruin; but there was a remote possibility that in some extraordinary freak fortune might restore to them all they had lost. Then to take Washington or Cincinnati. To this vague hope they probably clung, and hence their late movements.

It seems that the period of ill-luck which commenced with the seven days' battles is ended at last, and that we may look once more on our side. Let us beware of our past errors. Let us not pronounce our generals imbecile, or traitors, or cowards, because they have not succeeded as we fool. See what M'Clellan has done now! Let us not cry aloud to Heaven to restore the chaos which we met with a trifling check. Let us not meet with many checks yet before the war ends: it will be enough for good men if after all it ends well.

THE TAX LAW.

THE tax law will or should be finished by the time these lines are read. It would have been in force before but that it absolutely required some time to organize the machinery required for its execution. It is quite certain that machinery may not be perfected before 1st October. Direct taxation is so new a thing in this country that the whole system of the assessments, tax-gatherers, and taxable products had to be blocked out of raw material; to set these in order so as to carry out the intentions of Congress naturally required some time.

There is no doubt that inevitable errors, as might have been expected. The assessors, who apportion the tax to be paid by each citizen and each property, have, under the law, to make over $1200 a year. It was the intention of Congress that their salary should be about $2000 each. It is well that their capacity to this sum they will be compelled to protract appeals before them to an unreasonable length, and to resort to other ways" with the families of officials in the service of the United States, but the practice of which should rather be discouraged than stimulated. Whether over or under income of $2000 will secure assessors of undoubted probity is an open question. Two thousand dollars a year is, no doubt, a handsome sum, but men in every city who spend more. And as it will be in the power of an assessor to report the tax upon $1200 a year, which he should be $500, it is easy to see that, if by any chance dishonest men should obtain appointments as assessors, the temptation would be committed. A prominent politician, who is conversant with the "practice of politics," estimates the revenue of all persons who are employed in the manufacturing towns at three to four times the amount contemplated by Congress.

Collectors of taxes will have the less to collect as they have an ungracious office to fill, and that in proper discharge will require all the exercise of tact, discretion, and forbearance. They are especially warned against bullying and oppression. The tax collector is unquestionably to every citizen a more unwelcome guest than the Union, from the reason that our people are less accustomed to be taxed than to anything else. Collectors are required to discharge their duty as leniently as is consistent with the interest of Government, and in every case as a whole they will be paid by a per centage, to refer the matter to the legal authorities. Distraints such as accompany the collection of taxes in England will not be known in this country. The supreme act of the tax collector will be a simple entry at every cost, that no loyal man could for a moment suppose it possible to find a more vigorous administration of law.

It has stood on one leg long enough. Let it now put two feet to the ground and run as to victory.

WAR THAT IS WAR.

A SECRET letter to the Charleston Courier, describing the capture of the Confederate iron steamer of the rebel army toward Washington, says:

"We live at present on the scantiest fare in the war of corn, fried green apples, or a bit of ham broiled on a stick; but quite as frequently do without any thing morning and night. We lie down on the ground without any other covering than a blanket, and consider ourselves fortunate if we do not freeze still before morning. The nights are both damp and cold."

Again the letter says: "Among the Yankees captured by Jackson were two men who, as soon as they found that they commenced to be starved, their old comrades in an artillery company. An inquiry being instituted, they confessed that, eight months ago, they were soldiers in our army, but that, being tired of service, they had deserted, and joined the ranks of the enemy. Without further ado the General ordered them to be hung to a tree, which was done in the presence of a large portion of his army."

The same writer, describing a spy who had done gallant service in the cause of his country, but was at last discovered, continues: "The execution took place this afternoon, under the direction of General Jackson, in the presence of his brigade and a large number of soldiers. The prisoner was mounted on a horse, his hands tied behind him, and he was driven beneath a tree. The negro, which was a little larger than an ordinary bed-cord, then being adjusted, he was ordered to stand upon the horse. As he did so a soldier gave a sharp cut to the animal, and in a second more the spy was jerking convulsively from the limb above him. He met his fate with great stoicism, and appeared perfectly satisfied with what he had accomplished. Up to the last denied all participation in the act of cheering Longstreet's courier." Brave patriot! the country which counts the names of Stephen Hale will not forget you!

These are what we and endure these things are men who mean that the war they wage shall hurt the enemy; and so long as that enemy is unwilling to hurt them in every way it can, so long them war will triumph. Yet there are newspapers and demagogues at the North who, actually cry that this is not an abolition war, insist that these rebels shall be allowed the free use of their slaves in their work and support of their armies. Why do they insist upon it? Because they are afraid that if the people of the country demand that the rebellion shall be at once suppressed by weakening the rebels in every way, it will be expensive, and without compromising the honor of the nation. But if it is suppressed without that compromise, the influence of these newspapers and demagogues are ruined forever. They love their old party cries more than their country. They are willing that the political liberty of every laboring white man in the North should be endangered rather that his black man of the South should have a chance of personal freedom.

FEEDING THE ENEMY AND FIGHTING FOR THEM.

If when a country is at war its producing classes can stay absolutely at home and raise the necessary supplies for the army, that army will always be strong and active. If they are obliged to the war is really in earnest and means to conquer at every hazard, what will it do? Of course it will cut off those supplies if it can. If it can destroy a supply train, or capture a supply ship, will it hesitate to do it? In fact, if it does hesitate, will it not show that it is either utterly incapable, or that it does not wish to hurt?

But if it wishes to cut off the supply trains and ships, if it will destroy the stores of an enemy which it can not use itself, why should it not stop the production of supplies? And if it can not stop it altogether, why not do what it can? Does a General shelter the enemy one moment longer than because he is not sure that he can destroy all that the enemy have? Does he hesitate to shoot or capture one soldier of the enemy because he may not be able to kill or capture the whole army?

Now the slaves are the producing class among the rebels. The rebels openly and defiantly boast that they are sure of bringing as many men upon any point as they please, because they and we men can look after the slaves who raise the supplies, so that all their available men are put into the field; while they say that hundreds of thousands of our able-bodied must stay at home to raise the supplies. They see their producing class naturally like us and hate their masters. It therefore we say to them, "We will not touch what is essential to you," they will say, "Then you are not in earnest." If we say to them, "Help us, and we will stand by you!" they will say, "Then if the men in the house are really afraid of the forty millions of the enemy out, "We give it up!" If they are not afraid of them, we shall have enough to defend among the enemy, and the result will be the same. If they do not surrender they will be destroyed.

Suppose a few day laborers in a large family from Maine to Iowa were owned and sold by rich capitalists, and that the family in question ought to be. Suppose they were kept under by precisely the same regulations by which the slaves are kept in order. Suppose that the head of their David's army reached the Potomac he would of would not have turned a single man and said to them, "Here, you laboring men, help us and we will stand by you."

Of course he would, because he means victory. He means to conquer or be conquered. He means to strike and hurt the enemy in every way he can. He means that we shall see what he means. And when we mean that he shall see, as he sees the men at nominally, that we mean the unresisting suppression of this infamous rebellion against the rights of the people, he will scatter and fly like dust before the north wind.

THE WHAT IS IT?

AT a most threatening moment of the war the political campaign begins. Certainly when the country is in the most painful doubt about the issue party, but there are two. Certainly any patriotic party which takes the field first should leave all party cries and traditions and stand upon a platform of a single plank, the salvation of the country by every means we can control. That course would assimilate all other parties among loyal men. No faithful citizen would dare to withstand that battle-cry.

But any party which should begin the campaign by declaring that we have no right to use every lawful means to success in this terrible war would

THE LOUNGER.

FORWARD!

THE sooner the Government of the United States understands that the only safety the better for the safety of the country. Men are beginning to say what they have long thought, "Here we are giving men and money to the nation, willingly and sacrificing all that we have and are, and the Government meets with shilly-shally, dawdling, swaggering; hoping that something will turn up; devoutly praying to good Lord and good Devil in the long breath."

It is the language of anger and grief; but what is the situation of the country?

Simply this: the people of this country are resolved upon a Union and upon a strong Government. They cordially wish the success of the Government they have, and they are willing to do all that men can do to save it. But the measures which we, as they now begin to fear, that the loudest and most unthinking supporters of the present policy of the Administration are those who are the least notoriously disloyal, that moment they will consider very severe. For they know that the present policy is extolled by those men because they think its dilatoriness and slackness favor their own views.

In a word, the enemies of the country praise moderation and half-measures in the vain because they think that such a course will tire out the North, and make it willing to accept any terms of peace with the rebels.

If the Government would save the cause, it must therefore make it plain that it is doing all that can be done to secure victory; that it is appointing officers who have been tried and are found willing; that it is removing those who are found very slow; that it is insisting upon rapid movements and hard fighting; that it is cutting away every root and branch of the rebellion which it can find; that, in fine, it is so active, so thorough, so earnest, so confident of success that the rebels will see the conspiracy at every cost, that no loyal man could for a moment suppose it possible to find a more vigorous administration of law.

It has stood on one leg long enough. Let it now put two feet to the ground and run as to victory.

WAR THAT IS WAR.

A SECRET letter to the Charleston Courier, describing the capture of the Confederate iron steamer of the rebel army toward Washington, says:

"We live at present on the scantiest fare in the war of corn, fried green apples, or a bit of ham broiled on a stick; but quite as frequently do without any thing morning and night. The same writer, describing a spy who had done gallant service in the cause of his country, but was at last discovered, continues: "The execution took betray the condition of its fidelity. The rebellion already flaunts its flag at the capital; its solid and desperate hordes swarm across the Potomac; there is no man so blind as not to see that every nerve must be strained and every effort tried to secure the victory of the Government; and here would be a party which says, coldly, "Yes, we'll help probably, provided that you don't use rifled cannon or grape shot."

Whose party would that be? The party of those whose homes are wasted, whose hearts bleed and break under the loss of their brave heroes? Would it be the party of those whose kindred lie in the unhallowed and treason-tainted soil of Virginia? of those who have freely given of all their treasures, who have seen their work stopped, their prospects blighted, and the prosperity of their nation checked, for no other reason than that some political leaders thought their power to be in danger? Would it be the party of the true-hearted and generous who, rather than see the glory of their country dimmed by a compromise of hopeless injustice, or by a disintegration breeding endless wars hereafter, would see the loyal citizens of the land struck down at their own doors?—the party of all who love their country more than a party, who hate rebellion more than they love party tradition?

No. A party which at this moment makes terms in its loyalty is one whose aims are perfectly evident. It wishes to show both the rebel and the loyal part of the country that loyal men are divided. Its flag is a white flag. Its cry, if it dared to utter it, is "Peace any how." It stands and beckons to Jeff Davis to push on. It says to loyal men at home, "'Tis no use." It believes in defeat. It wishes to dishearten. It says "Union," and means what he meant who said "My brother, how is it with thee?" It accepts disgrace, and calls it an understanding. It grovels in dishonor, and calls it fraternity. It slays the country, and with it all future hope of free institutions and of popular civil Liberty, and calls it peace. It surrenders the essential principle of the Government and submits to anarchy, then calls it compromise.

It is the party of the rebellion working in our own camp. Let us hope that there is none such. But should it appear, let every faithful man help to crush it.

NOT AN ABOLITION WAR.

"BUT this is not a war for the abolition of slavery, is it?"

No: and the assertion that any considerable party urges it for that purpose is false, and is made by demagogues to prevent a vigorous policy by alarming old party prejudices. The amusing absurdity that any loyal man is making upon the President "outrageous demands to violate his oath and trample on the Constitution" is simply political gag of the most melodramatic kind. The intention of repeating it from day to day is to help the success of the rebellion by dividing the North.

The object of this war is the restoration of the Union. It is not waged to hurt a single hair upon the head of any man, loyal or disloyal: nor to seize his property: nor to use his supplies: nor to occupy his land: nor to destroy his buildings. It is not waged to do any body or thing the least injury in the world: nor to interfere with any privilege; nor to touch any right. Its object is simply and only to maintain the Government, without which no man has the smallest guarantee for any right whatever.

But if in maintaining it, a hundred thousand men are shot upon the field, if property of every kind is seized and appropriated, if acres and districts are utterly desolated, if cities are laid in ashes, and slaves are liberated that they may not strengthen the enemy, all will be done, and done constitutionally, and done rightly, for all this is infinitely better than that the Government should be overthrown.

Yet the Constitution guarantees to every man security of life and property by the most solemn pledges. They can be taken from him only by due course of law—except when he is resisting the law. But to enforce his obedience to the law every thing which strengthens his resistance may be taken from him, and at last even his life itself. No man has any right more sacred than that to his life. The Constitution authorizes the Government, in the name of all the people, to kill any man who resists the laws after he has been properly summoned to yield.

In precisely the same way, when a formidable combination resists the laws, and not only resists, but makes war upon the country, it is to be suppressed by every means known to warfare. And those means are employed, not for the purpose of hurting the men or of meddling with their local institutions, but to maintain the law. When citizens arm themselves against the Government, which represents the sovereignty of the people, they put all their lives, all their institutions—every thing which they have and are, and which may aid their resistance—in mortal peril. They do it, and not the Government; just as a man who forcibly stops you by night upon the road exposes his life. If you kill him, it is he who has done it.

Neither the liberation of the slaves, nor the brave soldiers who fight, nor the stout sailors, nor the seizure of rebel property, nor the occupation of rebel land, nor the destruction of rebel houses and cities, nor all the means of warfare combined, may suffice to suppress the rebellion. No man is so foolish as to suppose that any single means will answer; no man is sure that all means together will succeed. But every man who wishes his country well, who believes that the hope of equal human rights falls with our fall, who feels that our defeat is the victory of Despotism and an Aristocracy, earnestly prays that, if that defeat must come, it may not be embittered by the thought that we did not do to save ourselves all that we might have done.

The only question for a man who looks solely at the salvation of the Government is, Does slavery help the rebellion? If not, he will not urge emancipation. If it does, he will insist that to help save the Union the slaves shall be freed. Then, if some foolish fellow says, "You can't do it," we can tell him that we will try.

A BASE INSINUATION.

WHEN any general is exhorted to overthrow the Government by the bayonet as General M'Clellan has been, he is asked to do exactly what Lee, and Jackson, and Bragg are doing. Can the person, the paper, or the party that asks him, really be loyal to that Government?

The army, it must be remembered, is made up of the brothers, sons, and friends of all of us. They are citizens of the United States. They are in arms to defend its Government. They know why they are there. To ask a general to lead them against the Government is to invite them to be traitors. The general who should try it would probably find in a very summary way that they were not so.

Nor is there any general in the field who commands that idolatrous admiration which is essential to such an enterprise. The corps of the different commanders are generally warmly attached to them. But there is no single general who unites them over all others. This we all know, because every man has hundreds of friends in the army, and he knows that being citizens they differ and discuss exactly as we do at home. If, therefore, any general should be seduced into the fatal movement, he would find that he had an army to fight him as well as one to follow him. Meanwhile the enemy would conquer, but that is precisely what those who suggest the plan desire.

There is another point. What opinion can those hold of a Union general who propose to him to become a traitor? What would the American people have thought of a man in the Revolution who should have urged Washington to turn his arms to coerce the Congress of the Confederation, dilatory and distracted as it was? If it had been an editor who dared to suggest it they would have kicked him out of his office, and Washington, if he did not shoot the fellow upon the spot, would have had him whipped out of camp.

The same voices that call upon M'Clellan to take this rash step are those which sneered at Frémont's daring to attempt it when he was superseded. Such infamy was in their minds only, not in his. None of our armies has ever been attached to its general as that of the West was to Frémont. But his serene obedience to the constituted authorities of the Government was just what it ought to have been; and with a word he repressed even the slightest manifestation of displeasure upon the part of his men.

Such men, who love their leaders because they believe in them, such leaders who trust and try the bravery of their men, are the soul and body of invincible armies.

There have been hard things said of General M'Clellan, but there has been no insinuation so base as this, and this not from his enemies but his professed friends.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"WE should always provide against a rainy day," as the member of the —— Club said when he stole the umbrella out of the hall.

"Prevention is better than cure," as the pig said when it ran away with all its might to escape the killing attentions of the pork-butcher.

"Arrah, Pat, and why did I marry ye—jist tell me that? for it's myself that's had to maintain ye ever since the blessed day that Father O'Flannagan sent me home to yer house." "Swate jewel!" replied Pat, not relishing the charge, "and it's myself that hopes I may live to see the day when ye're a widow, waping over the cold sod that covers me; then, by St. Patrick, I'll see how you get along without me, honey!"

Colonel Smith's pantry was somewhat troubled with mice; so the Colonel determined to try a trap. An inquisitive neighbor, whose curiosity was aroused by seeing a light burning all one night in the Colonel's house, stationed himself at his window the following night, and saw the Colonel, in his dressing-gown, bait his trap and go off, after having placed a lighted candle close to it. The next day, having met the Colonel, he asked him why he placed the candle by his trap? "So that the mice may see to go in," was the reply.

"I'll haul you over the coals," as the policeman said to the thief when he caught him in the area.

There is a man in Pentonville so knowing that the men who don't know their own minds come to him for information on the subject.

Cæsar, being asked by Brutus how many eggs he ate for breakfast, answered, "Et tu, Brute."

Laziness will cover your garden with weeds. Hard drinking, if you keep it up, will cover your wife with weeds.

"I suspect that petroleum is explosive, after all; at least, I've known a good many capitalists burst up by it!"

Our stipendiary friend, upon being asked by a lady, the other day, whether he liked babies, replied that he did not think them very interesting until they were able to stand a loan.

Tom Hood said that, when a young man, he couldn't wink at a girl but that she took it for an offer of marriage. The consequence was, that a good many of the girls got Hood-winked.

There are people who mistake impertinence for wit, and often get more than a Roland for their Oliver. One of these persons, seeing a man of learning enjoying the pleasures of the table, said, "So, Sir, I see philosophers can indulge in the greatest delicacies." "Why not," replied the other, "do you think Providence intended all good things for the ignorant?"

Milton was once asked by a friend whether he would instruct his daughters in the different languages; to which he replied, "No, Sir; one tongue is sufficient for a woman."

"Is it not astonishing," said a wealthy individual, "that a large fortune was left me by a person who had only seen me once?" "It would have been still more astonishing," said a wag, "if he had left it you after seeing you twice."

Politeness is not always a sign of wisdom; but the want of it is always a strong symptom of folly.

It would be very imprudent of any railway company to allow a washer-woman to dry clothes upon their line.

THE REBEL INVASION OF MARYLAND.

FOR details of the rebel invasion of Maryland we refer the reader to page 618. Here we may briefly say that the rebels under Jackson, Lee, Longstreet, and other Generals, crossed the lower fords of the Upper Potomac near Leesburg on the 4th, 5th, and 6th September, and moved directly on Frederick, Maryland, which place they occupied in force. On 7th, General M'Clellan at the head of a large army, with Burnside, Hooker, Sigel, and other Generals, marched to meet them. On 8th he reached Rockville; on 10th and 11th he wedged his army between the rebels and the fords of the Potomac by which they had crossed, thus cutting them off from retreat in that direction; on the 10th or 11th the invaders, perceiving his drift, moved on Hagerstown and occupied the place; on 12th General M'Clellan's advance, under General Pleasanton, entered Frederick and drove a portion of the rebel cavalry, who were protecting the rear, from that city, after a brief skirmish in the streets. Our troops were wildly welcomed; but when General Burnside passed through on 13th, and when General M'Clellan arrived the same day, the enthusiasm of the citizens knew no bounds. They turned out en masse to greet them, and it was with difficulty that M'Clellan could reach his head-quarters through the surging crowd of excited people. General Burnside at once pushed on after the rebels with his whole force, occupying every road, and even crossing the fields to come up with them. The three stone bridges across the Monocacy were found uninjured, though the fine iron railroad bridge was destroyed. The rebels devoured almost all the provisions in Frederick before they left, and even robbed the hospital of all the medical stores, although they left four hundred and fifty of their own sick behind them. General Franklin has captured a rebel train of a hundred ammunition and subsistence wagons, and sent back one hundred and fifty prisoners to Frederick. On 14th, early in the morning, our advance, under Hooker and Reno, attacked the enemy, who was on the heights near Hagerstown. The battle lasted all day, and ended in a Union victory, the rebels being driven from the heights with great loss. Simultaneously General Franklin, on our left—i. e. near the river—was engaged, and was equally successful. On the morning of the 15th the enemy commenced a retreat toward the Potomac, in the direction of Williamsport, and General M'Clellan pushed on toward Hagerstown and Sharpsburg. But General White having surrendered Harper's Ferry, Jackson's army recrossed the Potomac into Maryland, effected a junction with Lee, and prepared for a general battle. Rumor states that it is probably going on now (17th).

THE HEIGHTS OF HAGERSTOWN STORMED.

HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, THREE MILES BEYOND MIDDLETOWN,
Sept. 14—9.40 P.M.

H. W. Halleck, General-in-Chief:

After a very severe engagement the corps of General Hooker and General Reno have carried the heights commanding the Hagerstown road by storm.

The troops behaved magnificently. They never fought better.

General Franklin has been hotly engaged on the extreme left. I do not yet know the result, except that the firing indicated progress on his part.

The action continued until after dark, and terminated leaving us in possession of the entire crest.

It has been a glorious victory.

I can not yet tell whether the enemy will retreat during the night or appear in increased force during the morning.

I regret to add that the gallant and able General Reno was killed.

GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN,
Major-General Commanding.

GENERAL FRANKLIN'S SUCCESS.

HEAD-QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
Sept. 15—3 A.M.

H. W. Halleck, General-in-Chief:

I am happy to inform you that General Franklin's success on the left was as complete as that on the centre and right, and resulted in his getting possession of the Gap, after a severe engagement in all parts of the line.

The troops, old and new, behaved with the utmost steadiness and gallantry, carrying, with but little assistance from our own artillery, very strong positions, defended by artillery and infantry.

I do not think our loss very severe.

The corps of Generals D. H. Hill and Longstreet were engaged with our right.

We have taken a considerable number of prisoners.

The enemy disappeared during the night. Our troops are now advancing in pursuit. I do not know where he will next be found.

GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN,
Major-General Commanding.

LEE CONFESSES HIMSELF SHOCKINGLY WHIPPED.

HEAD-QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
Sept. 15—8 A.M.

H. W. Halleck, General-in-Chief:

I have just learned from General Hooker, in the advance, who states that the information is perfectly reliable, that the enemy is making for the river in a perfect panic, and General Lee stated last night, publicly, that he must admit they had been shockingly whipped.

I am hurrying every thing forward to endeavor to press their retreat to the utmost.

GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN,
Major-General Commanding.

STATES HIS LOSS TO BE 17,000 MEN.

HEAD-QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
BOLIVAR, Sept. 15—10 A.M.

H. W. Halleck, General-in-Chief:

Information this moment received completely confirms the rout and demoralization of the rebel army.

General Lee is reported wounded, and Garland killed.

General Hooker alone has over a thousand more prisoners, seven hundred having been sent to Frederick.

It is stated that Lee gives his loss as seventeen thousand.

We are following as rapidly as the men can move.

GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN,
Major-General Commanding.

SURRENDER OF HARPER'S FERRY.

Harper's Ferry was gallantly held by Colonel Miles and General White against an overwhelming force for two days or more, but was compelled to surrender at ten o'clock on Monday morning. The rebels are said to have abandoned it on 16th, in such haste that they had not time to parole more than half the prisoners, the rest being discharged, unconditionally, of course. Colonel Miles was wounded in the action by a shell in the leg, and is said to have since died of his wound.

THE WAR IN KENTUCKY.

The news from Kentucky is somewhat confused; the reader will find some scraps of intelligence on page 615. On 9th the rebel army under Kirby Smith advanced to within 5 miles of Covington, and the large army collected for the defense of Cincinnati felt confident of a battle. Some picket skirmishing actually took place. But on 11th the rebels began to retreat, and our latest dates report that they have fallen back as far as Florence, whether from natural anxiety about their lines of retreat, which are said to be menaced by Buell, or from a desire to draw our troops out of their intrenchments, is matter of conjecture. The Governor of Ohio has called his militia home, as a large force of volunteers, comprising many veteran regiments, have already arrived at Cincinnati. Respecting the movements of Buell and Bragg every thing is enveloped in mystery. Buell seems to have moved from Alabama across Tennessee to Nashville, where part of his force now is, another column having been dispatched to assail Kirby Smith's rear. Whether Bragg is still at Chattanooga, or elsewhere in Tennessee, we have no means of knowing.

FRIGHT IN PENNSYLVANIA.

The State Treasurer of Pennsylvania has arrived here, bringing important archives and much treasure with him for safe keeping, and many Philadelphia capitalists have sent quantities of specie here also for the same purpose.

SAID THE SPIDER TO THE FLY.

General Lee has issued the following proclamation:

LEE'S HEAD-QUARTERS, ARMY OF NORTHERN VIRGINIA,
NEAR FREDERICKTOWN, Sept. 8, 1862.

TO THE PEOPLE OF MARYLAND:

It is right that you should know the purpose that has brought the army under my command within the limits of your State so far as that purpose concerns yourselves.

The people of the Confederate States have long watched with the deepest sympathy the wrongs and outrages that have been inflicted upon the citizens of a Commonwealth allied to the States of the South by the strongest social, political, and commercial ties, and reduced to the condition of a conquered province.

Under the pretense of supporting the Constitution, but in violation of its most valuable provisions, your citizens have been arrested and imprisoned upon no charge, and contrary to all the forms of law.

A faithful and manly protest against this outrage, made by a venerable and illustrious Marylander, to whom in better days no citizen appealed for right in vain, was treated with scorn and contempt.

The government of your chief city has been usurped by armed strangers; your Legislature has been dissolved by the unlawful arrest of its members; freedom of the press and of speech has been suppressed; words have been declared offenses by an arbitrary decree of the Federal executive, and citizens ordered to be tried by military commissions for what they may dare to speak.

Believing that the people of Maryland possess a spirit too lofty to submit to such a Government, the people of the South have long wished to aid you in throwing off this foreign yoke, to enable you again to enjoy the inalienable rights of freemen, and restore the independence and sovereignty of your State.

In obedience to this wish our army has come among you, and is prepared to assist you with the power of its arms in regaining the rights of which you have been so unjustly despoiled.

This, citizens of Maryland, is our mission so far as you are concerned. No restraint upon your free-will is intended—no intimidation will be allowed within the limits of this army at least. Marylanders shall once more enjoy their ancient freedom of thought and speech. We know no enemies among you, and will protect all of you in every opinion.

It is for you to decide your destiny, freely and without constraint. This army will respect your choice, whatever it may be; and, while the Southern people will rejoice to welcome you to your natural position among them, they will only welcome you when you come of your own free-will. R. E. LEE, General Commanding.

A SKIRMISH AT WILLIAMSBURG.

A rebel force of cavalry, with three pieces of artillery, under Colonel Shingles, made an attack on Williamsburg on 9th inst. about eight o'clock. After having captured our pickets they marched into the town, taking our troops by surprise. An engagement ensued, which lasted about thirty minutes, leaving us in possession. Our force consisted of the Fifth Pennsylvania cavalry, Colonel Campbell, who was taken prisoner, together with five captains, four lieutenants, and a few privates. The rebel commander, Colonel Shingles, with eight of his officers and men were killed.

A FIGHT AT WASHINGTON, NORTH CAROLINA.

The rebels, twelve hundred strong, made an attack on Washington, North Carolina, on the morning of the 6th inst., and were repulsed and pursued seven miles. Our force engaged numbered only four hundred, and the battle lasted two hours. The First Regiment of North Carolina Union Volunteers was engaged, and is said to have behaved with the greatest bravery. A large number of the rebels were killed and wounded; our loss was seven killed and forty-seven wounded. The gun-boat Louisiana rendered essential service in shelling the rebels out of a strong position. The gun-boat Picket was blown up by the accidental explosion of her magazine, and Captain Nichols and nineteen men were killed, and six wounded.

THE WAR IN WESTERN VIRGINIA.

A brisk succession of fights took place last week in Western Virginia, commencing on 9th. The Union forces under Colonel Siber, were attacked by the rebels, five thousand strong, between Fayette and Gauley, and fought till dark. Our men cut their way through gallantly to Gauley, with a loss of one hundred killed and wounded. Another rebel force, meantime, attacked Colonel Lightburn at Gauley Bridge, compelling him to retire down the Kanawha—fighting every inch of ground—and still farther to the Elk River, where he made a grand stand on Friday. At last accounts—13th, 6 P.M.—he was holding his ground, and had shelled the town of Charleston and destroyed all the salt-works in the vicinity. This news reaches us by telegraph from Gallipolis, Ohio.

THE PRIVATEER "FLORIDA."

The rebel steamer Oreto—now named the Florida—arrived at Havana from Nassau, N. P., by way of Cardenas. When at Green Key she mounted her guns. She was permitted to remain at Cardenas to the 31st ultimo, having a Spanish war vessel on each side of her. She has lost many men by yellow fever and desertion. Among the dead is the son of her commander, John N. Maffit. The Florida mounts eight very heavy guns, and carries the iron plates for covering her with armor in her hold. Captain Maffit was still ill. Her first officer is —— Stribling, formerly of the Sumter. On the 1st instant the Florida was ordered to sea from Havana, and steamed out in the midst of a severe storm.

PERSONAL.

Appleton Oaksmith, who has been confined in Suffolk (Massachusetts) jail since December last, and was convicted in June of fitting out a vessel for the slave-trade, made his escape from the jail on 11th inst., and it is supposed had been gone four hours before he was missed. A ladder having been found standing against the yard wall, there is no doubt he gained the rear of the jail by that means. His escape was not known until 10 o'clock. A reward of $300 is offered for his arrest and return. A motion for a new trial was pending, to be argued in October.

General Jim Lane's recruiting operations in Kansas have been most successful. He has raised five white regiments, and organized 1200 colored loyalists.

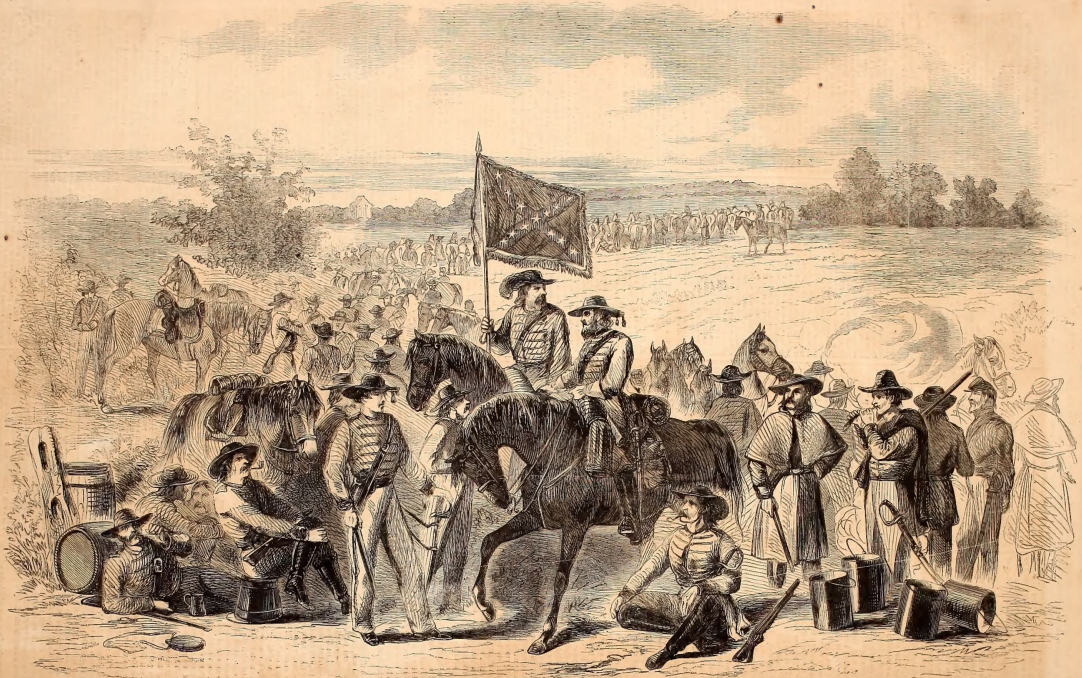
Major-General Cassius M. Clay has been ordered to report in person to Major-General Butler, at New Orleans, for duty in the Department of the Gulf.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

MORE MEDIATION TALK.

THE Peace Society of London has issued an address to the people of the United States advising a settlement of the war by means of foreign mediation.



ANOTHER PRIVATEER FITTED OUT IN ENGLAND.

The rebel steamer Alabama, alias the Eurica, alias "No. 290," has been spoken by the British West India mail steamer, steering west, and fully armed and manned, under command of Captain Semmes, late of the Sumter.

ITALY.

HOW GARIBALDI WAS TAKEN.

The European journals are occupied in publishing the details of the battle between Garibaldi's volunteers and the troops of Victor Emanuel. The Italian General had an interview with Garibaldi, and called on him to surrender. The Liberator refused, and the fight commenced. The contest was prolonged, sanguinary, and fought with courage on both sides. Garibaldi and his son Menotte, with three hundred men of both armies, were wounded. The killed were not numerous in proportion. It is said that Garibaldi will be tried for treason, convicted, sentenced, and then pardoned, on giving his parole to leave Europe for an indefinite period.

FORT MITCHELL, NEAR COVINGTON, KENTUCKY, COVERING THE LEXINGTON TURNPIKE.—[SKETCHED BY MR. H. MOSLER.]

OUR ARMY AT CINCINNATI.

ON page 609 we give a view of the city of CINCINNATI, the Queen City of the West, which has been menaced by the rebels under Kirby Smith; on the same page a picture of OUR TROOPS CROSSING TO COVINGTON, KENTUCKY, over a pontoon bridge which was made by the citizens of Cincinnati in a single day; and on this page a view of FORT MITCHELL, the work erected to protect the pike from Covington to Lexington; and a picture of the PONTOON BRIDGE thrown over Kentucky Creek.

At the time we write Kirby Smith and the rebels he leads are reported to have fallen back to a place called Florence; whether with a view to "skedaddle" back to rebeldom or to entice our troops out of their fortifications remains to be seen. A correspondent, writing from Cincinnati, says:

The country volunteers, with their squirrel rifles, are again pouring in for the defence of Cincinnati from all parts of the country, and in a day or two there will be thousands of them here to help us in case we need them. We are ready to-day in the city well organized and drilled, for they will answer as well for city guards as the more experienced men, who are now all wanted in the front. From my window I can look upon the hills on which the enemy's pickets now are, and which are about the centre of our position. To the right and left the hills are higher, or else I might view the entire battle-ground as I write an account of it. A good locality I possess to view and describe a fight, but an uncomfortable one, you will say, if the enemy possess guns of very long range, which I hear they have.

Covington to-day presented a most dilapidated appearance; but few of the inhabitants were visible, stores all closed, and the streets were occupied entirely by troops moving or vehicles attached to the army. The buildings looked as if erected in the year One, and, as my judgment, the country would suffer but little loss were Covington wiped out. Newport, on the east side of the Licking River, is but little, if any, better; and both only serve to show what would be, were they away, a most beautiful landscape.

Another letter-writer to the Herald thus speaks of the volunteers at Cincinnati:

Major-Generals Wright and Lew Wallace rode over and reviewed the troops in Covington yesterday afternoon. The display was very fine, and probably satisfactory. The boys were in splendid spirits, and are chock-full of fight and confidence. Much enthusiasm greeted the Generals every where, and the Irishmen were almost wild over Lew Wallace, their confidence in his ability and courage being unlimited, and may stand in good stead in the approaching contest. Let all men say what they will about green regiments and raw recruits, let them cry them down as much as they choose, as many newspapers and newspaper correspondents are now doing; let them iterate and reiterate that the vast body of volunteers now congregated in and around Covington are only fit subjects to be gobbled up by Kirby Smith's veterans; all these—but they will be disappointed. When a fight evening's regard for the well-clothed rebels—no such fears as these—no feelings enter my mind. Green men and raw recruits will fight. I have seen them do it; and a body of troops of finer material, both physical and mental, than the citizen soldiery massed at Covington, never was seen, or known, or heard of. If Kirby Smith takes them for a breakfast-spell it will be the hardest breakfast-spell on record, and few of his men will want any dinner. If for an evening's repast, many of them will find the meal any thing but of easy digestion. I have no thought that our brave fellows will skedaddle; but on the contrary, from what I have seen, that they will stand up nobly to their work and beat back the rebel hordes with a determination that shall make a repetition of the attempt on our soil very rare, and will do all that is expected of them, and more too, if their officers keep cool and act with judgment.

Speaking of Fort Mitchell, a correspondent writes: "Fort Mitchell is on an eminence commanding the Lexington pike. In front of it there is an extended plain, broken only by a few trees and one or two very nice-looking houses. At a distance of not more than a mile from the fort is a line of dense woods, and in these woods are the enemy's pickets, our own being not more than a quarter of a mile this side of them. Our fellows, without the aid of a glass even, could be seen in different positions, some in a fence corner, others behind a tree, and a few crawling stealthily along on all fours, watching a chance. The country around Fort Mitchell is very beautiful."

NOT IN VAIN.

Lo! when flames of war outleaping,
Set our native land ablaze,
Men from every town came sweeping,
Choking up the great highways.
Foothills like the sands of ocean
Sounded from the martial throng;
Stubborn as the sea in motion
Flowed the steady tide along.

Thick and fast the horrid slaughter
Gleaned the ranks of men,
Flowed the horses' blood like water
Surging to the charge again.
Sabres-rush and musket-rattle
Raged their serried ranks among,
Till loud above the din of battle
The welcome cry of Victory! rung

Tell me, was it useless dying?
Ye who stay behind and sneer.
Think ye Freedom's hope is lying
Stark among the dead men dear?
No! the sacred blood which flows
Like a river from their veins,
Redder than the flame which throws
Sadness on Virginia's plains,

Shall that gloomy land restore
Unto Freedom's cause again.
Back in its seaboard thrust the sword—
No patriot's blood is shed in vain.
From the fields which blackened are
By the enemy's bivouac fire,
Rescued from the toils of war
Shall arise the chapel's spire.

Justice shall assert her cause
Unabashed by sword or threat,
And freemen institute their laws
By voice, and not by bayonet.
Storms may burst and tempests lower
O'er the loved land to-day,
Liberty's sun, with mighty power,
Soon shall chase that gloom away.

Yes! prophetic voices crying
In the wilderness to-day,
Tell me that our dead and dying
Have not thrown their lives away.

A REBEL GUERRILLA RAID IN A

A GUERRILLA RAID IN THE WEST.

We publish on pages 616 and 617 a large illustration of a GUERRILLA RAID IN THE WEST, in order that our readers may understand the sort of war which the rebels are waging. John Morgan, the highwayman of Kentucky, boasts of his success in this style of warfare. By way of confirming the truthfulness of our artist's picture, we subjoin a few extracts of recent date from recent papers:

Clouds and darkness are gathering and thickening around the counties of Southern Kentucky. Terror and alarm prevail among the people. Society is torn to pieces, while order and civil law are dead lockers. Guerrillas scout the country, and men are shot down in the streets of the towns. Homes are sacked, and private citizens are left on foot in the road, horses are pillaged, and families driven to the woods. Such is Glasgow, Hickory and Captain Mercer came to Glasgow and fought a little battle. The Rebels were in much superior numbers for the greater part of the time, but, by the superior bravery and valor of his little, which was threatened, and of which he gained control before the arrival of a reinforcement, he succeeded in driving the rebels from the town.

Hardly a house escaped without the marks of the conflict. Many of the dead and their horses were left in the streets, horribly mutilated. Some were thrown into wells. Others were dragged into the woods. Some were left where they fell, lay in the heart of the Cumberland Valley. On either side run the North and South Mountains, about twenty-five miles apart, and the village where the party of the place courses a charming rivulet, the Antietan. Washington County, of which Hagerstown is the chief mart, was organized in 1776. Elizabethtown was the name given to the original settlement; but this was changed to Hagerstown in honor of Jonathan Hager, who, in 1762, out of complement to Thomas Hagerstown, a land speculator. The latter is a surprisingly fine hotel for so small a place, being large, handsome, and well kept. An unwonted property was laid out for sale in Hagerstown by reason of its being selected as the head-quarters of the Army of the Potomac, and Pennsylvania," over which Major-General Patterson presided.

He who will be better understood by reference to the following topographical sketch:

Sugar-loaf Mountain—which our own signal corps had used for the purpose of observation—is a signal station and lookout for the Rebels. Its base is washed by the Monocacy. Banks was upon the Upper Potomac—he now held by the rebels—and the Monocacy is a tributary of that. It has again been seized by General M'Clellan since this was written.—ED. H. W. Frederick is the county town. In writing the mountain can be distinctly seen across the valley which separates it from the city. At such a glance we can plainly distinguish the rebels upon its summit, and the very implements employed by them in their work. It is here our countryman, Mr. Lincoln, was born.

The mountain is only twelve miles distant in an air line, but it must be remembered that Frederick is situated somewhat nearer to the rebels than we were.

Frederick is the county town of Frederick—and Monocacy. From Frederick to Baltimore is a macadamized road, turnpike and Rebels, remaining nearly parallel with the Monocacy, and adapted to the passage of the same general direction, run nearer the river than this.

From the river to the mountain—Sugar-loaf—there are several others which lead to Frederick, and one of these reaches the Upper Potomac at Point of Rocks. From Darnestown is the same as it is from Rockville, viz. 20 miles, but the best road is that which leads through Seneca at Poolesville, nine miles distant. Poolesville is only seven miles from Frederick.

The rebel army evacuated Frederick on 12th, passing through Boonsborough and Hagerstown toward Williamsport.

Eye-witnesses state that the rebel column was four miles thick in the morning, constantly receiving a given point. The force of the rebels, estimated by an officer of the quartermaster's department, was thirty thousand infantry, six thousand cavalry, and ninety pieces of artillery.

THE FIRST VIRGINIA CAVALRY.

We publish on page 612 a fine picture of the FIRST VIRGINIA CAVALRY, from a sketch by one of the members of the rebel service. Mr. WAUD writes:

"Being without within the enemy's lines, an opportunity occurred to make a sketch of one of the two crack regiments of the Confederate service, which, composed of considerable social standing, that is, most of them—F. F. V.'s, so to speak, and not irreverently; for they were not only as a body handsome, athletic men, but generally polite and agreeable in manner. With the exception of the officers, there was little else but homespun among them, light drab-gray or butternut color, the drab predominating; although there were so many varieties of dress, half-citizen, half-military, that they could scarcely be said to have a uniform. Light jackets and trousers, the one with black facings, and black-cord hats, appeared to be in those cases where the wearer could obtain it; the court costume of the regiment. Their horses were good; in many cases, they told me, they provided their own. Their arms were the United States cavalry saber, Sharp's carbine, and pistols. Some few of them had old swords of the Revolution, curved, and in broad, heavy scabbards.

"Their cuirasses, they said, were mostly captured from our own cavalry, for whom they expressed utter contempt—no feeling unfortunately shared by our own army. Finally, they bragged of having taken own banners, in many cases, of having drawn no pay from the Government, not needing The paltry remuneration of a private's pay. The regiment on the picture is the battle-flag. White border, red ground, blue cross, and white stars."

LAURELS.

"REMEMBER, Janet, where you change cars."

"And waste just as soon as possible, Jenny."

"And oh, Jenny! my photograph. I'm to have the profile on the cover. Don't forget."

And I, too, Miss Jenny," said a deeper voice in a lower tone.

Then the last bell rang, the girls repeated all in a breath their parting words, young Carew swung his small toy upon his shoulder in order to whisper a pretty phrase, Uncle John reiterated, "Remember, Janet, where you change cars;" and the next moment they stood upon the platform and Janet was speeding on her way.

She had impressed herself upon securing an entire seat; but at the frequent way stations one after another was benefited, until the car was full, and Janet, with that fine courtesy of hers, gave up her place by the window to an old lady. It was then that she began to share the privacy of the car.

"What, again? how I hate accommodation trains!" growled to his neighbor, waking up out of a doze, then subsiding sleepily with, "Well, there is no room for any more in this car."

Just then the train slowed and "one more" entered. A sedate in worn and shabby uniform—worn and shabby, but "order" prevailed, and evidently a very common sort of a person. He limped in with drooping head, his arm in a sling, his face half-covered with a neglected beard, showing signs of weakness and suffering. Janet looked up and around her. Surely some of these strong men alone in a would rise up and offer this poor fellow a seat. But they had all settled themselves for their journey, and evidently waited in vain for them to rise.

So the train fled on, and the soldier leaned against the door, and, under the glare of the light beside him, Janet, from her place two or three seats away, saw what a wreck he was for him. Surprise had given way to indignation on her face, and then there came an expression of some sudden resolve stirred into life within her.

She hated to draw attention upon herself, and shrank with extreme dread from making a stare of any kind; but the minutes went by, and the weary face grew wearier, and all about her there was a heavy indifference to the turning of souls inside, evincing the preoccupation of those that were awake, and the utter prostration of many of those "strong men" discovering the necessities of the situation.

A moment more and Janet had made up her mind. There was a deeper flush than usual on her cheek as she quickly quietly and went forward—only a few steps—for as I have said her seat was near the door.

The head of the soldier was drooping into his breast as she came up, and she touched his arm gently to rouse him.

A flush almost as deep as her own rose to the sallow, washed cheek as she spoke to him, and for a moment he looked bewildered as he lifted himself up and with many thanks refused her proposal.

"But I am able to stand than you are," she urged; "and, indeed, it will please me much more if you will take my place than if you refused me."

He was refusing again when a sudden pallor overspread his face, and he sank forward slightly, and the next instant Janet had put her hand in his arm, and before he could oppose the proceeding he was in her seat and Janet was standing to keep it in a way that would have convinced any person, however dull, that she would be exceedingly annoyed if he didn't.

Then the young lady returned to the door, and leaning in a half-tired manner against the casing, opened her book. But she was not unaware of the observation she had excited. The slight commotion had roused first one, then another; and it needed all Janet Wilmont's self-possession to look in the meekly puzzled face upon the page and her color under control.

First one, and then another; and there was a general slight stir as every body seemed to wake up. By-and-by a young man near her stepped out of his seat and approached her. A handsome person, with rather an elegant air.

"There has been a mistake," he said, with a bend of his head, a grave face, and a slightly imperative tone.

Janet looked up questioningly.

"Probably no one observed that the young man to whom you relinquished your seat was unable to stand," he continued, explained the imperative tones, and quite as an imperative gesture, though perfectly well-bred, waved her to the place he had vacated.

Janet Wilmont, though shy of making a speciale, and always shrinking from putting herself forward, had plenty of spirit and a great deal of pride, and it rose up now at what she considered altogether too lordly a manner, and a decided interference where interference was unwarrantable.

She glanced another way at the drooping figure, with its disabled arm, spoke as plainly as that head said: "I hardly needed that last reviving step to show you his condition;" but she said aloud, in rather a dry tone, and a slightly haughty accent,

"Thank you, I prefer standing. I am quite used to it," and turned immediately to her book—a proceeding that completely put an end to any more words, and sent the young gentleman back to his seat dismantled.

Glancing at the cause of all this, Janet became conscious of a pair of hollow, brilliant eyes fixed upon her with a curious inert expression; but the moment he felt himself observed they went down again, and the head of two cap, and the hand dropped lower against the shabby uniform.

At the same time a sensation she remembered that she was to change cars. She looked at her watch—not more than half an hour longer to remain in her present seat—ever-spreading fatigue—and she thought,

"I do hope my soldier-boy won't in the mean time have another foolish fit of politeness, and annoy me by staggering up and insisting upon my resuming my seat. I am sure there was a person so pestered in a simple act of courtesy as I have been." And a laugh bubbled to her very lips and died out in a smile of amusement. But the "soldier-boy," to her infinite relief, kept his place, leaning a tired head against the cushioned back in a manner that evinced how much he needed rest and ease.

At the "next station" all was bustle and confusion, and, in the midst of it, Janet saw her "soldier-boy" following her as she left the car.

It was dense darkness outside, and a burrying crowd and a field of baggage did not tend to put the young lady at her ease.

Now and then the flashing of a lantern would give her a glimpse of a face, and a voice would rush by with some unintelligible words, and baggage-men and the bundling of trunks helped to confuse still more. A feeling of despair was giving place to her uncertainty when some one touched her arm.

"This way, if you please. You are to take the down train, are you not?"

"Yes, thank you."

She was conscious of a light touch upon her arm in guiding, and presently the voice spoke again—a deep-toned, well-modulated voice—that of a gentleman undoubtedly.

"You will be careful of that step."

Inside the car she turned to thank him. The lights fell on a pale, worn face, which, as she said it, raised upon her lips, a look of surprise on her face, and then a few words of question:

"Are you not the soldier?"

Again that sudden searching look she remembered from the brilliant eyes, the voice spoke again—a smile—just the flutter of an eyelid, and he said:

"Allow me to thank you for your great kindness. I was very ill and much out of sorts. Janet at first thought. I can do very well in walking a little distance, and the consideration of the fatigue cles of my leg in standing for any length of time I find more fatiguing than any thing else."

In the same voice that had warned her of the step. Her protector was, after all, the "soldier-boy."

As she glanced at the rough-looking fellow for the second time Janet found herself wondering how she could scarcely credit her senses.

The first symptom of refusal had spoken at their first meeting an hour or two ago were so faint and low that she had not detected the quality of voice. Now it was clear and full, and had the ring in it of the lungs, and placed himself in the one just behind her, and they had a pleasant chat. Janet asked questions that Janet was about to ask him concerning his wounds. And left to silence and her own thoughts, she fell to speculating on the social contrast of speech and person. She had just come to the conclusion that though his education in life was ever so humble, he certainly must have a refined nature to possess such a voice; and then recalling fragments of her thoughts, she fell slowly down a dream where Grant Carew was rallying her on her interest invested in all sorts of people," and she was keen to the "——pains and the purple,"

when a gust of wind roused her. Then a deep, imposing breath, which was half a groan, and better out of it. She started up.

The window below hers was flung open, and the figure of the soldier, leaning forward to inhale the fresh air, in the need of faintness. In a moment she had handed him a little complete filled with aromatic salts that she always carried about with her, pungent odor seemed to have a vivifying influence, and she begged him to keep it—"she had really no use for it."

Again the "little, self-possessed manner, those wonderful tones, so to handle the and again Janet fell to her speculations, and thought of the great men who had risen from obscurity and poverty to honor and renown. She was sure this rough-looking soldier had the soul of a gentleman. "Somebody ought to give him a chance," she said before she knew it, and then looked at herself, and fell to dreaming that some dream of Grant Carew's had come true. Then she fell into the town—her last stopping-place—and the gray light of the dawn showed to her sleepy vision the town and Uncle John in waiting for her at the station for her. "How-do-do, Jenny?" and Kit leaped in, giving room for Tom to bring the carriage nearer, and as if there were not a second to lose, was beginning to bustle her off with his usual Young America manner, when he turned and saluted the timid and pleasant to the soldier, "poor fellow!" Janet heard him say, "I'll see to the poor fellow answered with that same easy simplicity of manner, in that inconsistent way of his.

"Hallo, Jenny, who was that?" asked Kit, as they went out.

"Hush, Kit, he'll hear you!" and then she told him all she knew about it in a lower voice.

He laughed, but called her a trump for giving her seat to him, and on the way home, where a Christmas household of guests awaited them, what with the fun and frolic, Janet very himself, with embellishments, the saucy rascal!

Captain Rawlins, who was there, listened and laughed with the rest; and Janet, a little nettled, said more than she meant to about that "remarkably cultivated voice and the gentlemanly manner."

"A great, gaunt fellow, Rawlins," broke in Kit, mischievously, "rough and awkward-looking, like a pirate in a private's dress. But you know Jenny—you know her geese are always swans!"

And Jenny cried, "Kit, you are entirely out of the way. I never meant to make him out a polished gentleman. I only said he was simple and modest, and possessed a remarkably modulated voice for a man like him—and I say it again."

Something here suddenly struck Captain Rawlins. He looked up quickly, and asked:

"Did you notice the number on his cap—the number of his regiment, you know?"

"Yes, the Twenty-fifth."

"Hurrah, that's the man!" laughed and shouted Rawlins all in a breath.

"What do you mean, Captain Rawlins?"

Captain Rawlins started up from his seat by the fire, and began:

"Did he have remarkably keen, piercing eyes—black eyes, Miss Janet?"

"Yes."

"And a full flowing beard, and a downward motion to his head?"

"He certainly did."

"And was his left arm in a sling?"

"It was."

Captain Rawlins here laughed lowly, and said: "I am sorry, Miss Janet, to destroy your pleasant impressions, but this man I happen to know. He is a private in my regiment—I'm of the Twenty-fifth you know, and the most good-for-nothing fellow we had—almost a rascal. He had once attempted to be an actor all on account of 'that voice' and consummate vanity. His original calling was a cobbler's, I believe."

Janet joined the laugh, but didn't see the joke.

Presently Rawlins asked,

"He was alone, you say?"

"Yes, entirely."

"That's odd. I was up there at the hospital two weeks ago, and he was convalescent then, his arm in a sling, and ready to travel; but kept back for Wynne—Major Wynne, whose servant had died with the fever."

"Kept back for Wynne?" Kit questioned.

"Yes, Wynne was creeping back to life again, wasted to a shadow, wounded in the thigh and shoulder; ugly sabre cuts; and the Colonel told Gamp—that's the fellow's name—to wait and come on with him. Gamp was willing enough: he thought Wynne was worth all the rest of us; and I guess he was half right there. Any body would be faithful to Wynne. There's a man you ought to know, Kit! He'd do you good. So large-hearted and clear-headed—so strong and brave and true, with the 'stately grace of a cavalier.' But I can't get over Gamp's coming on alone. Good God! Wynne can not be dead! Where's the paper? Not come?"

Rawlins waited to ask nothing further. As suddenly as this new solution of the circumstance of Gamp's coming on alone had occurred to him he had darted from the room and plunged out into the sleet and snow, regardless of the breakfast-bell, with only one idea in his head—to get a newspaper, and see if there was any thing about Wynne in it.

He came back all in a glow with his walk, the paper in his hand, and with the words, "There's nothing here, and perhaps he is all right, and there was some other arrangement made."

The next day, and the next, and still nothing about Wynne—the beloved Wynne—of whom Rawlins couldn't say enough; and on the third the ardent, restless spirit could stand it no longer, and, shortening his visit of a week at Grainthorpe, he fled off to New York, where all the Wynnes, far and near, held their habitations for the winter.

At the end of the season Janet had forgotten the very name of Gamp in her thousand interests.

II.

The waves came tumbling in over the wild, rocky shore, making their sweet, solemn music, unaided by the throbbing of drums, and the horns and harps and cymbals.

But you didn't miss the band here in this wild Cape scenery. It was too rough and lonely and primitive for the sound of waltz or gay galop. Its savage splendor wooed you to thoughts of heroic peril and lofty sacrifice. The atmosphere braced you to endeavor and not to repose, and all things grand and daring seemed possible looking out from those rocks across the limitless tide and around upon the stern sea-coast. Perhaps in these days of trial and bloodshed some influence of may have brought these gay visitors to this spot, instead of the usual Saratoga or Newport season. Some strange under-current of solemn needs may have given their souls a yearning for the solemnest scenes.

"The blood-red blossom of war"

But as they pace along the shore their talk is not grave, their faces are not solemn. They are youths and maidens, and they talk brightly and jestingly; but if you look closer you will see, in the glances that fall athwart the waves, there is a vague wistfulness, as if the sea brought them messages far different from the gay greetings of other summers; but the under-current of pensiveness does not hurt the quality of the tone, it gives it a finer charm.

Pacing along the beach, Grant Carew talked to Janet Wilmont of those days he spent at the Crimea—days that disabled him forever from all active service, when that Russian ball winged its way over the field, and tore down shoulder and arm in a wound that left its weakening effects for a perpetual memento, and now gave him irksome exemption from "duty."

Irksome; yes, for he thrilled at every winding bugle-call, at every sound of drum and fife, to enroll himself, as that poet-hero who fell at Bethel wrote, "in the police of the nation." And for the hundredth time since the war began he exclaimed, as he paced the beach there, "Why did I rush headlong, just for the mere sake of excitement, into that contest, and there lose all my power of use when I most need it?"

But to-day the regret was keener, bitterer than ever; for it was the day succeeding the call for the final rally.

"Why did I?" he went on. "Ah! could I have foreseen this hour, when my own America would be fighting against her traitors, I would rather have lost my life, Janet, for this cause than disabled myself in that other."

"I am sure you would," murmurs Janet, approvingly, as she always does at his warlike bursts.

And then—for the hundredth time, too—he relates something of that "last siege, when we stormed Sebastopol." And Janet listens, and her heart aches for the ardent soul that can only look backward, and never forward, in his deeds of valor.

And she strives to console. "But you have proved yourself a brave and gallant man, Grant—and you so young, too, then."

"Brave!" and a half-scornful expression is in his tone. "I do not care to prove mere personal courage now. It isn't for that—oh, Janet, it isn't for that I want to help!"

There were tears in Janet's eyes at this sudden passionate cry, and every nerve thrilled in sympathy to it.

"I do not see," he went on, "how men can stand idly by—men who have no ties to bind them. Is it cowardice—is it selfishness? I can not make it out; for it seems to me, however cowardly a man may be, there must be somewhere in his nature a spark of manliness; and how can these stirring times, this constant bugle-call, fail to rouse emotions of enthusiasm that will put his mere personality out of sight for a time. And if he be selfish, what more splendid opportunity offers itself—or ever will, in his lifetime—to gain more than he can lose by doing splendid deeds? I can not make it out!"

The voice that had begun indignantly had a tone of sorrow in it as he finished; the face a wistful look, as if he were scanning such a waste of possibilities with a jealous heart.

Janet had just begun to speak again, when Kit came flying along, waving his straw-hat to them. She turned. "What's the matter, Kit?"

"Matter? Rawlins has come with Wynne—his Major Wynne—Colonel Wynne now; and there's going to be a reception, or something, up at the house!"

Janet's face glowed with delight. She would like to see this hero; and the subject of adorning rose up, a sure feminine instinct which gave a new zest to the pleasure. Janet would be no heroine of mine if she took no interest in the graces of her dress. Half an hour later a little, slight, dark beauty, in the most exquisite of evening toilets, was entering the drawing-room. Rawlins met her half way.

"I'm so happy to see you, Miss Janet! doubly so to-night, for I've got Wynne here—you know my hobby!" and he laughed. "I'm as much in love as ever, you see! And when you know him you will pardon my ceaseless talk about him. Stay just in this spot a moment."

He darted down the room, and returned with—"Colonel Wynne, Miss Wilmont."

Janet looked up to the gentleman bowing before her.

Not precisely a handsome man; but she thought of the words, "There's a man you ought to know, Kit! He'd do you good."

In a moment she felt herself in the presence of courage and valor and high heroic honor. And looking again she saw he had an air that matched these lofty qualities—"the stately grace of a cavalier."

He said little, but possessed that rare charm of evoking all the finest things of his companion's thought. As Rawlins once expressed it, "I am never in the society of Wynne an hour but I feel inspired and eloquent beyond myself."

The subtle power of intense sympathy.

And perhaps it was this, too, that gave Janet a curious feeling as if she had known him a much longer time than these few moments. And in his voice also there was a chord that vibrated to something foregone, as if ages ago they had been friends in some earlier era of dire extremity.

Kit was enthusiastic. His eighteen years of boy-manhood thrilled at the touch of this fine spirit, and college honors and persuasion were cast aside for "the good luck of fighting under such a Colonel."

"Why, Jenny, I should never get over it if he should be killed before my graduation, and I thus should lose my chance of serving under him."

Such was this man's charm.

Grant Carew, an older acquaintance, had long ago opened his heart to him, and Wynne was the only person in the world, perhaps, save Janet Wilmont, who knew what depths of yearning devotion and restless desire lay under that light exterior.

"But how came you here now?" asks Carew, as they stood in a group, with Wynne for centre.

"Didn't you hear of the accident? An explosion of powder came near putting Wynne's eyes out, and almost spoiled my usefulness; so we're on a furlough," answered Rawlins.

Carew gave an involuntary shudder, and looked wistfully at Wynne, with aching sympathy.

One day an old subject was brought forward.

"You have never asked me about your protégé, Gamp, Miss Janet," said Rawlins, mischievously.

"Gamp?" she had evidently forgotten. A word or two recalled. "Oh yes," laughing, and coloring a little. "Well, what of him?"

"A fractured hand gave him dismissal from the army; and he is now treading the boards, with the sublime belief that he will become a second Booth—all that voice, Miss Janet."

"But I have never heard, Captain Rawlins, how your friend, Colonel Wynne, came to dispense with the services of this Gamp," Janet asked, ignoring the badinage.

"Oh, that was the Colonel's good-nature, Miss Janet. Gamp got impatient, and he sent him on before him."

Young Kit now offered something gayly satirical, to which Janet returned with a little impatience:

"You can never laugh me out of the belief that this man was something finer than circumstances perhaps had ever allowed him to develop. Nature does not belie herself by such signs. But in any case, I consider that the kindest consideration is always due to a disabled soldier, no matter what position he may occupy, and I glory in giving it."

"Bravo, Miss Jenny!" cried Rawlins; but looking up she found the eyes of Wynne regarding her steadfastly.

Kit had no need to have told him that last winter's story; Rawlins long ago performed that duty; but Wynne, with more tact than the others, never mentioned it, until one evening when they were better acquainted. They were pacing the rocky shore, watching the storm come up over the sea; and Janet, haunted as ever by that sense of something foregone, which certain people strangely suggest. What was it? Now and then the flash of his eyes, the tone of his voice—more than any thing the tone of his voice—touched the mystic chain; but the connecting links were always wanting. What was it? Suddenly she looked up into his face.

"Tell me, Colonel Wynne, did I ever meet you at Newport or Saratoga, or perhaps at New York?"

He smiled, hesitated a moment, then drew something from his breast-pocket and handed it to her.

"What, my cassolette? Oh! I remember. How did you—"

"I have treasured it since the night you gave it to me, Miss Wilmont."

A burning color, a startled gaze, and the words, falling eagerly, "I can not understand—it was you, instead of—"

"Yes, happily, it was I who received this little memento of a goodness so unostentatious and graceful."

"But your dress—a private's?"

"I will explain. After the engagement in which I was wounded I lay for a while upon the battle-field, insensible. When I was removed it was found that I had been robbed of both coat and cap, and what money and valuables I had upon my person. The rest of my attire was too torn and blood-stained to be ever fit for use. When able to come home, the only available suit I could find was that of a private—my cousin Ned's, who had died a day or two before of his wound. You may judge if I cared to linger for new garments; and I am sure you can understand that I took a certain mournful pleasure in bringing poor Ned's uniform back in this way."

Janet heard him reverently, then suddenly a smile flashed brightly over her face. "I was not mistaken, then, after all. I felt so sure that there was a gentleman's heart beating under that rough exterior, whatever the condition."

"But the best of it is, Miss Jenny, that you would do what you did for any body, as you proved then, whatever the condition."

Janet blushed with pleasure there in the coming twilight; it was so delightful to be commended, instead of complimented, and by such a true, heroic nature.

They had forgot the approaching storm, forgot every thing but the interest of their conversation. A low roll of thunder roused them. The sky had blackened, and the waves dashed hoarsely against the rocks.

"I have been strangely careless of you, Miss Jenny, not to heed this. An old soldier can stand it like a summer shower; but I should have guarded you."

There was unwonted tenderness in that always persuasive voice as he said this; and did she fancy a deeper emphasis upon the "you?" A tenderness, too, in the touch of his arm as he guided her along the cliffs.

Janet did not stop to analyze the pleasure this gave her. A vague pleasure, to which she yielded unthinkingly.

As the rain began to fall he stopped and fashioned her large shawl into an impromptu capuchin cloak; and so occupied were they that a tall, dark figure flitted past them unseen.

And while they wended home merrily, talking happily of their adventure, the dark figure dashed onward into the very face of the storm.

The booming thunder, the lashing waves, the pelting rain, seemed to have strange charms for this solitary traveler. And mingling with the mournful chant of the sea there was a sadder plaint than that of Ocean's.

"So I lose all," he murmured. "With the sapping of my blood, the shattering of a limb eight years ago, I lost my place in life; so all hopes have been sapped, all dreams shattered."

And the sea chanted on its mournful miserere with a ceaseless refrain—"Lost, lost!"

III.

"Where have you been, Grant? You are positively dripping."

He had entered at the side piazza hoping to elude all eyes; and in the dim passage came full upon Janet Wilmont, the last person in the world he cared to meet just now.

He answered carelessly something about getting caught in the storm, and started to pass on; but the little slim hand held his coat-sleeve detainingly.

"You look pale and ill, Grant; I am sure you have met with some accident. What is it?"

"Would you care so very much, Jenny, if I had?" And he bent down with half a hope in his heart. She started. She had known Grant Carew for more than a year, and always thought of him as the finest man of her acquaintance; but possessing one of those unquestioning natures, she had never analyzed her regard, and to-night, when he spoke in a more fervent tone than she had ever heard from him, she shrank startled. Was it the natural shrinking of her natural reserve, or had a newer fascination thralled her? There might be something of both. But the quick, involuntary action fell like a doom upon Grant Carew. He dropped his arm from her hand, and with a "Pardon me," disappeared down the hall.

Outside the little piazza sat a smoker, and smoking his cigar he could not help seeing and hearing this swift episode; and unwittingly straight into his presence came Janet as she turned from the dim passage. And the smoker as he met her face, clearly seen in the bright flare of the lamps just lighting, could not help seeing the quick smile of pleasure. For a moment his own face glowed; then the glow faded, and not long after he had excused himself on plea of dispatches to attend to, and was sitting in his room pondering over a graver problem than any he had found before. In that wild walk upon the shore, in that sudden meeting just past, in many other meetings gone before, in these few weeks, Arthur Wynne had read the meaning of blush, and smile, and eager glance. He knew that Janet Wilmont was surrendering her heart to him unwittingly. An hour ago this had given him unmixed pleasure. Now there was sharp pain in place of pleasure.

He had long been familiar with the history of Grant Carew's early war-experience, and later had heard those words of passionate regret, and sometimes of almost impotent despair that would burst from that chained and restless spirit. And this knowledge to Arthur Wynne had been the key to all his sympathies.

Often and often pondering over it he had said unto himself, "Would to Heaven I could help him in some way!" The time had come; he could help him; but at what sacrifice!

Sitting there far into the night, he fought a harder battle than any in which he had hitherto won praise and power.

On one hand he placed his own emotions, his own probabilities of success: both seemed consistent. On the other hand lay the revelation of the last hour—that swift scene in the passage to the hall. He could not doubt its meaning. In vain he might at one moment argue that it might mean less. The next moment reason and courageous honor held its sway, and he forced the truth.

With a much briefer acquaintance than Grant Carew, Arthur Wynne's subtle perception of character had enabled him to comprehend Janet Wilmont much better than his friend. He saw at once that she possessed that rare quality—unconsciousness of self; that little given to analyzing her own emotions she analyzed others still less. With such a nature he knew that love was a matter of growth, and depended much on the wooing. It did not spring "full statured in an hour," as in more nervous temperaments. He saw too, that pleased and flattered by the prestige of his position, she had come to the verge of deeper interest as she knew him better. A few more walks on that wild, romantic shore, a few more words of deeper tenderness, and the innocent heart of Janet Wilmont would be wholly surrendered to him. "And why not?" he asks himself, "why should I not woo and win her?" "Why? because it would be neither brave nor kind," is the answer of his lofty spirit.

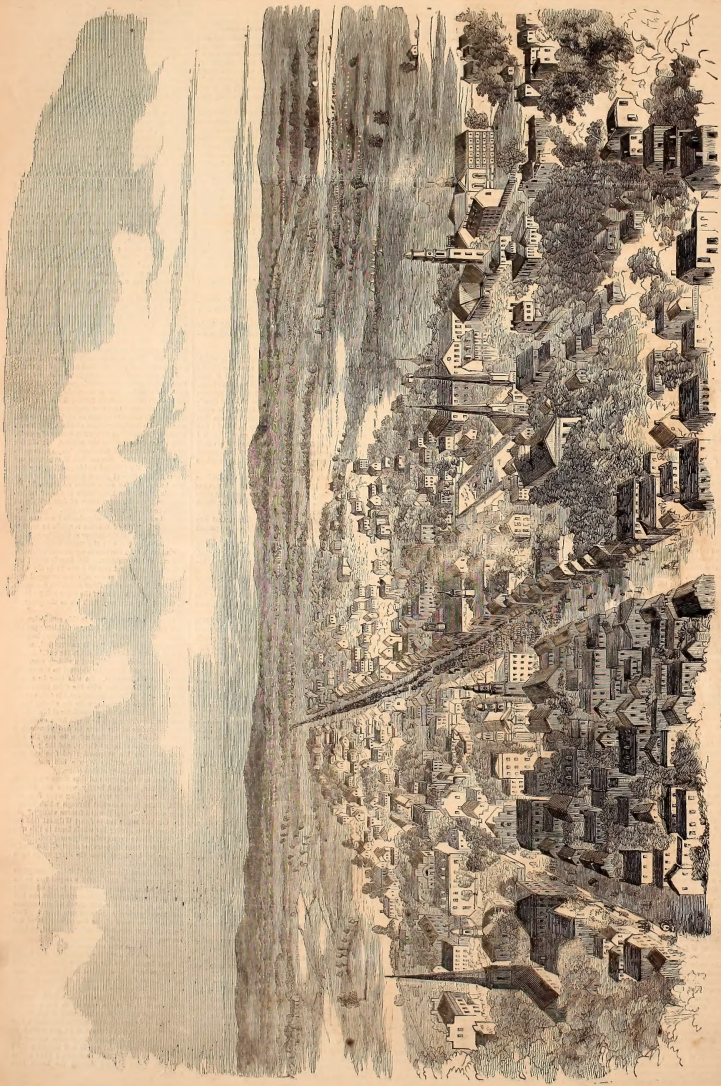
"I have my place in the world unfettered by any misfortune. I can choose my own course freely and master circumstance. But here is one of my fellows as brave and true as I can be in the wish to do, but with the power of doing cramped and crippled. Robbed of half that makes life endurable already, shall I rob him of the other half? Shall I, to brim my own cup, dash his to the ground? Never!"

Involuntarily as he came to this conclusion, his eyes fell upon his sword lying sheathless upon the table. Half dreamily he drew his finger along the blade and murmured, "It is untarnished, untarnished; let me keep it bright to the end."

The battle was fought, and a victory won.

A day or two longer he lingered to thoroughly work out his resolves. In this time he sought Janet quite freely, but with the calm solicitation of a brother. Always interesting, his talk was entirely impersonal, running upon the stirring topics of the day, and the best generalities of life. If he had had any doubt that he might have overstated the importance of the scene he had witnessed, it would have been dispelled when he saw the evident constraint of Grant Carew, and the pains he took to leave his supposed rival free and unwatched. But Arthur Wynne had never any doubt of the meaning of that scene.

A day or two longer and then there were good-bys spoken, free and hearty words and wishes, and Arthur Wynne was speeding away from the field of the sorest conflict through which he had ever passed. "But it was a famous victory." If any one had suggested to Janet Wilmont that she had been near giving her whole heart to this man she would have been profoundly surprised.



Such had been his power of success. So gently had he led her away from the dizzy verge upon which she stood.

When Grant Carew found that his suppositions were ungrounded, that Janet was yet free to be won, all his courage and hope rose to the occasion; and he was again the brilliant companion she had liked so much, with a new touch of earnestness which was gradually bringing him nearer. Perhaps a vague sense of the incompleteness of her life might have been awakened; she might, without knowing why, have felt

"——a want unknown before."

However it was, ere the September had blown its first breath into the summer Janet Wilmont had given her little steadfast heart into the keeping of Grant Carew, without a suspicion that she could ever have given it to any other.

And far away on Southern battle-fields, he who sped the wooing works bravely in his country's cause. His wounds bear testimony of how he has worked; and some day the nation may thank him with her bays; but there will be one wound no eye will ever look upon, one victory unsung by any praises, one small bright leaf unseen amidst the laurels. And for all memento, a little gilded cassolette lying always against the brave true breast.

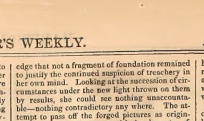
CHAPTER X.

On returning to Sea View Mr. Noel Vanstone executed the instructions which prescribed his line of conduct for the first of the five days with unimpeachable accuracy. A faint smile of contempt hovered about Mrs. Lecount's lips while the story of Mr. Bygrave's attempt to pass off his spurious pictures as originals was related to her, but she did not trouble herself to utter a single word of remark when it had come to an end. "Just what I said." Thus much Mr. Noel Vanstone, cunningly watching her face—"she doesn't believe a word of it!"

The next day the meeting occurred on the parade. Mr. Bygrave took off his hat, and Mr. Noel Vanstone followed the other way. The captain's start of surprise and scowl of indignation were extended to perfection, but they probably failed to impose on Mrs. Lecount. "I am afraid, Sir, you have offended Mr. Bygrave to-day," she ironically remarked. "Happily for you, he is an excellent Christian, and I venture to predict that his will forgive you to-morrow."

Mr. Noel Vanstone wisely refrained from committing himself to an answer. Once more he privately applauded his own premature caution more he triumphed over his ingenious friend.

Thus far the captain's instructions had been too clear and simple to be mistaken by any one. But they advanced in complication with the advance of time, and on the third day Mrs. Noel Vanstone fell confusedly into the commission of a slight error. After expressing the most sincere weariness of Aldborough, and the consequent anxiety for change of scene, he was met (as he had anticipated) by an immediate suggestion from the housekeeper, recommending a visit to St. Crux. In giving his answer to the advice he thus tendered he made his first mistake. Instead of deferring his decision until the next day he accepted Mrs. Lecount's suggestion at the time when it was offered to him.



The consequences of this error were of no great importance. The housekeeper merely set herself to watch her master one day earlier than had been calculated on—a result which had been already provided for by the wise precautionary measures of forbidding Mr. Noel Vanstone all communication with North Shingles. Doubting, as Captain Wragge had foreseen, the sincerity of her master's desire to break off his connection with the Bygraves by going to St. Crux, Mrs. Lecount tested the truth or falsehood of the impression produced on her own mind by vigilantly watching for signs of secret communication on one side or on the other. The close attention with which she had hitherto observed the outgoings and incomings at North Shingles was now entirely transferred to her master. For the rest of that third day she never let him out of her sight: she never allowed any third person who came to the house, on any pretence whatever, a minute's chance of private communication with him. At intervals through the night she stole to the door of his room to listen and assure herself that he was in bed. And before sunrise the next morning the coast-guardsman going his rounds was surprised to see a lady, who had risen as early as himself, engaged over her work at one of the upper windows of Sea View.

On the fourth morning Mr. Noel Vanstone came down to breakfast conscious of having to take that he had committed on the previous day. The obvious course to take, for the purpose of gaining time, was to declare that he was not yet still undecided. He made the assertion boldly when the housekeeper asked him if he meant to move that day. Again Mrs. Lecount offered no remark, and again the signs and tokens of incredulity showed themselves in the form of a meditation of purpose was not at all unusual in her experience of her master. But on this occasion she believed that his caprice of conduct was assumed for the purpose of gaining time to communicate with North Shingles, and she accordingly set her watch on him once more with doubled and trebled vigilance.

No letters came that morning. Toward noon the weather changed for the worse, and all idea of walking out on sand was abandoned. Shortly after hour, while her master sat in one of the parlors, Mrs. Lecount kept watch in the other —with the door into the passage open, and with a full view of North Shingles through the convenient side window at which she had established herself. Not a sign that was suspicious appeared; not a sound that was suspicious caught her ear. At the evening closed in hesitation came to an end. He was disgusted with the weather: he hated the place: he could saw the annoyance of more meetings with Mr. Bygrave, and he was determined to go to St. Cruz the first thing the next morning. Lecount could stay behind to pack up the curiosities, and settle with the trades-people, and could follow him to the Admiral's on the next day. The housekeeper was a little staggered by the tone and manner in which he gave these orders. He had, to her own certain knowledge, effected no communication of any sort with North Shingles, and yet he seemed determined to leave Aldborough at the earliest possible opportunity. For the first time she hesitated in her adherence to her own conclusions. She remembered that her master had complained of the Bygraves before they returned to Aldborough, and she was conscious that her own incredulity had once already misled her when the appearance of the traveling-carriage at the door had proved even Mr. Bygrave himself to be as good as his word.

Still Mrs. Lecount persevered in her with unrelenting caution to the last. That night, when the doors were closed, she privately removed the keys from the door in front and the door at the back. She then softly opened her bedroom window, and left it open, to hear any sound at the door, and to prevent her taking cold. Mr. Noel Vanstone's window was on the same side of the house as her own. If any one came in the dark to speak to him from the garden beneath they would speak to his housekeeper as well. Prepared at all points to intercept every form of clandestine communication which strangers could invent, Mrs. Lecount watched through the quiet night. When morning came she stole down stairs before the servants were up, removed the keys to their places, and reoccupied her position in the parlor until Mr. Noel Vanstone made his appearance at the breakfast table. Had he altered his mind? No. He declined posting to St. Cruz on account of the expense, but he was as firm as ever in his resolution to go to St. Cruz. He desired that an inside place might be secured for him in the early coach. Suspicious to the last, Mrs. Lecount sent the baker's man to take the order. He was a public servant, and Mr. Bygrave would not suspect him of performing a private errand.

The coach called at Sea View. Mrs. Lecount saw her master established in his place, and ascertained that the other three inside seats were already occupied by strangers. She inquired of the coachman in the outside place (all of which were not yet filled up) had their full complement of passengers also. The man replied in the affirmative. He had two gentlemen to call for at the town, and the others would take their places at the inn. Mrs. Lecount forthwith turned her steps toward the inn, and took up her position on the parade opposite, from a point of view which would enable her to see the last of the coach on its departure. In ten minutes more it rattled away, full inside and out; and the housekeeper's own eyes assured her that neither Mr. Bygrave himself, nor any one belonging to the North Shingles, was among the passengers.

"LORD BLESS US! WHAT CAN THAT BE?"

There was only one more precaution to take, and Mrs. Lecount did not neglect it. Mr. Bygrave had doubtless seen the coach call at Sea View. He might hire a carriage and follow it on the railway, on pure speculation. Mrs. Lecount remained within view of the inn (the only place at which a carriage could be obtained) for nearly an hour longer, waiting for events. Nothing happened; no carriage made its appearance; no pursuit of Mr. Noel Vanstone took place within the range of human possibility. The long ordeal was over. Mrs. Lecount returned at last. She left her seat on the parade, and returned, in higher spirits than usual, to perform the closing household operations at Sea View.

She sat down alone in the parlor, and drew a long breath of relief. Captain Wragge's calculations had not deceived him. The evidence of her own senses had at last conquered the housekeeper's incredulity, and had literally forced her into the opposite extreme of belief.

Estimating the events of the last three days from her own experience of them; knowing (as she certainly knew) that the first idea of going to St. Cruz had been started by herself, and that her master had found no opportunity and shown no inclination to inform the family at North Shingles that he had accepted her proposal—Mrs. Lecount was fairly compelled to acknowledge that not a fragment of foundation remained to justify the continued suspicion of treachery in her own mind. Looking at the succession of circumstances under the new light thrown on them by results, she could see nothing unaccountable—nothing contradictory any where. The attempt to pass off the forged pictures as originals was in perfect harmony with the character of such a man as Mr. Bygrave. His master's indignation at the attempt to impose on him; his plainly-expressed suspicion that Miss Bygrave was privy to it; his disappointment in the niece; his contemptuous treatment of the uncle on the public view of the parade—all these were natural consequences of the discovery which had been made in the scene of his rash intimacy with strangers, and his readiness to quit it that morning—all commended themselves as genuine realities to the housekeeper's mind, for one sufficient reason.

Her own eyes had seen Mr. Noel Vanstone take his departure from Aldborough without leaving, or attempting to leave, a single trace behind him for the Bygraves to follow.

Thus far the housekeeper's conclusions led her no further. She was too shrewd a woman to trust the future to chance and fortune. Her master's variable temper might relent. Accident might, at any time, give Mr. Bygrave an opportunity of repairing the error that he had committed, and of artfully regaining his lost place in Mr. Noel Vanstone's estimation. Admitting that circumstances had at last declared themselves unmistakably in her favor, Mrs. Lecount was not the less convinced that nothing would permanently assure her master's security for the future but the plain exposure of the conspiracy which she had striven to accomplish from the first—which she was resolved to accomplish still.

"I always enjoy myself at St. Crux," thought Mrs. Lecount, opening her account-books, and sorting the tradesmen's bills. "If the admiral is a gentleman, the house is noble, the table is excellent. No matter! Here, in this house, I enjoy myself till I have seen the inside of Miss Bygrave's wardrobe."

She packed her master's collection of curiosities in their various cases, settled the claims of the trades-people, and superintended the covering of the furniture in the course of the day. Toward nightfall she went out, bent on investigation, and ventured into the garden at North Shingles under cover of the darkness. She saw the light in the parlor window, and the lights in the windows of the rooms up stairs, as usual. After an instant's hesitation she stole to the house door, and noiselessly tried the handle from the outside. It turned the lock as she had expected, from her experience of houses at Aldborough and at other watering-places; but the door resisted her—the door was distrustfully bolted on the inside. After making that discovery she went round to the back of the house, and ascertained that the door on that side was secured in the same manner. "Bolt your doors, Mr. Bygrave, as fast as you like," said the housekeeper, making her way again to the parade. "You can't bolt the entrance to your servant's pocket. The best lock you have may be opened by a golden key."

She went back to bed. The ceaseless watching, the intense excitement of the last two days, had worn her out.

The next morning she rose at seven o'clock. In half an hour more she saw the panoramic Mr. Bygrave—as she had seen him on many previous mornings at the same time—issue from the gate of North Shingles, with his towels under his arm, and make his way to a boat that was waiting for him on the beach. Swimming was one among the many personal accomplishments of which the captain was master. He was rowed out to sea every morning, and took his bath luxuriously in the deep blue water. Mrs. Lecount had already computed the time consumed in this recreation by her watch, and had discovered that a full hour usually elapsed from the moment when he embarked on the beach to the moment when he returned.

During that period she had never seen any other inhabitant of North Shingles leave the house. The servant-girl was employed in her work in the kitchen; Mrs. Bygrave was probably still in her bed; and Miss Bygrave (if she was up at that early hour) had perhaps received directions not to venture out in her uncle's absence. The difficulty of ascertaining the nature of Magdalen's presence in the house had been, for some days past, the one difficulty which all Mrs. Lecount's ingenuity had thus far proved unable to overcome.

She sat at the window for a quarter of an hour after the captain's boat had left the beach with her mind busy as usual, and with her eyes mechanically on North Shingles—she sat, considering what written excuse she could send to her master for absenting herself from breakfast, though for some days to come—when the door of the house on the west watching suddenly opened, and Magdalen herself appeared in the garden. There was no mistaking her figure and her dress. She took a few steps hastily toward the gate; stopped, and pulled down the veil of her garden hat, as if she felt the clear morning light too much for her sensitive eyes; looked up at the parade, and walked away northward in such haste, or in such preoccupation of mind, that she went through the garden gate without closing it after her.

Mrs. Lecount started up from her chair, with a moment's doubt of the evidence of her own eyes. Had the opportunity which she had been vainly plotting to produce actually offered itself to her of its own accord? Had the chances declared themselves at last in her favor, after steadily acting against her for so long? There was no doubt of it: in the popular language, her luck had turned. She snatched up her bonnet and mantilla, and made for North Shingles without an instant's hesitation. Mr. Bygrave out at sea; Miss Bygrave away for a walk; Mrs. Bygrave and the servant both at home, and both easily dealt with—the opportunity was not to be lost; the risk was well worth running!

This time the house door was easily opened: no one had bolted it against, after Magdalen's departure. Mrs. Lecount closed the door softly, listened for a moment in the passage, and heard the servant noisily occupied in the kitchen with the morning's work. Up the stairs she next crept, straight into Miss Bygrave's room, "thought the housekeeper, stealing noiselessly up the stairs, "I may find my way to her papers more easily without disturbing any body."

She tried the door nearest to the front of the house, on the right-hand side of the landing. Capricious chance had deserted her already. The lock was bolted. She tried the door opposite, on her left hand. The boots ranged symmetrically in a row, and the razors on the dressing-table, told her at once that she had not found the right room yet. She returned to the right-hand side of the landing, walked down a little passage leading to the back of the house, and tried a third door. The door opened, and the two opposite extremes of female humanity, Mrs. Wragge and Mrs. Lecount, stood face to face in an instant.

"I beg ten thousand pardons!" said Mrs. Lecount, with the most consummate self-possession. "Lord bless me!" cried the other, and never did Mrs. Wragge, with the most helpless amazement.

The two women looked at each other in a moment, and in that moment Mrs. Lecount took the measure of her victim. Nothing of the least importance escaped her. She noted the Oriental Cashmere Robe lying half made, and half unpicked, upon the table: she took in at once the imbecile foot of Mrs. Wragge searching blindly in the neighborhood of her chair for a foot stool: she noticed that there was no other door in the room besides the door by which she had entered: and, as the easy explanation of the words, in which she might do well to account for herself in a friendly and confidential way. "Pray don't re-sent my intrusion," pleaded Mrs. Lecount, taking the chair. "Pray allow me to explain myself!"

Speaking in her softest voice; surveying Mrs. Wragge with a sweet smile on her insinuating lips, and a beaming interest in her handsome black eyes, the housekeeper told her little innocent history with a grace and ease which truthfulness of manner which the Father of Lies himself might have envied. She had heard from Mr. Bygrave that Mrs. Bygrave was a great invalid; she had constantly reproached herself, in her idle half hours at Sea View (where she filled the situation of Mr. Noel Vanstone's housekeeper), for not having offered her friendly services to Mrs. Bygrave; she had taken courage by her master (doubtless well known to Mrs. Bygrave as one of her husband's friends, and naturally one of Mrs. Bygrave's nurse's friends) to join him that day at the residence to which he had removed from the parade; she was now obliged to leave early, but she could not reconcile it to her conscience to go without calling to apologize for her unwitting want of civility on the preceding day, she had found nobody in the house; she had not been able to leave the servants in charge of the premised (not discovering that apartment down stairs) that Mrs. Bygrave's boudoir might be of the upper story; she had thoughtlessly committed an intrusion of which she was sincerely ashamed, and she could now only trust to Mrs. Bygrave's indulgence to excuse and forgive her.

It has elaborate apology might have served Mrs. Lecount's purpose. As soon as Mrs. Wragge's struggling perceptions had grasped the fact that the most unexpected visitor to a mother well known to her by repute, her whole being became absorbed in admiration of Mrs. Le-count's lady-like manners, and Mrs. Lecount's perfectly-fitting gowns! "What a noble way she has of talking!" thought poor Mrs. Wragge, as the housekeeper reached her closing sentence. "And oh my heart alive, how nicely she's dressed!"

"I see I disturb you," pursued Mrs. Lecount, quietly recalling herself of the Oriental Cashmere Robe as a means ready at hand of reaching the end she had in view—"I see I disturb you, ma'am, over an occupation which, I know by experience, requires the undivided attention of the fingers. Are you unpicking the dress again, I see, after it has been made! This is my own experience again, Mrs. Wragge. Some dresses are so obstinate! Some dresses seem to say to one in so many words, 'No! you may go as far you like with me; I won't fit!'"

Mrs. Wragge was greatly struck by this happy remark. She put down her sewing, and fixed her great hands in the highest excitement.

"That's what this gown has been saying to me ever since I first put the scissors into it," she exclaimed, cheerfully. "I know I've got an awful big waist; but that's no reason. Why should it open he weeks on hand, and then not meet behind you after all? I'm sitting over my Bodice like a tailor—it does. Look here, ma'am, at the skirt. It won't come right. It draggles in front, and cocks up behind. It shows my legs—and, Lord knows, I get into scrapes enough about my heels without showing them to the whole street!"

"May I ask a favor?" inquired Mrs. Lecount, confidentially. "May I try, Mrs. Wragge, if I can make my experience of any use to you? I think our bosoms, ma'am, are our great difficulty. Nine bosoms out of ten—Shall I say in plain words what I think? "This bosom of yours is an Exception to the rule."

"Don't say that!" cried Mrs. Wragge, impulsively. "Don't, please, there's a good soul! It's a dreadful disgrace, I know; but I can't help all that, from one of Magdalen's own."

She was far too deeply interested on the subject of the dress to notice that she had forgotten herself already, and that she had referred to Magdalen by her own name. Mrs. Lecount, however, as detected the mistake the instant it was committed. "So!" she thought to herself, "I've scarcely already. If I had ever doubted my own suspicions, here is an estimable lady who would see how and me right—but your pardon," she proceeded, aloud, "did you say this was modeled from one of your niece's dresses?"

"Yes," said Mrs. Wragge, "I'm as like as two peas."

"Then," replied Mrs. Lecount, adroitly, "there must be some serious mistake in the making of your niece's dress. Can you show it to me?"

"Bless your heart—yes!" cried Mrs. Wragge. "Step this way upstairs, if you please, and come along with you, please. It keeps sliding off, out of pure aggravation, if you lay it out on the table. There's lots of room on the top floor."

She opened the door of communication, and led the way eagerly into Magdalen's bedroom. Mrs. Bygrave would be back from his bath.

"There!" said Mrs. Wragge, throwing open the wardrobe, and taking a dress down from one of the pegs. "Look there! There's plaits in her bosom, and plaits in her skirt. Six of one and half a dozen of the other; and mine are the biggest—that's all!"

Mrs. Lecount shook her head gravely, and entered forthwith into subtleties of disquisition on the art of dress-making, which left the dishonest effect of utterly bewildering the proprietor of the Oriental Cashmere Robe in less than three minutes.

"Don't!" cried Mrs. Wragge, imploringly. "Don't go on that way, for the love of goodness, or my head's Buzzing already. Tell us, like a good soul, what's to be done. You said something about the pattern just now. Have you got it big for the pattern? I can't help it if I am. Here's the good cry I had, when I first took to being gid, over my own size! There's half too much of me, ma'am—measure me along or measure me across, I don't—they're always half too much of me, any way."

"My dear madam," protested Mrs. Lecount, "you do yourself a wrong! Permit me to assure you that you possess a commanding figure—a figure of Minerva. A majestic simplicity in the form of a woman imperatively demands a majestic simplicity in the form of that woman's dress. The laws of contrast and harmony [illegible] the most effective means of [illegible] for Venus—waffle for Juno—but for Minerva I venture to suggest a total change of pattern. Your niece has other dresses in her collection. Why may we not find a Minerva among them?"

As she said those words she led the way back to the wardrobe.

Mrs. Wragge followed, and took the dresses out, one by one, shaking her head despondently. Silk dresses appeared, muslin dresses appeared. The one dress which remained on the shelves was the dress of which Mrs. Lecount was in search.

"There's the lot of 'em," said Mrs. Wragge. "I never may do for Venus and I never may for Juno (I've seen 'em in pictures without a morsel of decent linen among the three), but they won't do for Me."

"Surely there is another dress left?" said Mrs. Lecount, pointing to the wardrobe, but touching nothing in it. "Surely I see something hanging in the corner, behind that dark shawl?"

Mrs. Wragge removed the shawl; Mrs. Lecount opened the door of the wardrobe a little wider. There, hitched carelessly on a peg, was most pre—there, with its white spots and its double flounce, was the brown Alpaca dress!

The suddenness and completeness of the discovery threw the housekeeper, practiced dissembler as she was, completely off her guard. She started at the sight of the dress. The instant afterward her eyes turned uneasily toward Mrs. Wragge. Had the start been observed? It had passed entirely unnoticed. Mrs. Wragge's whole attention was fixed on the Alpaca dress; she was staring at it incomprehensibly, with an expression of the utmost dismay.

"You seem alarmed, ma'am," said Mrs. Lecount. "What is there in the wardrobe to frighten you?"

"I'd have given a crown-piece out of my pocket," said Mrs. Wragge, "not to have set eyes on that gown. It had gone clean out of my head, and now it's come back again. What is to—" cried Mrs. Wragge, throwing the shawl over the dress in a sudden fit of desperation. "I look at it, and I'm sorry I shall like to I'm back again in Vauxhall Walk!"

"Vauxhall Walk!" The two words told Mrs. Lecount she was on the brink of another discovery. She stole a second look at her watch. Twenty—no, only ten minutes to spare before the time when Mr. Bygrave might return; there was not one of those ten minutes which might not bring his niece back to the house. Caution counseled Mrs. Lecount to go, without running any further risk. But a discovery had risen in the spot, and gave her the courage to stay at all hazards until it was made up. She resolutely began to harden a little as she probed her way tenderly into Mrs. Wragge's head.

"You have evidently a pleasant remembrance of Vauxhall Walk?" she said, with the gentlest possible tone of inquiry in her voice. "Or, perhaps, a painful one, which you remember as that dress belonging to your niece?"

"Not it!" said Mrs. Wragge with that gown on," said Mrs. Wragge, dropping into a chair and beginning to tremble, "was the time when I was scared out of my wits by sight of the Ghost."

"The Ghost?" repeated Mrs. Lecount, clasping her hands in graceful astonishment. "Dear madam, pardon me! Is there such a thing in existence as a Ghost? Have we it? In Vauxhall Walk? Tell me—you are the first lady I have ever met with who has seen a Ghost—pray tell me!"

Flattered by the position of importance which she had suddenly assumed in the housekeeper's eyes, Mrs. Wragge entered at full length into the narrative of her supernatural adventure. The bewildering sequences into which the recollection listened to her description of the spectre's appearance, the sudden hurry on the part of the spectre's disappearance in the bedroom; the extraordinary interest which Mrs. Lecount displayed in the whole matter—all these circumstances was the very dress in which Magdalen happened to be untried in Vauxhall Walk, and which had vanished, encouraged Mrs. Wragge to wade deeper and deeper into details, and to involve herself in a labyrinth of confusion and incoherence out of which there seemed to be no prospect of her ever extricating herself. Even the dress, the latest the inexorable minutes flew by; nearer and nearer came the fatal moment of Mr. Bygrave's return, and Mrs. Lecount was forced to watch for the third time without an attempt, on her own account, to stem the torrent of her companion's notice. There were literally two minutes left for her to get clear of North Shingles. Sixty minutes were enough for what might happened. She had discovered the Alpaca dress; she had learned the secret of the visit to Vauxhall Walk; and, more than that, she had even informed herself of the number of the house—which was the first thing to be found out, because it answered to the number of years in her own age. All that was necessary to her mistress's complete enlightenment was now accomplished. Even if there had been time to have longer, there was not enough in reserve for it.

"I'll strike this worthy idiot dumb with a coup d'état," thought the housekeeper, "and vanish before she can recover herself."

"Horrible!" cried Mrs. Lecount, interrupting the ghostly narrative by a sudden burst of horror-making for the door, to Mrs. Wragge's unutterable astonishment, without the least ceremony. "Horrible! Let us get away from this house. Good-morning!" She coolly tossed the Oriental Cashmere Robe, in a heap, on the carpet's expansive lap, and left the room in an instant.

As she swiftly descended the stairs she heard the door of the street open.

"Where are your manners?" cried a voice from below, which Mrs. Lecount knew by habit. "What do you mean by pitching my gown at me in that way? You ought to be ashamed of yourself! [illegible] Mrs. Wragge, I'm afraid, has taken to a license as she gradually realized the indignity offered to the Oriental Cashmere Robe. "Everything, you ought to be ashamed of yourself!"

Pursued by this valedictory address, Mrs. Lecount reached the house door, and opened it without interruption. She glided rapidly along the garden pathway, passed through the gate, and, finding herself safe on the parade, stopped and looked toward the sea.

The first object which her eyes encountered was the figure of Mr. Bygrave standing motionless on the beach, with his bathing-machine, his towels in his hand! One glance at him was enough to clear her mind to the housekeeper—or passing out through his garden gate.

Rightly conjecturing that Mr. Bygrave's first impulse would lead him to make instant inquiries in his own house, Mrs. Lecount pursued her way back to Sea View as composedly as if nothing had happened. When she entered the parlor, where her solitary breakfast was waiting for her, the clock pointed to the hour of ten, and to the table. She approached to take it up with an expression of impatience, thinking it might some tradesman's bill which she had forgotten.

It was the forged letter from Zurich.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN ENTERING THE TOWN OF FREDERICK, MARYLAND.—THE POPULAR WELCOME.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

McCLELLAN AT FREDERICK.

We illustrate on the preceding page the ENTHUSIASTIC RECEPTION OF GENERAL M'CLELLAN AT FREDERICK, MARYLAND, when he had driven the rebels from the place. A correspondent of the World thus describes the scene:

General M'Clellan came into the town upon the central road, and such an ovation as greeted him! It was very different from Virginia. The people were overjoyed. Flags were displayed at the houses, and the streets were gay and decorative: long flags crop-eared across the streets and hung over doors; wreaths of evergreen and flowers, such as only a Maryland lass could make, and such as only a Maryland lass could throw to the general amongst the cheers.

The General rode through the town on a trot, and the street was filled six or eight deep with his staff and guard falling on behind him. The cheers had been deafening, and, as I record gratefully the salutations of the people, I will declare and must say for all, and scores of beautiful ladies waved flags from the balconies of houses upon the streets, and their countenances seemed to express, in other emotion. When the General came to the corner of the principal street the ladies crowded around him. Bouquets, beautiful and fragrant, in great numbers were thrown at him, and the ladies cried out in many cases with the warmest good wishes, and many of them were unable to restrain their tears of joy at the sight of the General in the streets. The General took the proffered bouquets which were offered to him with many a kind and pressing remark, and heard and answered the many remarks and compliments with which the people saturated him. It was a scene which no one could forget—an event of a lifetime.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 4, 1862.

SLAVERY PRACTICALLY ABOLISHED.

THE proclamation of the President, which will be found in another column, practically abolishes slavery throughout the Southern States after next New-Year's Day. By the terms of that proclamation every negro shall become free who, on 1st January, 1863, shall reside in a section of country where the people are in rebellion. The evidence of rebellion, it appears, shall be the non-election of members of Congress by a majority of legally constituted voters. To carry out the Act fully, we presume that before New-Year's Day, the Speaker of Congress will direct an inquiry to be made with a view to ascertain what constituencies have failed to elect members. Upon his report the President will base his proclamation of emancipation, forever setting free and guaranteeing protection to every slave residing within such delinquent constituencies. In order to prevent trickery, no constituency will be deemed to be represented in Congress unless a majority of legally constituted voters have taken part in the election.

Under these conditions it is probable that nine-tenths of the slaves in the Southern States will become free on 1st January next. We do not suppose that any thing like a majority of votes of members of Congress will be attempted by a majority of legally constituted voters even in New Orleans, Memphis, or Norfolk. Those who as the rebel armies keep the field, a majority of the people of the South will refuse to acknowledge their effort, and will of course refuse to participate in elections which would amount to a repudiation of their slave confederacy. In these three cities, and in most of the other places at the South which are occupied by the Union troops, the bulk of the legally constituted voters are in the rebel army, and could not—if they would—obtain furloughs for the purpose of returning home and electing members of Congress. It is just possible that, in the course of the next ninety days, the dread of negro emancipation may work a change in the views of some Southern communities, and that there may be a struggle between two evils—abolition and submission—they may prefer the latter as the least intolerable. And it is also possible that our armies and navy may make such rapid progress with the work of suppressing the rebellion that, by 1st January, 1863, the bulk of the legally constituted voters may be overrun, and the hope of establishing a slave confederacy so thoroughly destroyed, that the rebels may be willing to vote in virtue of necessity, and set about electing members of Congress. But if the rebel armies are not crushed within ninety days, and the people of the South humbled into submission, then the fiat has gone forth that New-Year's Day, 1863, shall bring freedom to the negro from the rebel States.

Nor will the blessed boon be confined to those cotton States where the wretched rebellion arose. If Texas, Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, Arkansas, and Tennessee become free States, as is utterly impossible that Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri can continue to maintain the institution of slavery. With free States on either side of them, they must abolish slavery, or it will abolish itself. The only difference between them and their Southern neighbors will be, that the Union States will pay to the loyal owners a liberal sum—a fair compensation for the property whom they are voluntarily agree to emancipate.

We shall not see how this proclamation will be received—but, of the South and at the North. There are those who believe that the rebels—especially if they are hard pressed by our armies—will meet it with a counter-proclamation, immediately emancipating their slaves, and arming them for defense. A policy of this character would neglect the task before us, and the common difficulty, as it would enable the rebels to recruit their weakened armies with a fresh force of nearly 600,000 men. It is, however, well-nigh impossible to believe that the rebel leaders would of their own free-will adopt the very policy will dread of whose adoption by us plunged them into the present war—that they would place arms in the hands of their slaves, and run the risk of a war of class on their own soil—that they would in the middle of the hottest abandon the principle for which it is universally believed by them that they would be the corner-stone of their confederacy. A better opinion appears to be, that Mr. Lincoln's proclamation will be received by the rebel press as exertions than they have yet made, and that they will forthwith take measures to place their people out of reach of it. Indeed, we may say, no doubt, that the President's proclamation will have no more practical effect than the pretense to free the slaves of rebels in arms.

And how will negro emancipation be viewed at the North? There was a time, not very long since, when a large majority of the Northern people would have opposed it strenuously—not so much from any admiration for slavery, as from a belief that, under the Constitution, it was no right to meddle with it, and that its abolition involved dangers and inconveniences perhaps not formidable as those of negro emancipation by its existence. Even at the present time a mortal antipathy for the negro is entertained by a large class of persons at the North, who, influenced by the recent vote against negroes in Illinois, the riots in Cincinnati and Brooklyn, and the unkind treatment of the black regiments of Hilton Head by the regiments of General Hunter's army. At the same time, the war has produced a remarkable change in the feelings of a educated and liberal men at the North. Such leading men as General Wadlace of Illinois, Daniel S. Dickinson of New-York, a majority of Massachusetts, and nine-tenths of the generals in the field—who, a year ago, really believed that slavery was the true source for the negro—have lately freely expressed what used to be called "abolition views." How long it will take for these liberal views to permeate society, and stamp themselves on the mind of the working-class, remains to be seen. We do not, for our part, apprehend any serious opposition at the North to the President's policy, except in circles whose loyalty to the country may well be questioned.

Demagogues will of course endeavor to excite our working-classes against the Government by threatening them with vast numbers of free negro labor. It seems hardly worth while to reply to so shallow and so mean an argument as this. Our laboring class of the country is intelligent enough to know that what we want in every part of this country is not fewer but more laborers. For years a class of men has been moving heaven and earth to get more labor from Europe, and we have succeeded in getting a very large number of men, and we have yet wages have steadily advanced instead of falling. We have thought of opposing emancipated negroes insults the understanding of our laboring class.

THE REBELS FORTNIGHT IN MARYLAND.

THE rebel army, under Generals Lee, Jackson, Longstreet, and Hill, first invaded the State of Maryland on 4th, 5th, and 6th September. The General Commanding issued his proclamation to the Maryland people, informing them that he had come to liberate them from the despotism of Lincoln, and intimating that he intended to stay. On the 10th September, just a fortnight after the advance-guard of the rebels crossed the Potomac with this proclamation in their hands, the army of the North of Virginia army recrossed back into Virginia. What did they make by their fortnight's excursion?

Their object was, in the first place, to find out where was either no rebel sentiment in Maryland, or that if there was any it dared not show itself. They got no recruits. A few dozen ragged men of the western towns ran away from their homes to join them; but, to use their own words, "when they saw and smelt the cotton fields of the south-west, better of the enterprise and returned whence they had come. On the other hand, it is estimated that they lost 4000 or 5000 men by desertion. Every house in the counties which they visited is found to contain rebel deserters. They met, of course, with no resistance from the townships and villages. But they met with no civility, and nothing like cordiality; while, on the other hand, the people of Frederick and Hagerstown almost went crazy with delight over the approach of the delivering army of the Potomac.

While in Maryland they fought two battles, in which they lost something like 20,000 men. The loss, which were heavy likewise, were instantly repaired by the arrival of fresh troops. Theirs are not retained yet, and can not be until they retire to the interior of the country, if then. General Lee's army is in the condition the army of the Potomac was after the battles before Richmond, when we were all half dreading to hear of its annihilation.

In both these battles they were defeated. At South Mountain we drove them from the strong positions they had seized in the mountain gaps. At Antietam, we took their position and forced them to retreat across the Potomac. Whatever prestige they may have derived, therefore, from their victories at the Rappahannock and at Manassas has been destroyed by those defeats in Maryland. They invaded the State exultant, hopeful, flushed with triumph; they retire defeated, disappointed, disheartened.

They got some supplies in Maryland. We hear of their getting boots at Frederick, driving cattle in the direction of Hagerstown, and of the produce of farmers. Whether they got enough to feed their army for a week is very doubtful. If they had 100,000 men—and some people think they had 150,000—it may safely be said that they did not. It is not likely that they got as much as the Frederick boots shoes enough to furnish a brigade. An army of 100,000 men eats, or ought to eat, 500 barrels flour and 100 pounds of meat per day. To feed such an army for a week would require 3500 barrels flour, and 1500 head of cattle, besides vegetables, sugar, coffee, vinegar, etc. The rebels certainly found no such stock of supplies as this in the counties of Washington and Frederick, Md., and from what they did not find must be dedcuted what they lost on their retreat. The chances are that, in supplies as in morale and physical strength, their army is worse fixed by their visit to "My Maryland."

Under the circumstances it will be curious to see what the rebel Congress finds to vote a premium which three-fourths of that body united in pronouncing wise, skillful, and full of promise.

THE LOUNGER.

CRAFT.

It is well known that Jefferson Davis has been steadily opposed to an aggressive policy. His motto is, Let us alone. His object is preservation, with a guarantee for slavery. His philosophy is, that if the loyal citizens see that the disloyal are resolved even unto death, the loyal will purchase peace by the surrender of the Government. His hope is that with our capitulate the work which his arms have begun.

The fear of the instant actual invasion of the Free States began a hostility toward the rebels which is not felt while the seat of war is beyond their borders, and which has been a powerful element in all his open and secret allies in the North. If Pennsylvania were really invaded, for instance—Pennsylvania, which has rallied nearly 300,000 of these and men for home defense, in addition to those who have left for the field—how many would any policy of compromise or concession be likely to receive in Pennsylvania? Jefferson Davis means victory. He means that the slavery interest shall permanently and unquestionably control the Government of United States, and his interests to do nothing that shall render that result hopeless.

Able and desperate as the rebel fighting has been, if it made its way to Ohio that another method would more certainly secure his purpose, he would urge the laying down of arms by the rebellion, in order to turn to his advantage the tremendous reaction that would follow.

It is this policy he is urging in the South Carolina school, who are as impracticable in the rebellion as he seems in the Union. The ardent Miles is of opinion that Stonewall Jackson with a hundred thousand rebels, would march wherever he chose, and that he would be master of the United States. Miles may be more ardent than Davis, but he is not so sagacious. He speaks for the loud and stringent popular clamor; but the more popular clamor of a semi-barbarous horde, like the writer who compares the rank and file of the rebels to Cromwell's Ironsides, is not to be a guide to the cool brain of a cautious leader.

Besides, Miles and the South Carolina school doctrines with a separation. They are less aware than Davis that separation is impossible. They do not understand that to a United States citizen the word Union is the same as nation. They do not see, in fact, that the word Union is almost as one of two things: either the absolute victory of the Northern principle, that slavery, as the controlling power of the Government, shall be administered, or of the Southern principle that the control of slavery in the Government shall be put beyond dispute.

Of course every party and person at the North who, in this condition of public affairs, is anxious that the war shall end without touching slavery belongs to Jefferson Davis's party, and is his most supreme desire. Therefore he says that Hunter and Phelps, and every body else his hand upon slavery, shall be hung summarily.

Why does he say it? Because he knows that if the war ends with slavery unassailed, every one in the few cases of fugitives, whether he be victorious or conquered, he is sure that vast interest as the capital of new political combinations.

That is the danger which threatens the country. That is the political programme unveiled by Mr. Horatio Seymour, who, when Jefferson Davis and his fellows newly threatened the Government, begged the Government to surrender. The surrender which Mr. Seymour and his friends could not effect before the war, they hope to effect when the losses and sufferings of the war may have made practicable. They may indeed understand a party, but they are woefully ignorant of the people.

CARLYLE'S "FREDERICK THE GREAT."

THE volume of Carlyle's history of Frederick just published will disappoint no reader. It is together masterly in its comprehension and delineation of the events that attended the opening of Frederick's active career. The unanimous testimony of English criticism in favor will be heartily approved here, with the wish that the work might have undertaken, or even still undertake, a work which has never been adequately written—the Life of Napoleon Bonaparte. A man who has already the completest knowledge of the matter, who has no profound admiration and hardly any admiration of manhood, such a contempt of pretense as with marvelous literary skill, seems to have given us a picture of the Empire which would have been an memorable as that of the Revolution. Napoleon indeed was a good deal of a charlatan, but he was hotter than kind. But the Great Frederick had his charlatanry. He did, in fact, run away from his first battle?

Even Carlyle will find it impossible to make a hero a hero precious to mankind. A wonderful, instructive and often repulsive chapter of history in his life would be wonderfully Carlyle's theme. But the heart does not warm to the friend of Voltaire, the military philosopher of Sans Souci, the wish and not the soldier. He was a Baltic, prodigious feature in the luckless century, as Carlyle thinks it, which he lived and shaped on the map of the world. But the sweet, great, human traits and tenderness we seek in vain.

In the Life of Napoleon, writing in the royal palace, there is a wax figure of old Frederick standing in the armor and clothes he wore, with its three-cornered hat and cane. These are the poignant than Vernet's. It is not easy to find fine writing now in the days of newspapers and pamphlets on those pages, and especially in the last volume. We may compare the battle work of a century ago with that of the day, and the former is the more engaging; and with so terrible a commentary of living fact before us as that of the war, it is strange if these is the same earnest tone with which we regard our own fight. To a historian, who is also a man, like Carlyle, the battle of Hochkirch must have special sanctity, for it is shot either for or aginst Frederick. But the battle of Bull Run is the story of men and affairs, but we can not deny his rapt interest and earnestness with ours.

There is plenty of time for us all who have the opportunity to read this book and reflect upon it. We shall need another years of faithful labor and research among the most unpromising and dead materials, and it is the work of one of the great thinkers and thinkers of the time, before a man some affect to sneer, but whose mark upon the literature and mind of his country is greater than that of any of his contemporaries.

HONORS EASY.

"MY DEAR MR. LOUNGER, will you be kind enough to tell me whether the bill prohibiting slavery in the Territories was brought in by Mr. Wilson, or did he merely report it from the Committee? And can you give me the words of the Act? Truly yours,

"INQUIRER."

The bill was drawn and introduced by Isaac N. Arnold, the representative in Congress from the district of Illinois—a personal friend and supporter of the President, a true, calm, clear, constitutional and sub-very man. It was reported to a committee, and after some unimportant alterations it was reported by Mr. Wilson, Chairman.

Of course it is only an Act of Congress, and may be repealed. But it can not be repealed until the rebellion is crushed, and by no one else may be objected. And it is the duty of all loyal, patriotic, and humane men, and Christians to see that the great victory of Liberty over Slavery is maintained until it is an integral a fact of history as the Protestant Reformation.

The words of the Act are these:

"To the end that freedom may be and remain forever the fundamental law of the land in all places answerable so far as it lies within the power or depends upon the action of the Government of the United States to secure the blessing,

"Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this Act there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in any of the Territories of the United States now existing, or which may at any time hereafter be formed or acquired by the United States, except as the punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted."

This is the bill of Mr. Arnold, of Illinois. It is the re-enactment of Jefferson's proposition for the Northwest Territory of 1784, the watchword of American Liberty, and the future union and peace and grandeur of the country. Compare it and its consequences with Mr. Clingman's "Resolutions" and its consequences! Which, honestly considered, promises the most permanent peace? Which would a man wish to tell his grandchildren that he voted for?

COURAGE.

IN the draft debate upon the invasion of the North, which was the deliberate confession of the rebel Congress on the 15th of September, Mr. Miles of South Carolina, said a very good thing: "I believe it is the true policy of war to strike wherever you find a weak point within your own limits or on the soil of the enemy."

That was also the opinion of Oliver Cromwell, who said that "weak counsel and weak action ruin all." He was weak in neither. The consequence was, that he conquered in England, Ireland, and Scotland, and although his commonwealth form of government fell, he secured forever and for all Englishmen the civil rights for which John Hampden contended.

If the Government of the United States would take a final leave of weak counsels and weak actions it would simultaneously take leave of disaster and defeat. Mr. Seward, for instance, is a scholar. How does he think conciliation would have worked in Ireland? How would it have answered in Scotland? Instead of the way of conciliation, Cromwell took that of Tredar and Dunbar. And consequently life, rights, expense of every kind, and untold delays and disasters were saved.

No man advises massacres or murders in waging war. But to prevent them, strike when you strike, don't pat. When you have read your riot act, and have summoned rioters to disperse before your loaded muskets, give them time to go. If they stay and threaten and you still wish to be merciful, fire into them, not over them. Every bullet that you fire over the heads of the enemy kills ten of your own men before it is spent. Napoleon knew that, and never fired until he meant to hit.

In the droll debate at Richmond Mr. Ayer, another Carolina comedian, said that "Mirabeau, the French philosopher, declared that the only way to conduct a successful revolution was to dare, to dare again, and still to dare." The Southern statesmen are very proud of their literature, and of their general superiority to the mud-sills of the North, but Mr. Ayer must rub up his history a little. Mirabeau was an orator, not a philosopher; and Mirabeau did not say it. It was the speech of Danton, a very different person—an appropriate authority for Mr. Ayer to quote in a rebel Congress. Mr. Ayer will not forget how and where Danton ended, after his dare, and dare, and dare. He had his head cut off by those who dared a little more than he.

Yet, whoever says it, victory belongs to vigor, and vigor comes from conviction, and conviction makes all methods clear and easy Let the Government understand the conviction of the nation and follow its wishes, and a victory which settles the war will be the result.

GO!

I'LL pray for thee, I'll pray for thee, my noble-hearted son!
Go forth and fight for Liberty until the cause is won.
It may seem strange a while to miss thy comfort and thy care,
But now our army calls for aid, and thou art needed there.

I'll pray for thee, I'll pray for thee, go forth upon thy way:
A mother's love shall follow thee, and bless thee day by day.
I would not place my feeble hand before thy kindling eyes
While gazing on the altar—red with freedom's sacrifice!

No! leave me now and act thy part. Yet sometimes at the hour
When twilight shadows gather round, and gentler thoughts have power
To sway the heart, oh! think of her who hourly prays for thee;
And bind the watch-word to thy heart—the watch-word, "LIBERTY."

SPECIMENS OF BRITISH WIT AND HUMOR.

OUR old friend Punch, which used once to be so merry and genial a companion, has latterly been devoting a good deal of attention to the United States, and has sent over an agent here to procure subscriptions for the republication of its back volumes. Some of Punch's good things about this country are so bright and cheery and kindly that we have thought it would do our readers good to see a few of them, collected from half a dozen recent numbers, as models of British good humor and genial compliment. Time was when Punch was the undying foe to slavery every where. Now he says, sighing over the reduced market for British manufactures in this country:

Jonathan and Jefferson, come listen to my song—
I can't decide, upon my word, which of you is most wrong;
I do declare I am afraid to say which worse behaves,
The North imposing bonds on trade, or South that man enslaves.

PUNCH SENDS US TO ——.

The ultimate destiny manifest to mankind at large as that which is reserved for you Yankees is not that of going where all good niggers go.

WE ARE BRUTAL AND MALIGNANTLY FEROCIOUS.

I must say, friend Jonathan, to judge by the way in which you are going on, that, as regards this world at any rate, your manifest destiny—a destiny in evident course of accomplishment—is that of descending to the very lowest place. It has for some time been said that, in form and features, your people are approaching the Red Indian type, and I now find you exulting in the worst brutality of Sepoys, while you also emulate their malignant ferocity.

THE LOWEST KIND OF SAVAGES.

Jonathan, you see, you are sinking from bad to worse, from savage to lower savage, and your manifest destiny, at that rate of decadence, is the zero of humanity. But will you stop there, Jonathan?

YAHOOS, IN FACT—

Your manifest destiny, unless you return to reason, is all of you to be turned to apes with foreheads villainous low. You will be up a tree indeed, holding on with your feet as well as your hands, like the other quadrumana. Already, Jonathan, you have morally subsided to the undermost moral level. Take care you don't physically degenerate into a Yahoo.

COWARDS,

Woman is the Englishman's friend, the American's doll. Poor Dolly, she is ruthlessly smashed the moment she even winks derision. But how do the brave but susceptible Northerners treat men who manifest similar contempt? General Banks runs away from them—gives them the cut direct. Perhaps this is almost as safe a course as General Butler's.

BLUNDERERS,

The Orleans Princes avowedly went out to learn the art of war, and they found their teachers the most helpless blunderers that ever undertook what they could not perform. It was due to their own character to leave as soon as they discovered how they had been swindled.

AND RUFFIANS.

In addition to this, the Orleans Princes are gentlemen, and it must have been odious to them to remain in a service where the boldest lying instead of the boldest fighting was in demand, and where it was possible for them to have come under the orders of a ruffian. These Princes have certainly not lessened their claims to the respect of their countrymen by quitting a service from which they retired as soon as they were completely convinced that they could study little but blunder, braggadocio, and brutality.

BUTLER IS A SEPOY.

General Butler made a law,
And a proclamation,
On his head which fails to draw
Yankee execration;
If New Orleans ladies were
To his troops uncivil,
That they should serve the saucy fair
Like the Social Evil.
Yankee doodle doodle doo,
Yankee doodle dandy,
Butler is a rare Yahoo,
As brave as Sepoy Pandy.

POPE COMMANDS BURGLARS AND THIEVES;

The forces of General Pope had better be organized by distribution into divisions, each destined to carry out a special operation. One squad of these scoundrels, selected for service requiring the muscular strength of powerful ruffians, might be formed into a brigade under the denomination of Heavy Burglars; while another set of thieves, designed for nimbler depredations, might take the name of Light Prigs. There might also be a scientific corps of Pickers and Stealers, capable, doubtless, of stealing any thing but a march on the enemy; but particularly expeditious in stealing away.

LIKEWISE RAGAMUFFINS.

It is not probable that any of General Pope's villains march wide between the legs, because, under the present humane conditions of penal discipline, none of them could have been accustomed to have gyves on. There is doubtless more than a shirt and a half in each company of them, because, if they heretofore wanted underclothing, by this time we may be sure that they have found linen enough on every hedge. It is devoutly to be hoped that Pope will soon have led his ragamuffins where they are peppered.

WE ARE NOT CONQUERING,

The habeas corpus has been suspended in the North, the Press is gagged, and the Federal States are trying to reduce the Confederates to subjection. But to accomplish this end they are fighting and not conquering in a fratricidal war, spreading devastation, inflicting and suffering ruin and slaughter.

BUT VIOLATING EVERY CHRISTIAN PRINCIPLE.

The Yankees are violating every principle of Christianity. These things cost some money, but expense can be no object to a Government running up a debt which will be limited only by a panic and ultimately repudiated.

AND THIS IS THE STYLE OF OUR DISPATCHES.

"Camp, Chickabiddy Chokee, Monday afternoon.—The Federal troops have won another splendid victory. Seeing that the rebels were approaching in great force at 6 A.M. this morning, I issued my directions for a general advance, an order which our brave fellows were prompt to carry out. The advance was made in the identical direction as that in which the rebel army were proceeding, and was achieved, I need not say, with the most complete success. Astonishing to say, the whole of our front line escaped without a hurt; and with the exception of a few slight wounds and bruises in the rear, I really have no casualties worth mention to report. A good deal of our baggage and some few hundred stand of arms we left upon the field for a strategic purpose, and we likewise abandoned about a score of field-pieces which were found to impede the rapid movement of our troops."

BOTH SIDES ARE ROGUES.

When rogues fall out, our fathers said,
True men come by their own.
That proverb's now, by fact quite dead
Against it, overthrown.
Lo, North and South the Sword have drawn
And meet with bayonets crossed!
And our supply of cotton's gone,
Our weavers' living lost.

WE MURDER THE QUEEN'S ENGLISH.

The Yankees are always blustering loudly about going to war with England. We should regret it for more reasons than one, should such a wicked calamity ever occur, and frankly because (to mention only one of our many reasons) we should be frightened, inasmuch as we never had five minutes' conversation with a Yankee yet, without coming away with the painful conviction of what a rare adept he was in murdering the Queen's English!

ARE WORSE THAN GOG AND MAGOG.

Ridiculous, wooden, repelling, unnatural as they may be, still against Gog and Magog, I would back the American Demagogue to go in and win!

IMBECILE DRUNKARDS,

This furious fool (Cassius Clay) resembles nothing ever heard in England out of Bedlam, except the noisy truculent drivel of a violent imbecile drunkard, in a paroxysm of delirium tremens, belching frantic impotent abuse in the tap-room of a low public house.

DRUNKEN BLACKGUARDS,

Only a drunken Yankee blackguard could abuse and blaspheme England in return for the romantic generosity with which she has abstained from supplying the South with the ships and the weapons which were all that they wanted for the swift discomfiture of Yankeedom.

AND LIARS.

Cassius M. Clay may pass for a stump orator; but it was evidently from no stump that he howled his false nonsense. He must have been rolling in the kennel or sprawling on the ground; it is clear that he was unable to stand or go, manifest that he was lying.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

WASHINGTON, Monday, September 22.

By the President of the United States of America:

A PROCLAMATION.

I, ABRAHAM LINCOLN, President of the United States of America, and Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy thereof, do hereby proclaim and declare, that hereafter, as heretofore, the war will be prosecuted for the object of practically restoring the constitutional relation between the United States and the people thereof in which States that relation is or may be suspended or disturbed; that it is my purpose, upon the next meeting of Congress, to again recommend the adoption of a practical measure tendering pecuniary aid to the free acceptance or rejection of all the Slave States so called, the people whereof may not then be in rebellion against the United States, and which States may then have voluntarily adopted, or thereafter may voluntarily adopt, the immediate or gradual abolishment of Slavery within their respective limits; and that the efforts to colonize persons of African descent with their consent, upon the continent or elsewhere, with the previously obtained consent of the Governments existing there, will be continued.

That on the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, all persons held as slaves within any State, or any designated part of a State, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States shall be then, thenceforward, and forever, free; and the Executive Government of the United States, including the military and naval authority thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of such persons, and will do no act or acts to repress such persons, or any of them, in any efforts they may make for their actual freedom.

That the Executive will, on the first day of January aforesaid, by proclamation, designate the States and parts of States, if any, in which the people thereof, respectively, shall then be in rebellion against the United States; and the fact that any State, or the people thereof, shall on that day be in good faith represented in the Congress of the United States by members chosen thereto at elections wherein a majority of the qualified voters of such State shall have participated, shall, in the absence of strong countervailing testimony, be deemed conclusive evidence that such State and the people thereof have not been in rebellion against the United States.

That attention is hereby called to an act of Congress entitled "An act to make an additional article of war," approved March 13, 1862, and which act is in the words and figure following:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That hereafter the following shall be promulgated as an additional article of war for the government of the army of the United States, and shall be obeyed and observed as such.

ARTICLE—All officers or persons in the military or naval service of the United States are prohibited from employing any of the forces under their respective commands for the purpose of returning fugitives from service or labor who may have escaped from any person to whom such service or labor is claimed to be due, and any officer who shall be found guilty by a Court-Martial of violating this article shall be dismissed from the service.

SECTION 2. And be it further enacted, that this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Also to the ninth and tenth sections of an act entitled, "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, and which sections are in the words and figures following:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That all slaves of persons who shall hereafter be engaged in rebellion against the Government of the United States, or who shall, in any way, give aid or comfort thereto, escaping from such persons and taking refuge within the lines of the army, and all slaves captured from such persons or deserted by them and coming under the control of the Government of the United States, and all slaves of such persons found on (or being within) any place occupied by rebel forces and afterward occupied by the forces of the United States, shall be deemed captures of war and shall be forever free of their servitude and not again held as slaves.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That no slave escaping into any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, from any of the States, shall be delivered up, or in any way impeded or hindered of his liberty, except for crime or some offense against the laws, unless the person claiming said fugitive shall first make oath that the person to whom the labor or service of such fugitive is alleged to be due is his lawful owner, and has not been in arms against the United States in the present rebellion, nor in any way given aid and comfort thereto, and no person engaged in the military or naval service of the United States shall, under any pretense whatever, assume to decide on the validity of the claim of any person to the service or labor of any other person, or surrender up any such person to the claimant, on pain of being dismissed from the service.

And I do hereby enjoin upon and order all persons engaged in the military and naval service of the United States, to observe, obey, and enforce, within their respective spheres of service, the act and sections above recited.

And the Executive will in due time recommend that all citizens of the United States who shall have remained loyal thereto throughout the rebellion, shall (upon the restoration of the constitutional relation between the United States and their respective States and people, if the relation shall have been suspended or disturbed), be compensated for all losses by acts of the United States, including the loss of slaves.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington, this Twenty-second day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two, and of the Independence of the United States the eighty-seventh.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

By the President.
WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

EXPULSION OF THE REBELS FROM MARYLAND

Last week we announced that Jackson had recrossed the Potomac, and that a great battle would probably be fought on 17th. It was fought accordingly on that day, near the little stream named Antietam, and resulted in a victory for the Union troops. We give some details of the battle, with several illustrations, on pages 632, 633, and 634. The day after the battle our army was busily engaged in burying the dead and caring for the wounded on both sides. Meanwhile, on 18th, the rebels succeeded in crossing the river back into Virginia. By daylight on the morning of 19th they had all got across, though General Pleasanton with his cavalry harassed their rear, and took many prisoners and stores. On the evening of 19th some of our troops went forward on a reconnoissance, and crossed the river at the ford near Shepherdstown. They were stoutly resisted by the rebels, but succeeded in retiring to the Maryland side, bringing four pieces of the rebel artillery with them. On 20th another reconnoissance into Virginia was made by General Barnes, with his own and a portion of General Sykes's brigade. Shortly after our troops had been placed in position the enemy emerged from under the cover of woods with a line of infantry nearly a mile long. Both forces soon engaged, when the order was given to retire, which was done in good order, the enemy following closely behind. When they came within range fire was opened by twenty pieces of our artillery, posted on the Maryland bank, with such effect that they were forced to retire out of reach. Their loss must have been heavy, as the explosions of our shells were seen to make large gaps in their ranks. Our loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners was about one hundred and fifty. The troops safely returned to Maryland, bringing their wounded with them.

A RECONNOISSANCE TO THOROUGHFARE GAP.

A detachment of the 2d Pennsylvania cavalry made a reconnoissance on 18th from Washington in the direction of Thoroughfare Gap, and returned on 19th with 32 rebel prisoners, and a number of wagons and ambulances on their way to Richmond. The country around them was clear of rebels and undefended. Three of the prisoners belonged to the body-guard of the rebel General Ewell, who narrowly escaped capture, having left only a short time previous to the arrival of our cavalry. The General was wounded, and is on his way back to Richmond.

THE REBELS FALLING BACK IN KENTUCKY.

The news from Cincinnati states that the rebels were falling back from Florence, Kentucky, on 17th, and at last accounts were between Demassville and Falmouth, having destroyed the bridges on the Covington and Lexington Railroad in their way. A scouting party of 53 of the 10th Kentucky cavalry engaged 100 rebels near Florence on 17th, and killed five, wounded seven, and routed the remainder. Our loss was one killed and one wounded.

It is supposed that Bragg, Kirby Smith, and H. Marshall are uniting their forces.

THREATENED ATTACK ON LOUISVILLE

It is reported from Louisville that a portion of General Buell's forces attacked and defeated Bragg's rear-guard at Horse Cave on 18th, and that Bragg was reported subsequently to have moved the main body of his army across the river southward from Munfordsville. It appears, however, by another dispatch from Louisville, that, instead of moving southward, Bragg moved northward toward Louisville, eluding General Buell, and getting several hours the start of him. The greatest excitement existed in Louisville in consequence, and General Nelson, who is in command there, immediately commenced preparations to defend the city to the last, giving notice to the inhabitants to be ready to remove the women and children at once. Most of the stores were closed, and an attack was apprehended within forty-eight hours.

THE NEW ARMY CORPS.

The reorganized army corps are now commanded as follows: 1st—Major-General Joseph Hooker, born in Massachusetts, appointed from California; 2d—Major-General Edwin V. Sumner, born in Massachusetts, appointed from New York; 3d—Major-General Samuel P. Heintzelman, born in Pennsylvania, appointed from the same State; 4th—Major-General Erasmus D. Keyes, born in Massachusetts, appointed from Maine; 5th—Major-General Fitz John Porter, born in New Hampshire, appointed from the District of Columbia. 6th—Major-General William B. Franklin, born in Pennsylvania, appointed from the same State; 7th—Major-General John A. Dix, born in New Hampshire, appointed from New York; 8th—Major-General John E. Wool, born in New York, appointed from the same State; 9th—Major-General Ambrose E. Burnside, born in Indiana, appointed from Rhode Island; 10th—Major-General Ormsby M. Mitchell, born in Kentucky, appointed from New York; 11th—Major-General John Sedgwick, born in Connecticut, appointed from the same State; 12th—Major-General Franz Sigel, born in Germany, appointed from Missouri.

ANOTHER CRUISE OF THE "ESSEX."

The gun-boat Essex, Commodore Porter, has made another expedition up the river. On reaching Natchez, the Essex sent a boat's crew ashore for ice. This boat was fired upon and several men were wounded, whereupon Commodore Porter threw shot and shell into Natchez for two hours and a half, when the town surrendered. Coming down the river, the Commodore stopped at Bayou Sara, a celebrated haunt of guerrillas, sent men ashore, and burned all but two houses—so there's an end of Bayou Sara. Further down the river, a battery of 84 guns opened on the Essex, and a fierce battle, at not more than 80 feet distance, began, which lasted an hour. The rebel battery was mounted with guns of very heavy calibre; but that circumstance only sufficed to prove the remarkable powers of resistance of the Essex. Her iron sides were struck in a multitude of places with 10-inch and other sized balls, the result in all cases being the same—a slight indentation into the sides of the steamer, and then the balls breaking into a thousand fragments and falling harmlessly into the water. The Essex commenced with the upper gun and silenced them all, one after the other.

FAILURE OF THE REBEL EXPEDITION TO NEW MEXICO.

We hear of the annihilation of the rebel force under General Sibley in New Mexico. After the capture of Santa Fé, some time since, the rebels started back toward El Paso. We last heard of them at Fort Craig. Near Fort Fillmore Sibley was caught between the New Mexican troops under General Canby and the new troops from California; result—a perfect smash of the rebels, who lost horses, arms, cannon, stores, and sutler's trains, a great many killed and wounded, and half their original force taken prisoners. The survivors were so much exasperated that they assassinated General Sibley and Colonel Steele during their retreat. The Union forces, immediately after the fight, took possession of El Paso and Fort Bliss, near by, and sent a detachment to Camp Quitman, 80 miles east of El Paso. Thereupon the Texans evacuated Fort Davis, 200 miles east of El Paso, and all the other forts in the extreme northwest of the State—Fort Clark, 120 miles from San Antonio, now being the nearest fort to El Paso held by the Texans.

A NAVAL OFFICER DISMISSED.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Sept. 20, 1862

Commander George Henry Preble, senior officer in command of the blockading force off Mobile, having been guilty of neglect of duty in permitting the armed steamer Oreto to run the blockade, thereby not only disregarding Article 3d, Section 10th of the Articles of War (which requires an officer to do his utmost to overtake and capture or destroy every vessel which it is his duty to encounter), but omitting the plainest ordinary duty committed to an officer, is, by order of the President, dismissed from the naval service from this date. The commander of each vessel of war, on the day after the receipt of this published general order, will cause it to be read on the quarter-deck at general muster, together with the accompanying reports, and enter both upon the vessel's log.

GIDEON WELLES, Secretary of the Navy.

A STATEMENT FROM MRS. M'CLELLAN.

The following letter has been published:

To the Editor of the Hartford Courant:

At the dépôt in New Haven I was introduced by my friend Mr. W. to Mrs. M'Clellan. I found her to be an intelligent young woman, having with her a sweet infant, which was almost smothered by the caresses of a number of soldiers who had learned that she was a young M'Clellan. On my way to this city, in the cars, through the politeness of her aunt, Mrs. A., I enjoyed the pleasure of some conversation with her. She was very affable, and seemed to take an interest in the fact that a nephew of mine, the colonel of a New York regiment, who recently died of disease contracted before Richmond, was a class-mate at West Point of her husband. She seemed much elated with the recent news. She said that when her husband was appointed Major-General she was not much affected by it; but now, that he has been restored to his command, and had accomplished such a triumph, after all that had been done to degrade him, she acknowledged she felt proud. I replied that she had a perfect right to feel so. She said that her husband had undertaken this last service with great reluctance, but it had been pressed upon him with an assurance that he should not be interfered with. I remarked to her that at first I felt great confidence in her husband, which afterward I had, to a certain extent, lost; but that I had, previous to his last success, regained it. She said the same observation had been made by others. I told her I thought the General had not done justice to himself, in not explaining to the public circumstances which looked unfavorable to him. "Do you not think," said she, "that it was more patriotic in him to bear his wrongs in silence, rather than to trouble the Government, as some others have done, with demands for investigations and courts-martial, when the delays caused by them would be injurious to the country? The General," she remarked, "when the clouds covering him were of the darkest hue, had faith that God would yet make him an instrument of good to the cause of his country."

MORE REBEL CHIVALRY.

A few days since one of Commodore Farragut's men was tied to a tree and disemboweled by a party of Mississippians, who captured him while wandering to the shore, near the gun-boats, in the neighborhood of Vicksburg. A party of rebels recently visited a house on Pawpaw Island, ten miles below Vicksburg, and demanded food for themselves in the name of the Confederacy. The only occupant of the house was an old woman eighty years of age, who gave them the dinner they desired, but told them they were trying to break up one of the best Governments in the world, and that they could never form another as good. She begged them to disperse and go to their homes, and cease to annoy the people of the region around. The ruffians became enraged at her words, and after numerous threats against every friend of the Union, they deliberately carried her out of the house and hung her upon a tree before her own door.

THE MAINE ELECTION.

Returns of the election for Governor in Maine have been received from three hundred and eighty-four towns. The result, as compared with the vote in the same towns last year, is as follows:

	1862.	1861.
Republican	42,913	53,316
War Democratic	6,738	19,818
Peace Democratic	30,466	18,072

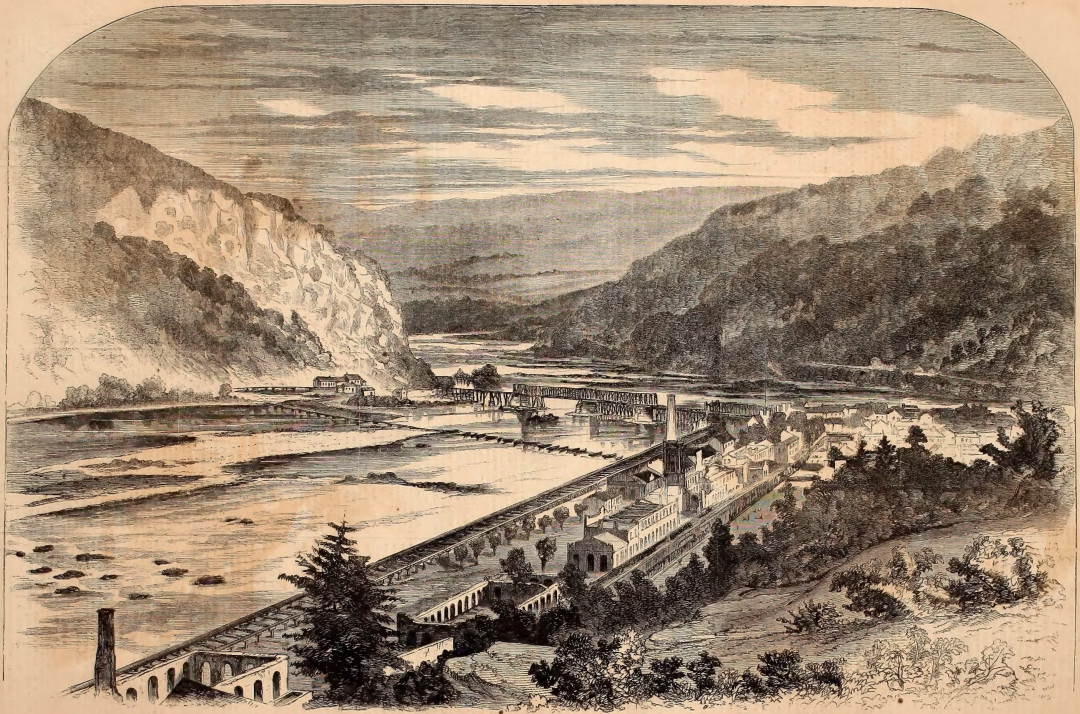
FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

COURT CIRCULAR.

THE London Herald of the 2d inst. says: "Mr. Mason, the Commissioner from the Southern Confederacy, is at present paying a visit to Scotland. On Thursday he was at Glasgow, and on Friday proceeded to Glenquoich, the residence of the Right Hon. Edward Ellice. He had previously been the guest of Mr. Stewart, of Murdostoun Castle."

ITALY.



GARIBALDI'S PROSPECTS.

Garibaldi's wound is said to be of a serious nature. He asks to be placed on board an English vessel. No documents or money were found at the place of his defeat. No decision had been come to with regard to his trial. The people of Italy are in favor of a general amnesty.

BERMUDA.

MORE PRIZES TO BE TAKEN.

It appears that there are now lying in the port of St. George no less than five "Anglo-Confederate" steamers awaiting a chance to give aid to the rebels, but apparently in a quandary as to their future movements. One of them, the Minho, arrived from Charleston with cotton for Liverpool, but was out of coal, and had to burn her bulwarks and mainmast for fuel.

HARPER'S FERRY.

We give, on the preceding page, a view of Harper's Ferry, which was surrendered to the rebels by Colonel Miles on 15th. Skirmishing commenced on the Maryland Heights on Thursday afternoon, 11th, continuing three hours. The battle was renewed again on Friday morning, at daybreak. Our forces held their ground until about noon, when, being flanked on the left, they were compelled to fall back to the large guns. Not long afterward these were spiked, and the whole command retreated down the mountain. On Sunday the enemy commenced a fierce cannonading from the Maryland and Loudon Heights, which was replied to by our forces. It continued until sunset, our guns holding their own in fine style. During Sunday night the rebels planted more guns, and in the morning opened in all directions upon our forces, drawn up in line of battle on Bolivar Heights. It appeared to the officers commanding useless to contend against such overwhelming odds, and the white flag was raised at twenty minutes past 7 o'clock. A few moments later Colonel Miles was struck by a piece of shell, which carried away his left thigh. The commands which surrendered were:

Colonel Downey, Third Maryland Home Brigade	600
Colonel Maloney, First Maryland Home Brigade	900
Hundred and Fifteenth New York	1000
Hundred and Twenty-sixth New York	1000
Sixty-fifth New York	600
Hundred and Eleventh New York	1000
Hundred and Twenty-fifth New York	1000
Thirty-second Ohio	600
Twelfth New York State Militia	500
Eighty-seventh Ohio	600
Ninth Vermont	800
Sixty-fifth Illinois	500
Graham's Battery	110
M'Gilvra's	115
Fifteenth Indiana	143
Phillips's New York Battery	120
Potts's Battery	100
Ripley's Battery	120
Scattered companies	50
Officers connected with Head-quarters and Commissary Department	50

The following guns were surrendered:

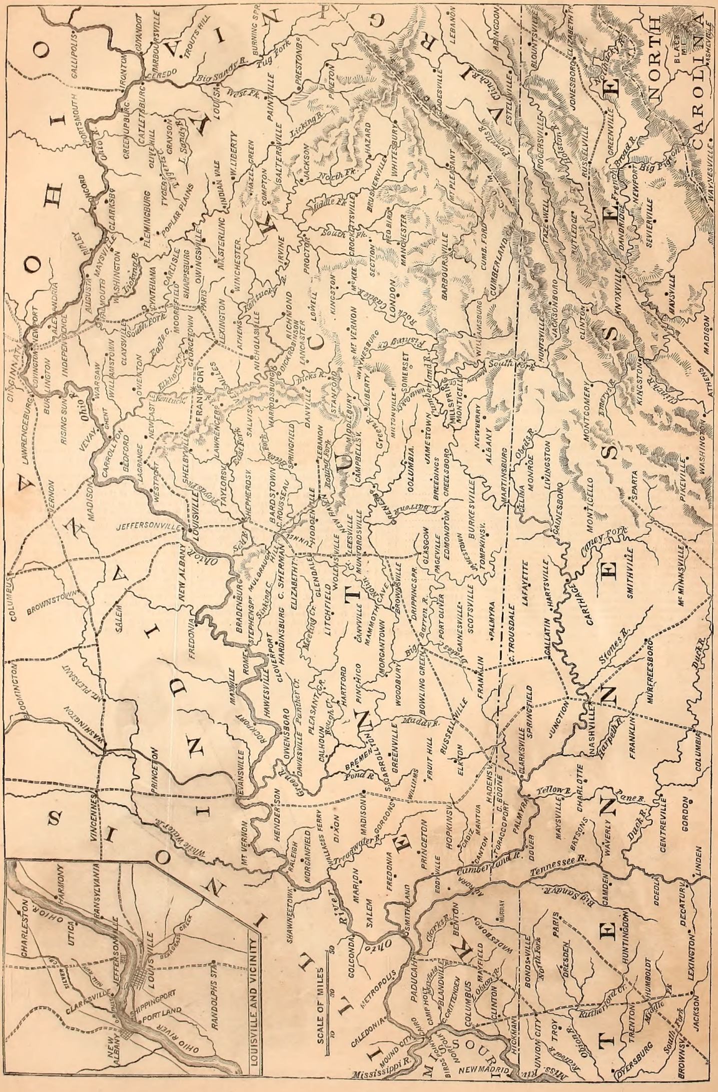
19 3-inch rifles.	4 13-pound howitzers.
6 James's rifles.	2 10-inch Dahlgrens.
6 12-pound howitzers.	1 30-pound Parrott.
4 32-pound Parrott guns.	6 6-pound guns.
6 12-pounders.

850 will cover our loss in killed and wounded.

MAJOR-GENERAL FRANKLIN.

We publish on this page, from a photograph by Brady, a portrait of MAJOR-GENERAL FRANKLIN, commander of the 6th army corps of the Army of the Potomac.

William Benjamin Franklin was born in Pennsylvania about the year 1821, and entered West Point in 1839. He graduated at the head of his class in 1843; being a classmate of Ulysses S. Grant, Reynolds, Augur, etc. On the 1st of July, 1843, he was appointed a Brevet Second Lieutenant of Topographical Engineers, and on the 21st of September, 1846, received his full commission. He served in Mexico, and was brevetted First Lieutenant for gallant and meritorious conduct at Buena Vista, dating from February 23, 1847. This brevet was awarded in May, 1848. From July 1848 to 1850 he was Acting Assistant Professor of Natural and Experimental Philosophy at the Military Academy at West Point. He was next placed on lighthouse duty, to which he was appointed in January, 1853. He received his full commission of First Lieutenant in March, 1853, and Captain on the 1st of July, 1857. In the Army Register for 1859 he was the junior captain but one in the corps, and in that of 1860 but but two. In the register for 1861 his name stands two degrees higher on the roll, there being four captains his junior. On the 14th of May, 1861, he was appointed to the colonelcy of the Twelfth United States Infantry, one of the new regular regiments organized at the commencement of the rebellion. With this rank he had charge of the first brigade of the third division of General M'Dowell's army at Bull Run.



He was appointed a Brigadier-General in July, and, on the reorganization of the army, was given the command of a division consisting of the brigades of Slocum, Kearney, and Newton, which afterward became the first division of the first army corps commanded by M'Dowell. When M'Dowell was directed to remain at Fredericksburg, Franklin was detached and sent to M'Clellan on the peninsula. No officer was higher distinction than he in the memorable contests on the march to Richmond, and as a reward for his gallantry he was appointed to the command of an army corps with the rank of Major-General of Volunteers. He has lately won fresh laurels at the battles of South Mountain and Sharpsburg.

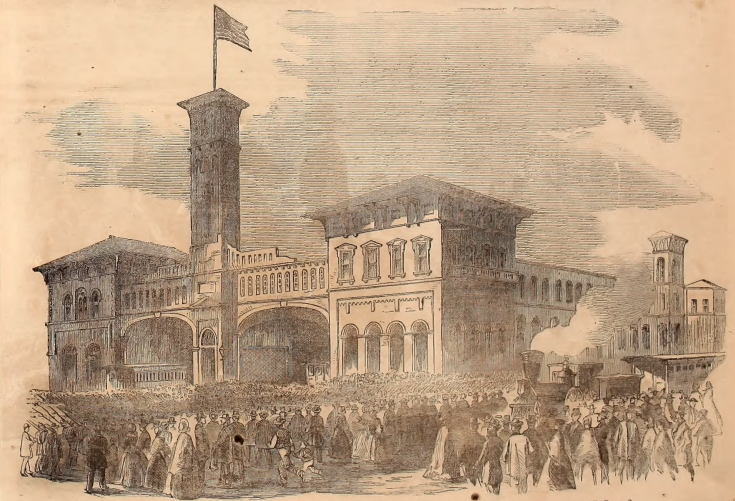
THE CAPITOL GROUNDS AT HARRISBURG TURNED INTO A CAMP.—[SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

AT HARRISBURG.



MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS sends us a couple of sketches from Harrisburg, which we reproduce on this page. They explain themselves. In the memory of the oldest inhabitant Harrisburg has never known such an excitement as the one which it has lately experienced. In the language of every visitor, words fail to describe the martial enthusiasm of the Pennsylvanians, or the almost countless throngs of soldiers who have filed through the State capital to take part in the defense of their State against the invader. Governor Curtin reports 75,000 Pennsylvanians under arms.

A Times correspondent says:

Recruits are constantly arriving here. From early dawn yesterday until quite late at night, every train was bringing in its patriotic freight, until we now have troops from every county in the State. Camp Curtin is crowded to overflowing; the beautiful grounds of the Capitol is one vast encampment covered with tents; the Senate and House of Representatives turned into a barracks, as well as every other room in the Capitol and public offices acquired for executive purposes. Every hotel-house is also appropriated for the same purpose, and, indeed, every available property has been seized upon as a war "depôt," the private interests have been seized upon as a war "depôt," the private interests, in the mean time, opening their doors to and lavishing their hospitality upon all the brave boys who choose to partake.

* * * * * * *

There are individual companies already here from Pittsburg and other places, each of which represents a business capital of some millions of dollars. Judges, preachers, physicians, merchants, lawyers, artists, and men of every other profession, are found side by side with the brawny and hirsute sons of physical labor, shouldering the muskets. Here is to be seen a learned Judge in the ranks, commanded by one of his own peers—there a Preacher-Captain, instructing his flock how to do battle; and there again, some merchant or boss-mechanic, led on by one who was but yesterday their poor clerk or dependent. It is romance and poetry of the highest order, clustered down to the vulgar level of everyday life.

THE CRIPPLE AT THE GATE.

LOOK! how the hoofs and wheels to-day
Scatter the dust on the broad highway,
Where Beauty, and Fashion, and Wealth, and Pride
On saddle and cushion serenely ride!
The very steeds have a conscious prance
Of pride in their elegant freight!
Love and laughter like jewels slip
From the sparkling eye and the merry lip:
You never would think that the Nation's life
Hung on the thread of a desperate strife,
Unless from these you should turn, by chance,
To the Cripple at the Gate.

Weary, and footsore, and ragged, and soiled,
Through the summer glare he has slowly toiled
Along the edge of the broad highway,
Since the early dawn of the westering day:
His rags are flecked with the dusty foam
That flew from the gilded bits
Of the champing steeds that passed him by;
And a haggard shadow is in his eye,
But it is not the gloom of an envious pain!
He has left a limb on the battle-plain,
And to win his way to his distant home
At my gate, a Beggar, he sits!

He tells me his tale in a simple way:
"I had nothing," he says, "except my pay,
And a wife and four little girls, and so
I sent all my money to them, you know!
When I lost my limb, Sir—but that I'm lame,
I do not complain, for, you see,
'Tis the fortune of war, and it might be worse;
And I'd lose the other to stop the curse
Of this terrible strife! But I meant to say,
When I left the hospital t'other day,
I did think I had a kind of a claim
To be sent to my village free.

"Don't you think it hard yourself, Sir? True,
There's a hundred dollars of bounty due
In three years, or when the war's ended; but how Long may that be—can you tell me now?
I did not enlist for bounty, I trust—
My conscience I never have sold;
But how does it look for a soldier to 'tramp,'
Begging his way like a vagabond scamp,
From the fields where he often risked his life,
To the home where he left his babes and wife,
In a uniform made of tatters and dust
Instead of the 'blue and gold?'

"Whose fault this is, Sir, I do not know,"
Said the wayworn man as he rose to go;
"But of this, alas! I am sure—the sight
Of a soldier returning in such a plight
To the home whence, a few short months ago,
He marched in a gallant band,
With music, and banners, and shining steel
Will dull more ears to the battle-peal,
And cause more bosoms with doubt to swell,
Than the secret traitor's deadliest spell.
Don't you see yourself, Sir, it must be so?"
And he sighed as I held out my hand.

Lofty carriage and low coupé
Still whirl the dust on the broad highway;
Beauty, and Fashion, and Wealth, and Pride
Still through the roseate twilight ride,
With love, and laughter, and prancing steed,
As if Pleasure were all life's fate.
But I gaze no more on the joyous train,
For my eye is fixed with a steadfast strain
On the tattered soldier's halting stride,
Till his tall form sinks down the dark hill-side;
Then I cry, "Thank God! he hath now no need
To beg at the stranger's gate!"

THE BATTLE OF ANTIETAM.

ON pages 632 and 633 we publish illustrations of the great BATTLE OF ANTIETAM, which was fought on 17th September. We subjoin, by way of explanation to the pictures, the following extracts from the graphic letter of the Tribune correspondent:

The battle began with the dawn. Morning found both armies just as they had slept, almost close enough to look into each other's eyes. The left of Meade's reserves and the right of Ricketts's line became engaged at nearly the same moment, one with artillery, the other with infantry. A battery was almost immediately pushed forward beyond the central woods, over a plowed field, near the top of the slope where the corn-field began. On this open field, in the corn beyond, and in the woods, which stretched forward into the broad fields like a promontory into the ocean, were the hardest and deadliest struggles of the day.

For half an hour after the battle had grown to its full strength the line of fire swayed neither way. Hooker's men were fully up to their work. They saw their General every where in front, never away from the fire, and all the troops believed in their commander, and fought with a will. Two-thirds of them were the same men who, under M'Dowell, had broken at Manassas.

The half hour passed, the rebels began to give way a little, only a little, but at the first indication of a receding fire, Forward! was the word, and on went the line with a cheer and a rush. Back across the corn-field, leaving dead and wounded behind them, over the fence, and across the road, and then back again into the dark woods which closed around them, went the retreating rebels.

Meade and his Pennsylvanians followed hard and fast—followed till they came within easy range of the woods, among which they saw their beaten enemy disappearing—followed still, with another cheer, and flung themselves against the cover.

But out of those gloomy woods came suddenly and heavily terrible volleys—volleys which smote, and bent, and broke in a moment that eager front, and hurled them swiftly back for half the distance they had won. Not swiftly, nor in panic, any further. Closing up their shattered lines, they came slowly away—a regiment where a brigade had been, hardly a brigade where a whole division had been, victorious. They had met from the woods the first volleys of musketry from fresh troops—had met them and returned them till their line had yielded and gone down before the weight of fire, and till their ammunition was exhausted.

In ten minutes the fortune of the day seemed to have changed—it was the rebels now who were advancing, pouring out of the woods in endless lines, sweeping through the corn-field from which their comrades had just fled. Hooker sent in his nearest brigade to meet them, but it could not do the work. He called for another. There was nothing close enough, unless he took it from his right. His right might be in danger if it was weakened, but his centre was already threatened with annihilation. Not hesitating one moment, he sent to Doubleday, "Give me your best brigade instantly."

The best brigade came down the hill to the right on the run, went through the timber in front through a storm of shot and bursting shell and crashing limbs, over the open field beyond, and straight into the corn-field, passing as they went the fragments of three brigades shattered by the rebel fire, and streaming to the rear. They passed by Hooker, whose eyes lighted as he saw these veteran troops led by a soldier whom he knew he could trust. "I think they will hold it," he said.

General Hartsuff took his troops very steadily, but now that they were under fire, not hurriedly, up the hill, from which the corn-field begins to descend, and formed them on the crest. Not a man who was not in full view—not one who bent before the storm. Firing at first in volleys, they fired them at will with wonderful rapidity and effect. The whole line crowned the hill and stood out darkly against the sky, but lighted and shrouded ever in flame and smoke. There were the Twelfth and Thirteenth Massachusetts, and another regiment which I can not remember—old troops all of them.

There for half an hour they held the ridge, unyielding in purpose, exhaustless in courage. There were gaps in the line, but it nowhere quailed. Their General was wounded badly early in the fight, but they fought on. Their supports did not come—they determined to win without them. They began to go down the hill and into the corn; they did not stop to think that their ammunition was nearly gone; they were there to win that field, and they won it. The rebel line for the second time fled through the corn and into the woods. I can not tell how few of Hartsuff's brigade were left when the work was done, but it was done. There was no more gallant, determined, heroic fighting in all this desperate day. General Hartsuff is very severely wounded, but I do not believe he counts his success too dearly purchased.

After describing the progress of the fight, the wounding of Hooker, the command devolving upon Sumner, the advance of Sedgwick, and finally the abandonment of the corn-field after a terrible struggle, he thus describes the SUCCESSFUL ATTACK BY FRANKLIN.

At 1 o'clock affairs on the right had a gloomy look. Hooker's troops were greatly exhausted, and their General away from the field. Mansfield's were no better. Sumner's command had lost heavily, but two of his divisions were still comparatively fresh. Artillery was yet playing vigorously in front, though the ammunition of many of the batteries was entirely exhausted, and they had been compelled to retire.

Doubleday held the right inflexibly. Sumner's headquarters were now in the narrow field where, the night before, Hooker had begun the fight. All that had been gained in front had been lost! The enemy's batteries, which, if advanced and served vigorously, might have made sad work with the closely-massed troops, were fortunately either partially disabled or short of ammunition. Sumner was confident that he could hold his own, but another advance was out of the question. The enemy, on the other hand, seemed to be too much exhausted to attack.

At this crisis Franklin came up with fresh troops and formed on the left. Slocum, commanding one division of the corps, was sent forward along the slopes lying under the first ranges of rebel hills, while Smith, commanding the other division, was ordered to retake the corn-fields and woods which all day had been so hotly contested. It was done in the handsomest style. His Maine and Vermont regiments and the rest went forward on the run, and, cheering as they went, swept like an avalanche through the corn-fields, fell upon the woods, cleared them in ten minutes, and held them. They were not again retaken.

The field and its ghastly harvest which the reaper had gathered in those fatal hours remained finally with us. Four times it had been lost and won. The dead are strewn so thickly that as you ride over it you can not guide your horse's steps too carefully. Pale and bloody faces are every where upturned. They are sad and terrible, but there is nothing which makes one's heart beat so quickly as the imploring look of sorely wounded men who beckon wearily for help which you can not stay to give.

Our main picture represents

BURNSIDE HOLDING THE HILL.

This the Tribune correspondent thus describes:

At 4 o'clock, M'Clellan sent simultaneous orders to Burnside and Franklin; to the former to advance and carry the batteries in his front at all hazards and any cost; to the latter to carry the woods next in front of him to the right, which the rebels still held. The order to Franklin, however, was practically countermanded, in consequence of a message from General Sumner that if Franklin went on and was repulsed his own corps was not yet sufficiently reorganized to be depended on as a reserve.

* * * * * * *

Burnside obeyed the order most gallantly. Getting his troops well in hand, and sending a portion of his artillery to the front, he advanced them with rapidity and the most determined vigor, straight up the hill in front, on top of which the rebels had maintained their most dangerous battery. The movement was in plain view of M'Clellan's position, and as Franklin on the other side sent his batteries into the field about the same time, the battle seemed to open in all directions with greater activity than ever.

The fight in the ravine was in full progress, the batteries which Porter supported were firing with new vigor, Franklin was blazing away on the right, and every hill-top, ridge, and woods along the whole line was crested and veiled with white clouds of smoke. All day had been clear and bright since the early cloudy morning, and now this whole magnificent, unequaled scene shone with the splendor of an afternoon September sun. Four miles of battle, its glory all visible, its horrors all veiled, the fate of the Republic hanging on the hour—could any one be insensible of its grandeur?

There are two hills on the left of the road, the furthest the lowest. The rebels have batteries on both. Burnside is ordered to carry the nearest to him, which is the furthest from the road. His guns opening first from this new position in front, soon entirely controlled and silenced the enemy's artillery. The infantry came on at once, moving rapidly and steadily up, long dark lines, and broad dark masses, being plainly visible without a glass as they moved over the green hill-side.

The next moment the road in which the rebel battery was planted was canopied with clouds of dust swiftly descending into the valley. Underneath was a tumult of wagons, guns, horses, and men flying at speed down the road. Blue flashes of smoke burst now and then among them, a horse or a man or half dozen went down, and then the whirlwind swept on.

The hill was carried, but could it be held? The rebel columns, before seen moving to the left, increased their pace. The guns, on the hill above, sent an angry tempest of shell down among Burnside's guns and men. He had formed his columns apparently in the near angles of two fields bordering the road—high ground about them every where except in rear.

In another moment a rebel battle-line appears on the brow of the ridge above them, moves swiftly down in the most perfect order, and though met by incessant discharges of musketry, of which we plainly see the flashes, does not fire a gun. White spaces show where men are falling, but they close up instantly, and still the line advances. The brigades of Burnside are in heavy column; they will not give way before a bayonet charge in line. The rebels think twice before they dash into these hostile masses.

There is a halt; the rebel left gives way and scatters over the field; the rest stand fast and fire. More infantry comes up; Burnside is outnumbered, flanked, compelled to yield the hill he took so bravely. His position is no longer one of attack; he defends himself with unfaltering firmness, but he sends to M'Clellan for help. M'Clellan's glass for the last half hour has seldom been turned away from the left.

He sees clearly enough that Burnside is pressed—needs no messenger to tell him that. His face grows darker with anxious thought. Looking down into the valley where 15,000 troops are lying, he turns a half-questioning look on Fitz John Porter, who stands by his side, gravely scanning the field. They are Porter's troops below, are fresh, and only impatient to share in this fight. But Porter slowly shakes his head, and one may believe that the same thought is passing through the minds of both generals: "They are the only reserves of the army; they can not be spared."

M'CLELLAN TO THE RESCUE.

M'Clellan remounts his horse, and with Porter and a dozen officers of his staff rides away to the left in Burnside's direction. Sykes meets them on the road—a good soldier, whose opinion is worth taking. The three Generals talk briefly together. It is easy to see that the moment has come when every thing may turn on one order given or withheld, when the history of the battle is only to be written in thoughts and purposes and words of the General.

Burnside's messenger rides up. His message is, "I want troops and guns. If you do not send them I can not hold my position for half an hour." M'Clellan's only answer for the moment is a glance at the western sky. Then he turns and speaks very slowly: "Tell General Burnside that this is the battle of the war. He must hold his ground till dark at any cost. I will send him Miller's battery. I can do nothing more. I have no infantry." Then, as the messenger was riding away, he called him back, "Tell him if he can not hold his ground, then the bridge, to the last man!—always the bridge! If the bridge is lost all is lost."

The sun is already down; not half an hour of daylight is left. Till Burnside's message came it had seemed plain to every one that the battle could not be finished to-day. None suspected how near was the peril of defeat, of sudden attack on exhausted forces—how vital to the safety of the army and the nation were those fifteen thousand waiting troops of Fitz John Porter in the hollow. But the rebels halted instead of pushing on; their vindictive cannonade died away as the light faded. Before it was quite dark the battle was over. Only a solitary gun of Burnside's thundered against the enemy, and presently this also ceased, and the field was still.

THE LATE GENERAL RENO.

WE publish on page 629 a portrait of the late GENERAL RENO, who was killed at the Battle of South Mountain, on 14th September. The portrait is from a photograph by Brady.

Jesse L. Reno was born in Virginia, in 1825. His family removed to Pennsylvania when he was a boy, and from that State he was appointed to West Point in 1842. He graduated in 1845, ranking seventh in a class which included Stonewall Jackson and many gallant officers of the Union army, and was appointed Brevet Second Lieutenant of Ordnance.

During the war with Mexico, 1846–'7, he commanded a howitzer battery, and for "gallant and meritorious conduct at the battle of Cerro Gordo" was brevetted First Lieutenant April 18, 1847. For bravery on the battle-field of Chapultepec, where he was wounded, he was brevetted Captain September 13, 1847. When hostilities ceased he was appointed Assistant Professor of Mathematics at West Point for six months, and was then appointed Secretary of the Board of Artillery—a position he held about eighteen months, during which he was engaged in testing the relative merits of heavy ordnance and compiling a work on heavy artillery tactics. He was subsequently connected with the Coast Survey service, and upon withdrawing went out West with a corps of Topographical Engineers, and assisted in the construction of a military road from Big Sioux to St. Paul. He was engaged in this work some twelve months, and on the 3d of March, 1853, he was promoted to a full First Lieutenancy of Ordnance. He was next (in 1854) stationed at the Frankfort Arsenal, where he remained about three years, and then accompanied General Johnston in the expedition to Utah as ordnance officer. Returning in 1859, he was ordered to the Mount Vernon Arsenal in Alabama, and recently was stationed at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas. On the 1st of July, 1860, he was promoted to a Captaincy of Ordnance, having been Senior First Lieutenant of that department for some time. He was appointed Brigadier-General of Volunteers November 12, 1861, and was subsequently ordered to report to General Burnside at Annapolis, Maryland, preparatory to taking a command in the expedition to North Carolina.

He commanded the second brigade in Burnside's army, and led the attack upon Fort Barlow, on Roanoke Island. He subsequently displayed good generalship and gallantry in the fight at Newbern. In July he was ordered to Newport News to reinforce the army of the Potomac; and subsequently to Fredericksburg. He was soon attached to the army of Virginia, and took part in the series of actions which terminated at Manassas on 1st September. When General M'Dowell was granted leave of absence he was appointed to his command, with the rank of Major-General, and led his corps against the rebels in Maryland. On the 14th inst. the rebels were attacked in their position on South Mountain, and just at the close of the fight, when the victory was won, he was killed by a sharpshooter. The Herald correspondent thus describes the manner of his death:

General Reno had been most active all day, fearing no danger and appearing to be every where at the same time. Safe up to seven o'clock, no one dreamed of such a disaster as was to happen. He, with his staff, was standing a little back of the wood on a field, the rebel forces being directly in front. A body of his troops were just before him, and at this point the fire of the rebels was directed. A Minié-ball struck him and went through his body. He fell, and, from the first, appeared to have a knowledge that he could not survive the wound that he had received. He was instantly carried with the greatest care to the rear, followed by a number of the officers, and attended by the division surgeon, Dr. Cutter. At the foot of the hill he was laid under a tree, and after a few moments the surgeon said he could not live, and he died without the least movement a few minutes after. Grief at any time is heart-rending; but such grief as was manifested by the staff officers and those about him it has never before been my lot to witness. The old soldier, just come from the scene of carnage with death staring him in the face on every side, here knelt and wept like a child. No eye was dry among those present, and many a silent and spoken resolution was made that moment that Reno's death should be amply avenged. Thus died one of the bravest generals that was in the service of his country; one of the bright gems in the crown of Burnside, and a man whom all respected and loved. The country can ill afford to lose at this trying hour such men as Kearney, Stevens, and Reno. The intelligence of his death was received by all with the greatest sorrow, as it was well known that but few could take his place. The command of the corps devolved upon General Cox, who, from that time, directed the movements of the army.

He was, indeed, one of the bravest of the brave, and one of the ablest of our generals.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL HOOKER.

WE publish on page 629, from a photograph by Brady, a portrait of GENERAL HOOKER, who was wounded at the Battle of Sharpsburg on 17th.

Brigadier-General Joseph Hooker was born in Massachusetts about the year 1817, and is consequently about 45 years of age. He entered West Point in 1833, and graduated in 1837, standing No. 28 in a class which included Generals Benham, Williams, Sedgwick, etc., of the Union army, and Generals Bragg, Mackall, and Early of the rebel forces. At the outbreak of the war with Mexico he accompanied Brigadier-General Hamer as Aid-de-camp, and was brevetted Captain for gallant conduct in several conflicts at Monterey. In March, 1847, he was appointed Assistant Adjutant-General, with the rank of Captain. At the National Bridge he distinguished himself, and was brevetted Major; and at Chapultepec he again attracted attention by his gallant and meritorious conduct, and was brevetted Lieutenant-Colonel.

At the close of the war with Mexico he withdrew from the service, and soon afterward emigrated to California. The outbreak of the rebellion found him there, and he was one of the first of the old West Pointers who offered his services to the Government. He was one of the first batch of Brigadier-Generals of Volunteers appointed by President Lincoln on 17th May, 1861; and was, on his arrival, placed in command of a brigade of the army of the Potomac, and subsequently of a division. From July, 1861, to February, 1862, he was stationed in Southern Maryland, on the north shore of the Potomac, his duty being to prevent the rebels crossing the river, and to amuse them with their river blockade while M'Clellan was getting his army into trim. This difficult duty he performed admirably.

When the army of the Potomac moved to the Peninsula, Hooker accompanied them in charge of a division. In the contest at Williamsburg his division bravely stood the brunt of the battle, the men of the Excelsior Brigade actually being mowed down as they stood up in line. At Fair Oaks the men again showed their valor, and the General his fighting qualities. In the various minor contests Hooker took his part and bravely went through with his share of the seven days' fights. When M'Clellan's army was placed under the command of General Pope, we find the names of "Fighting Joe Hooker" and the late General Kearney mentioned together in the thickest of the struggle; and now again at South Mountain and Sharpsburg he seems to have been second to no one. At the latter fight he was shot through the foot and obliged to leave the field; but for this accident, he thinks he would have driven the rebels into the Potomac.

KATE'S SOLDIER.

"IF I were only a man!"

Kate Barclay's eyes flashed with a splendid resolve, a fine blaze of courage.

"If you were, would you not do just the same as now—sit still and wish something else?"

"Why do you judge me so unkindly, Major Ross?"

The lips began to pout now, a little temper to blend with the courage in the fine eyes.

"Because you do not do what you can, even now. If you were not my cousin, I suppose I should not speak to you so plainly. As it is, it vexes me when I hear you wishing, morning, noon, and night, to be and do the impossible; and yet never trying to do what is ready to your hand. Do you think there is no better use for the money you are wasting so carelessly in satins and laces? How much was Madame Ferarra's bill last quarter?"

"Money won't fight, and Government pays the soldiers—better, I heard you say so yesterday, than any army is paid in Europe."

"Yet, by giving a little more than Government gives, I think you could hire some one, who would not go otherwise, to fight for you."

"A man whom a little more money would induce! A man who would go for money, and would not go without it? Why, such a cowardly soul would get drummed out of the ranks after the first battle!"

Major Ross smiled, a calm, meaning smile—such as always provoked his cousin, for it seemed to her like an assertion of superiority.

"You just look at one side of your question, Kate, and then jump at your conclusion. I know a man who told me yesterday that he would go to war if he could afford it; a man who is neither cold nor cowardly. He has a sister, a girl of fifteen. The two are orphans, and his mother's dying breath gave her to his care. They were well born, but they had fallen into poverty, and he resolved that his sister should have the education of a lady. She is at school now. If he had the means to leave her provided for he would enlist; but what if he should die, and that poor, pretty, undisciplined child should be left alone in the wide world, with no means of support, no protector, no friend? Could he answer it to his mother when he met her in the country which souls people?"

Kate had listened with breathless interest.

"Would he fight well?" she asked, musingly.

"No man better. There is not a drop of coward blood in his veins. He is the very one I would choose to stand beside me in the front of the fray."

"If he were sure his sister would be provided for in the event of his death you think he would go?"

"I know it. His whole heart is in the fight now. If he were sure that she could be secured from future privation, or friendlessness, his name would be enrolled to-morrow."

Kate's face glowed with eager resolve.

"He shall be sure. I can not give my life to my country. I ought not to shrink from giving every thing else. That girl is an orphan like me. She shall be my sister. I will undertake her expenses while her brother is away, and, if he dies, she shall share dollar for dollar with me all that I possess."

Major Ross looked at his young cousin almost reverently. He was just beginning to see below the happy, careless surface of her nature. But he made no comment on her resolve.

"Wait here," he said, simply, "I will bring you your soldier."

In half an hour he returned. He brought with him a man, tall, athletic, strong, with a face brave and masterful rather than handsome.

"Miss Barclay, this is Mr. Keene—Richard Keene."

So much of introduction performed, Major Ross went out and left Kate to make her bargain.

Mr. Keene was thoroughly well bred. In the peculiar circumstances in which he was placed—seeing they they would have been to most men—he was able to steer clear of any false pride or embarrassments.

"Miss Barclay," he said, bowing, "I am told that by way of doing your part toward the war you wish to hire me as a substitute, to fight your battles for you. My terms are moderate, and I shall be a security that my sister's reputation shall take no harm while I am engaged. I am ready to provide for all her expenses, and to charge myself with the care of her, if she should there be need of my protection."

"So much as that is not necessary. While I go I could not allow you to undertake all her expenses. So far as my pay as a soldier can go it must be applied to her support. For the rest I accept your offer in the spirit in which it is made. I will remember you when I fight, and, Heaven helping me, you shall not be ashamed of your substitute.

Kate's eyes grew misty. He was so calm in his manner to have danger and death—seemed to consider himself so little. She longed to beg him, as a sister might have done, not to be so cold and reserve in most unnecessary peril, but something restrained her. She only asked,

"When will you take me to see your sister? It is better I should be introduced to her by you. She will feel more that she has given me a real substitute confided her to my protection."

"You are right. I will take you now, if you please. I call to-morrow, at the 28th to-morrow, and there is no time to lose. Poor Emily, it will be hard on her."

In five minutes more Miss Barclay was walking toward Gramercy Park with her tall companion by her side. She took a look now and then at his face. It was calm and firm—no marks there of weakness or irresolution. She felt sure of what kind of man hers they sat in Miss Deposit's front parlor waiting for Emily. As she came through the door her brother met her. She saw at once that he had been on the look-out. He had said to Miss Barclay that it was better he should speak to her sister alone at first.

Waiting there. Kate heard the sound of earnest, manly talk, then a few words in a voice full of tears, then again the low, manly tones. Soon after a while, Mr. Keene led his sister in.

"Miss Barclay," he said, "I have found my protégée. She quite understands your position as regards her, and I hope she will exact little, and not make you much trouble."

Kate's warm heart overflowed instantly. She put her arm round the trembling girl, and drew her to her side. She whispered,

"I have no mother, dear, and no sister. I shall need you as much as you will need me. Let us be love one another."

Mr. Keene did not hear the whisper, but he saw the quick look of pleasure flush his sister's cheek, and the confiding gesture with which her hand stole into her new friend's, and he said, gratefully,

"We need not detain Miss Barclay any longer," he said, gently. "I will walk home with her now. This afternoon I shall be busy, but I will come to you again this evening."

There were few words spoken during the short walk, but when they were parting on Miss Barclay's door-step she gave her hand to Richard Keene, and said, earnestly,

"Do not doubt that all I can do for your sister will be a labor of love. I shall look on your vacant place in my heart, a lonely longing for some one to care for, and she will fill it. If!"—her eyes filled with tears—"if any thing should happen to you shall be as near to me as she would have been to you."

Richard Keene pressed the hand that held his.

"I believe you," he said. "Emily is a good child. You will not find in her coldness or ingratitude."

That evening Kate Barclay sat alone, living over in thought the parting which she had seen that day taking place, fancying how those two, who were all the world to each other, would say good-by—a good-by which might be forever. Then she thought of the almost regretted of her own doing—not quite—for the knew her soldier's heart was in her keeping, and the debt that he had to pay her own brother she could have sent him forth as cheerfully. She was not thinking to another man's keeping, and she would not have borne to have dealt to herself.

It was a little past nine o'clock when the bell rang, and the servant announced Mr. Keene. She had not expected after their bargain was made to see him again; but she was glad to see him, and she would have reckoned her among the number of those to whom it became him to say farewell. He came in as one of her accustomed guests.

"I have been bidding Emily good-by," he said, in his sad, deep tones. "I had to see her alone at first, you know, and I thought I might venture to come to you. After all, it is by your means that I go, and but makes a sort of tie between us. I am glad that it would be presumption to call friendship, and yet which will make me think of you when I am gone."

Kate had not the courage to tell him that his young sister's thoughts would scarcely follow him with such a mere contract instead. She only said, and she said him instead how Emily had borne the parting.

"Bravely," he answered. "I know that her poor heart had been almost broken, but she had kept back any utterance of complaint or lamentation, whose memory might have unnerved him when the hour came to test his courage."

Then there was silence between them for a few moments, and he was the first to break it.

"I will tell you honestly why I came here to-night, Miss Barclay. I have been thinking how possible it was that I might never come back, and if that happened I feared you might regret that you met me away. I wanted to guard against your making yourself with any such needless sorrow. It was the one longing of my heart to go, and if I could have effected it in any other way I should have done so long ago. Come what may, I shall never be sorry. I have but one life, and there is nothing else I would like so well to do with it as to give it to my country. I can trust Emily to you without fear, and she was all I had to keep me from the war. In any event, I want you should believe full, as I shall be, that you helped me to go."

Kate's tears were flowing fast. Her sympathy he was! how unselfish, trying, even in this last hour, to shield her whom he scarcely knew from a pensi- ing! how could any think, but that he was glad to her hand. He took it tenderly.

"You are going now," he said, his eyes resting on her as if he longed to soothe away her tears, as he might have done his sister. "God keep you, Miss Barclay, and give you strength to bear bravely, gently in the cause for which you have sent me from to do battle for it."

Before she could speak the "God bless you!" which trembled on her lips he was gone. Would she ever see him again? she thought.

The next Saturday the principal of the establishment at Gramercy Park was summoned to an interview with Miss Barclay. The latter lady explained briefly the relation of protectress in which she stood to Miss Emily Keene, and intimated her desire that thereafter her ward should spend all her vacations and every Sunday at her house. The senior, sufficiently astonished at the request, bowed to bone with her; and that was the beginning of a new, sisterly love between the two girls.

As the months passed on they grew nearer and nearer to each other, until Emily could scarcely look on a book which was not a letter from her brother or the new sister she had found at home. Kate's fate had been more unfortunate than the younger girl. The young girl filled up a void in it, and made her both better and happier.

They read over and over, and traced on maps the routes of the armies. Emily herself was sometimes aware of more than the news of battles than was her friend, who followed with ceaseless anxiety and daily prayers the fate of the soldier who had left his heart with her. It was a little while he seemed to be Fortune's soldier also. He had been noticed for gallantry on more than one field, and in the first battle had passed through all perils unharmed. Often Miss Barclay recalled their first interview—one evening in May, now July. By all, athletic figure—the resolute, masterful face—the clear, honest eyes; perhaps she liked Emily all the better that those eyes were always gray eyes shone under her thoughtful forehead.

All this time Miss Deposit seemed not to touch Richard Keene, she had a presentiment that his hour of doom was coming. She never spoke of him to Emily, and the child, with the quick self-security by his past immunity from harm, was growing to believe that he would return. His letters came often, written in good spirits, addressed always to its sister, but never without some cordial, reverent, affectionate message for her friend, and him forth to fight the great fight in her stead. But the shadow which had fallen on Kate's heart over haunted Miss Barclay like a phantom. She could not lift it.

A day came at last when she opened the paper feeling what its contents were before she saw them. She read there that Richard Keene was dead. He had Federals had been repulsed, leaving their dead, of whom he was one, for the enemy to bury.

He read it and knew that the love he had died as he would have wished, for she recalled his parting words. He had said that he would have died as he was. Her hope of success seemed to have died with him. She did not feel like weeping. Her heart was dead, and her eyes, as dry and as cold, dull ache that made her clasp her hand tight to her heart reminded her. She said to herself, with stolidity:

"I must go to Emily and tell her that I sent her brother to his death."

She put on her things, and wondered vaguely that she did not weep as she saw her own still, white-robed face in the glass.

Emily came to her, in the same room, the front parlor at which she had first met her friend, seen in joyful with welcome, but started back appalled by the white, still face she met. Miss Barclay sprang to her and held her fast.

"Emily, I am all you have now. He is gone!"

The girl threw back the hair from her face with full sadduenes burst into a passion of grief; and then, trying to comfort her, her friend wept also, and the tears were a relief to both. Then, when Emily hone with her—her sister from henceforth. She might go to her own apartment at once; perhaps —at present they had need of each other.

How dreary the months were which followed! Emily was the only one who remembered the sorrowless of her dead, who died so gloriously. Kate was haunted forever, as her friend thought, by the idea that she had sent him to his death; and not even the memory of his own assurance, those generous last words of his, could lay the gloomy wraith that had looked down upon so many dark deeds never to be released a single hour of lamentation, the dim light of an iron lamp, suspended from the vaulted roof, fell upon the stalwart forms of the executioners, and a dark group of women-clad men so silently watched their proceedings.

Within a few minutes of the hour struck the clang crash of human flesh and bone. The perspiration poured from the brows of the executioners as the dull blow of their ponderous axes echoed through the dungeon, but not a sigh escaped the lips of the tortured wretch. At length the physician, who stood by with a hand on his fainting pulse, signed to them to pause. Nature could bear no more. The pale morning light, struggling through the grated window, fell on a mangled but still breathing mass of humanity.

Weeks rolled on, and under the sedulous care of physicians and nurses Damiens gradually regained his strength. At length came the appointed for the completion of the sentence.

It was a cold, bleak morning in February. Snow had fallen during the night and still covered the Place de Grève; but, nevertheless, every available spot was occupied. The Faubourg St. Antoine had disgorged its sans-culottic population. A sea of human heads surged to and fro in unwieldy mass, clinging to chimneys, clustered on the trees, hanging on the roofs, they formed a brutal assemblage—not spectators of a mutal drama. But in the balconies and windows overlooking the "Place" were hundreds of high-born ladies, many of them youthful and beautiful. They smiled and coquetted with their cavaliers, diamonds sparkled, and plumes waved in the winter wind. They were come to enjoy a new sensation, and to evince their loyalty to royalty in an outraged form. Some of the prices paid for places were fabulous. For days previous to the execution nothing else was talked of in the good city of Paris.

A scaffold, erected at the northeastern extremity of the "Place," was the stern black lines of its simple multitude. In the centre of it was a chair firmly fixed to the boards, and at one end a large stove. Even vessels containing tongs, pitch, lead, sulphur, and lead bubbled and boiled on the furnace, while the flames rose and a lurid glow on the cruel, swarthy countenances of the executioners as they completed the preparations, or watched over the seething cauldrons.

The hoarse murmur of the crowd was now suddenly hushed. A general movement and flutter pervaded the fair occupants of windows and balconies. Damiens appeared, slowly mounting the steps of the scaffold.

The executioners spent some minutes in firmly binding him to the chair, from the back of which extended a long, projecting piece of wood two feet in length. To this his right arm was securely arranged, his head protruding just above it. Executioner No. 1 now advanced and held under it a brazier filled with sulphur. A horrible cry burst from the wretched man, a cry which seemed to come from his very vitals, and that for months afterw- rd rang in the ears of those who heard it. Another ordered: some nearly fainted, and retired a little w-y from the window. Soon they returned, refreshing themselves with their smelling-bottles as they took their glasses once more at the scaffold. There was no fire visible. The sun had just burst through the clouds, and effected the pale flame, in which his hand was slowly and invisibly turning. But a nameless stench filled the air, and a thin, dull smoke rose over the scaffold, gradually spreading itself, and, with a pale cloud, hid all over criminal and spectators, as if it would shut out the pitying heavens from this scene of cruelty.

Damiens cried out no more. He sat quietly looking at the blackened bones fast withering in the flame.

Meanwhile the horrible caldrons were bubbling and hissing, and the juniors of the Provost's Court of Paris were busying in the furnace. The worst was yet to come. A gigantic executioner now advanced and threw a powerful rope round his neck—hot irons in six different places. His assistants followed carrying spoonfuls of resin, oil, lead, pitch, sulphur, &c., which they poured into the gaping incisions. Soon the breast, the arms, the thighs were one sheet of wound. All the while their cavaliers, and looked and shrank back, and looked again.

All was not yet over. Damiens still breathed, still suffered, and occasionally cried out. Four strong horses were led forward. To their animals were almost ungovernable. All the morning they had struggled to escape from the dreadful spot; from the cries and groans, the thick smoke and sickening smell that filled the air. It was their turn now to bear the pleasure of executions, who could not find a fresh spot on the victim's body to torment.

Damiens was carried down the steps of the scaffold; the horses were backed toward him as he lay; as the ground to which the rudely-constructed mass fast the traces. The grooms loosed their hearts, and with a terrified snort they sprang forward, and the ground shook and seem too strong for them. They were thrown on their haunches, and with a fell, heavy thud they fell across the ground. Again and again they started. Urged on by blows and shouts they pulled, and pulled in vain. The arm of no horse of human flesh and bone still lived—still breathed. At last—this is even naked from the waist—it was torn asunder.

"Oh! those poor horses!" exclaimed Mademoiselle de Pri-ndeau, the young and beautiful niece of the President Bertet.

Evening was approaching. The commissioners deputed to witness the execution of course were embarrassed. It was necessary to carry it out according to the strict letter of the sentence, which directed the criminal to be burned. The crowd, too, was waxing indignant, and clamorously demanded the death of Damiens. The commissioners together, and at length ordered the executioners to desist from further torture—and this time all was over.

One of Bertaud's discoveries in morals was that the pleasures of malignity were only to be branded as evil because they were less than the pain given to unhappy victims. In like manner the infliction of punishment which gave more pain than it procured pleasure began gradually to be considered philosophy, to be regarded as leaving a balance of evil. Without going so far as this, it is still indisputable that the grim and cruel of all punishment, viz. prevention, is never attained by excessive severity. On the contrary, the very notoriety which such punishment obtains, exercises an extraordinary morbid influence over some minds, and actually incites them to incur the same penalty. The excesses of the French Revolution were the result of such scenes as those here described. The horror for blood that country lords and ladies nurtured in the populace required are long to be slaked with theirs, and exacted a terrible retribution.

IUKA, MISSISSIPPI, SCENE OF THE BATTLE OF SEPTEMBER 19TH AND 20TH.—[FROM A SKETCH BY AN OFFICER OF GENERAL BUELL'S ARMY.]

THE BATTLE AT IUKA.

We publish above a view of the town of IUKA, where General Rosecrans defeated the rebels on 19th and 20th. The town itself is thus described:

This town perpetuates the name of a distinguished son of the forest, who formerly dwelt on the premises. Weary and worn by his day's journey, the prisoner was wont to rest with rebels beneath Iuka's roof; and the venerable chief was equally beloved and honored by whites and Indians. Like the immortal Logan, his name is shrined with the brave and generous of his race. He died on the spot about the year 1838.

Iuka was laid out as a town plot in April, 1857, and numbers three hundred population.

The following is General Grant's official account of the battle:

IUKA, MISSISSIPPI, Sept. 21, 1862.

To Major-General H. W. Halleck, General-in-Chief:

General Rosecrans, with Stanley's and Hamilton's divisions and Missouri cavalry, attacked Price south of this place yesterday. The battle was fought all day, and a heavy fight until night closed in. General Ord was to the north with an armed force of about 5000 men, and had some skirmishing with the rebel pickets. This morning the fight was renewed by General Rosecrans, who was nearest to the town; but it was found that the enemy had been evacuating during the night, going south. Generals Hamilton and Stanley, with cavalry, are in full pursuit.

This will no doubt break up the enemy, and possibly force them to abandon much of their artillery. The loss on either side, in killed and wounded, is from 400 to 500. The enemy's loss in arms, knap, etc., will be large. We have about 250 prisoners.

I have reliable intelligence that it was Price's intention to move over east of the Tennessee. In this he has been thwarted. Among the enemy's loss are General Little killed, and General Whitfield wounded.

Too much praise cannot be given for energy and skill displayed by General Rosecrans in the attack, and of the endurance of the troops. General Ord's command showed untiring zeal, but the direction taken by the enemy prevented them from taking the active part they desired. Price's force was about 18,000.

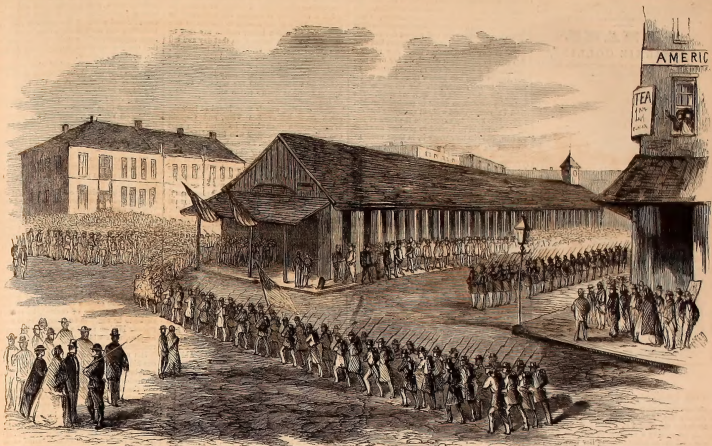
U. S. GRANT, Major-General.

AT CINCINNATI.

We publish on page 637 two illustrations from Cincinnati, from sketches by Mr. A. Mosher. One of them represents a REGIMENT OF VOLUNTEERS ENTERING THE FIFTH STREET MARKET-HOUSE for dinner. Thousands and thousands of soldiers have been fed in this building daily since the rebels first menaced Cincinnati. The other sketch represents the RETURN OF THE CINCINNATI MILITIA after the retreat of the rebels. A Cincinnati paper says:

Yesterday was a gala day for the thousands of true and patriotic Cincinnatians who promptly responded to the call for volunteers to defend the city from an attack by the approaching enemy. They went to the field manfully, and with hearts and souls burning with the patriotism of their sires of '76. While in the field they endured, without a murmur, the hardships and privations of the soldier's life, through sunshine and rain, attending to drills and all the minutiæ of military tactics, so that in the brief period of one week they were almost equal to volunteers in the service. They were men of all classes of society, rich and poor, high and low, and on one common level, and under one flag, united together as a family of brothers, to resist the encroachments of an army seeking the destruction of their homes and firesides. And when, by the retreat of the invaders, their services in behalf of their fellow-citizens were no longer required, they returned from fields of sacrifice as patriots. They were in the morning notified by Major-General Wallace, to whose call they so promptly responded, that at 12 o'clock each regiment, six in number, should break up camp and return to Cincinnati.

At three o'clock three of the regiments marched to the head-quarters of General Wallace, in Covington, preceded by the United States Barracks Band. The remaining regiments not coming up by some misunderstanding, the three first, headed by General Wallace and staff, took up the line of march, moving to the river, and thence across the pontoon bridge to this city. The levee was densely crowded with citizens. As the military pageant was crossing the bridge a 15-pounder cannon, on board the steamer Emma Duncan, belched forth a welcoming salute. The procession moved up Walnut to Front, east to Broadway, north to Fourth, west to Vine, north to Seventh, west to Mound, north to Ninth, east to Elm, north to Twelfth, where the General and staff halted, and the entire citizen escort filed off to their respective homes. The line of march was crowded with citizens, and national emblems and the "flag of the free" waved from every balcony and window. Such an ovation was never before witnessed in this city, and as an impromptu proceeding was creditable to the Queen City and a fitting compliment to her noble sons. While the troops passed the Major-General, at the intersection of Twelfth and Elm streets, they greeted him with deafening applause—a just acknowledgment of their esteem for one of the live Generals of the day.



THE LATE GEN. MANSFIELD.

On page 629 we publish, from a photograph by Brady, a portrait of the late GENERAL MANSFIELD, who was killed at the Battle of Sharpsburg on 17th September.

necticut about the year 1802, and entered West Point in 1817. He graduated in 1822, standing second in a large class, which included Generals Hunter, M'Call, and others who have been often mentioned of late. He was at once appointed Brevet Second Lieutenant in the Corps of Engineers. He was subsequently promoted to a First Lieutenancy in March, 1832; Captain, July, 1838; Chief Engineer of the army commanded by General Taylor in the Mexican war, 1846–47. He was promoted to the honorary rank of Brevet Major for gallant and distinguished services in defense of Fort Brown, on the Rio Grande, May 9, 1846; and was severely wounded in the battle of Monterey. He received the honorary rank of Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel for gallant services in several conflicts with the enemy in September, 1846, and Brevet Colonel for distinguished bravery in the battle of Buena Vista, February 23, 1847. He was appointed Inspector-General of the army, with the rank of Colonel, May 28, 1853, thereupon relinquishing his rank in the Engineer Corps.

On 14th May, 1861, he was commissioned a Brigadier-General, and placed in command of the position at Newport News. After the capture of Norfolk he crossed the James, and was for some time in command at Suffolk, Virginia. When General M'Clellan set out to meet the rebels in Maryland he accompanied him, and was killed, as we stated, in the battle of 17th.

General Mansfield was a brave soldier, and at this juncture his loss will be severely felt.

RETURN OF THE CINCINNATI MILITIA AFTER THE RETREAT OF THE REBELS.—[SKETCHED BY MR. H. MOSLER.]

AUTHOR OF "THE WOMAN IN WHITE," "DEAD SECRET," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XI.

THE post-mark and the handwriting on the address (admirably imitated from the original) warned Mrs. Lecount of the contents of the letter before she opened it.

After waiting a moment to compose herself she read the announcement of her brother's relapse.

There was nothing in the handwriting, there was no expression in any part of the letter, which could suggest to her mind the faintest suspicion of foul play. Not the shadow of a doubt occurred to her that the summons to her brother's bedside was genuine. The hand that held the letter dropped heavily into her lap; she became pale, and old, and haggard, in a moment. Thoughts far removed from her present aims and interests, remembrances that carried her back to other lands than England, to other times than the time of her life in service, prolonged their inner shadows to the surface, and showed the traces of their mysterious passage there on her face. The minutes followed each other, and still the servant below stairs waited vainly for the parlor bell. The minutes followed each other, and still she sat, fearless and quiet, dead to the present and the future, living in the past.

The entrance of the servant, uncalled, roused her. With a heavy sigh the cold and secret woman folded the letter up again, and addressed herself to the interest and the duties of the passing time.

She decided the question of going or not going to Zorich after a very brief consideration of it. Before the bell drawn her chair to the breakfast table she had resolved to go.

Admirably as Captain Wragge's stratagem had worked it might have failed—unassisted by the occurrence of the morning—to achieve its result. The very accident against which it had been the captain's chief anxiety to guard—the accident which had just taken place in the case of him—was, of all the events that could have happened, the one event which falsified every previous calculation, by directly forwarding the main purpose of the conspiracy! If Mrs. Lecount had not obtained the information of which she was in search before the receipt of the letter from Zorich the letter might have addressed her in vain. She would have hesitated before deciding to leave England, and that hesitation might have proved fatal to the captain's scheme.

As it was, with the plain proofs in her possession—with the gown discovered in Magdalen's wardrobe, with the piece cut out of it in her own pocket-book; and with the knowledge, obtained from Mrs. Wragge, of the very house in which the disguise had been put on—Mrs. Lecount had now at her command the means of warning Mr. Noel Vanstone as she had not been able to warn him yet; or, in other words, the means of guarding against any dangerous tendencies toward reconciliation with the Bygraves which might otherwise have entered his mind during her absence at Zorich. The only difficulty which now perplexed her was the difficulty of deciding whether she should write to Vanstone with her master personally or by writing before her departure from England.

She looked again at the doctor's letter. The word "mentally" in the sentence which announced her to her dying brother was so underlined. Admiral Bartram's house was at some distance from the railway; the time consumed in driving to St. Cross, and driving back again might be time fatally lost on the journey to Zurich. Although she would infinitely have preferred a personal interview with Mr. Noel Vanstone, there was no choice, on a matter of life and death, but to save the journey and trust to writing to him.

After sending to secure a place at once in the early coach she sat down to write to her master.

Her first thought was to tell him all that had happened at North Shingles that morning. On reflection, however, she rejected the idea. Once already (in copying the personal description from Miss Garth's letter) she had trusted her weapons in her master's hands, and Mr. Bygrave had contrived to turn them against her. She resolved this time to keep them strictly in her own possession. The secret of the missing fragment of the Alpaca dress was known to no living creature but herself; and, until her return to England, she determined to keep it so herself. The necessary impression might be produced on Mr. Noel Vanstone's mind without venturing into details. She knew by experience the form of letter which might be trusted to produce an effect on him, and she now wrote it, in these words:

"DEAR MR. NOEL,—Sad news has reached me from Switzerland. My beloved brother has had a dangerous relapse, and has been seized mentally by fancies. The services necessity of availing myself of the earliest means of conveyance to Zurich, compel me to leave you. I must go, and go directly, by permission to leave England, if necessary, which you kindly granted to me at the beginning of my brother's illness; and I must avoid all delay by going straight to London, instead of turning aside, as I should have liked, to see you first at St. Cross.

"Painfully as I am affected by the family calamity which has fallen on me, I can not let this opportunity pass without averting to another subject, which serious concerns your welfare, and in which (on that account) your old housekeeper feels the deepest interest.

"I am going to surprise and shock you, Mr. Noel. Pray don't be agitated! pray compose yourself!

"The impudent attempt to obtain your money, which has happily opened your eyes to the true character of Miss Bygrave, has produced (as I always feared it would) another effect which the event had in forcing himself on your acquaintance. The infamous conspiracy with which you were threatened in London has been in full progress against you, under Mr. Bygrave's direction, at Aldborough. Accident—I will tell you what accident when we meet—has put me in possession of information precious to your future security. I have discovered, to an absolute certainty, that the person calling herself Miss Bygrave is no other than the woman who visited us in disguise at Vauxhall Walk.

"I suspected this from the first; but I had no evidence to support my suspicion. I had no means of confirming the false impression produced on you. My hands, I thank Heaven, are tied no longer. I possess absolute proof of the assertion that I have just made—proof that your own eyes can not resist. You would recognize it if you saw the dress in Court of Chancery.

"Pray, pray, my dear Mr. Noel, you will refuse to believe me! You will believe me as soon as I can see you, and can tell to ask which your English sense of fair play will not dictate.

"This melancholy journey of mine will keep me away from England for a fortnight, or, at the utmost, three weeks. You will oblige me—and you will certainly not sacrifice your own interests and pleasures—if you will write to me during that interval with your friends at St. Cross. If before my return some unexpected circumstance should make you anxious into the company of the Bygraves; and if your natural kindness of heart should lead you to invite them under which they will in that case certainly address to you, please to use implicit restraint on yourself, for your own sake and for mine. Suspend your flirtation with the young lady (I will explain what I mean when we meet), and remember that the one infallible way of preventing her from marrying you is to let her suppose that you are married already. Pray excuse me for writing in this strain. I am only anxious to show you that Miss Bygrave is the woman who wore that disguise, and used those implements in Vauxhall Walk. I will engage to leave your services at a day's notice, and to return to the life of obscurity from which I rose against my neighbor by resigning every claim I have to the gratitude and remembrance of a person who is dear as well as on your own. I make this engagement without reserves of any kind, and I remain, dear Mr. Noel, ever, if you please, your faithful servant,

"VERONIQUE LECOUNT."

The closing sentences of this letter—as the housekeeper well knew—often the most important, embodied the one appeal to Mr. Noel Vanstone which could be certainly trusted to produce a deep and lasting effect. They appealed to his master her oath, her life, or her reputation on proving the assertion which she had made, and have failed to leave a permanent impression on his mind. But when she staked not only her position in his service, but her reputation with him as well, she at once absorbed the ruling passion of his life in expectation of the result. He was not a slouch of a man to overlook all his interests—the interest of saving his money, for instance.

"Checkmate for Mr. Bygrave!" thought Mrs. Lecount, as she sealed and directed the letter. "The battle is over—but where is the victor?"

While Mrs. Lecount was providing for her master's future security at Sea View events were in full progress at North Shingles.

As soon as Captain Wragge observed his astonishment at the housekeeper's appearance on the morning of departure, he had hastily left her, guided by his own forebodings of the disaster that had happened, made straight for his wife's room.

Never, in all her former experience, had poor Mrs. Wragge felt the full weight of the ovation's indignation as she felt it now. All the little intelligence she naturally possessed vanished at once in the whirlwind of her husband's rage. The only plain facts which he could extract from her were vile in number. In the first place, Magdalen's rash desertion of her post proved to have no better reason to excuse it than Magdalen's invincible impatience: she had passed a sleepless night; she had risen feverish and wretched; and she had gone out, reckless of all consequences, to bare her guilty head in the fresh air. In the second place, Mrs. Wragge had, on her own confession, seen Mrs. Lecount, had talked with Mrs. Lecount, and had ended by telling Mrs. Lecount the story of the ghost. Having made these discoveries, Mrs. Wragge waited no more time in contending with the wife's terror and confusion. He withdrew at once to a window which commanded an uninterrupted prospect of Mr. Noel Vanstone's house, and there established himself on the watch for events at Sea View, precisely as Mrs. Lecount had established herself on the watch for events at North Shingles.

Not a word of comment on the disaster of the morning escaped him when Magdalen returned and found him at his post. His flow of language seemed at last to have run dry. "I told you what Mrs. Wragge would do," he said; "and Mrs. Wragge has done it." He sat unflinchingly at the window, with a patience which Mrs. Lecount herself could not have surpassed. The one active proceeding in which he seemed to think it necessary to engage was performed by deputy. He sent the servant to the inn to hire a chaise and a fast horse, and to say that he would call himself before noon that day and tell the hostler when the vehicle would be wanted. Not a sign of impatience escaped him until the time drew near for the departure of the post-coach. Then the captain's curly lips began to twitch with anxiety, and the captain's restless fingers beat the devil's tattoo unintermittently on the window-pane.

The rumbling of wheels were heard at last, the coach drew up at Sea View, and Captain Wragge's own observation informed him that the one passenger who left Aldborough that morning was Mrs. Lecount.

The main uncertainty disposed of, a serious question suggested by the events of the morning—still remained to be solved. Which was the destined road of Mrs. Lecount's journey—Zurich or St. Cross? That she would certainly inform her master of Mrs. Wragge's ghost story, and of every other disclosure in relation to names and places which might have escaped Mrs. Wragge's lips, was a matter of all doubt. But of the two ways at her disposal of doing the mischief—either personally or by letter—which was likely important to the captain to know which she had chosen. If she had gone to the admiral's, the chaise would be left there to bring back the coach, to catch the train by which she traveled, and outstrip her afterward on the drive from the station to Sea View. If, on the contrary, she had been contented with writing to her master, it would only be necessary to devise measures for intercepting the letter. The captain decided on going to the post-office in the first place, assuming that the housekeeper had written, she would not have left the letter at the mercy of the servant—she would have seen it safely in the letter-box before leaving Aldborough.

"Good-morning," said the captain, cheerfully addressing the postmaster. "I am Mr. Bygrave, of North Shingles. I think you have a letter in the box addressed to Mr. ——?"

The postmaster was a short man, and consequently was a man with a proper idea of his own importance. He solemnly checked Captain Wragge in full career.

"When a letter is once posted, Sir," he said, "nobody out of the office has any business with it until it reaches its address."

The captain was not a man to be daunted, even by a postmaster. A bright idea struck him. He took out his pocket-book, in which Admiral Bartram's address was written, and returned to the charge.

"Suppose a letter has been wrongly directed by mistake?" he began. "And suppose the writer wants to correct the error after the letter is put in the box?"

"When a letter is once posted, Sir," returned the impenetrable local authority, "nobody out of the office touches it on any pretense whatever."

"Granted with all my heart," persisted the captain. "I don't want to touch it—I only want to explain myself. A lady has posted a letter here addressed to 'Noel Vanstone, Esq., Admiral Bartram's, St. Cross in the Marsh, Essex.' She wrote in a great hurry, and she is not quite certain whether she added the name of the parish, Cross'y. It is of the last importance that the delivery of the letter should not be delayed. What is to hinder your facilitating the post-office work, and obliging a lady, by adding the name of the post-town (if it happens to be right) with your own hand? I put it to you as a zealous officer—what possible objection can there be to granting my request?"

The postmaster was compelled to acknowledge that there could be no objection, provided nothing but a necessary line was added to the address; provided nobody touched the letter but himself; and provided the precious time of the post-office was not suffered to run to waste. He there happened to be nothing particular to do at that moment, he would readily oblige the lady at Mr. Bygrave's request.

Captain Wragge watched the postmaster's hands, as they sorted the letters in the box, with the eyes of a lynx. When the letter there would the hands of the writer, Mr. Noel Vanstone, suddenly stop? Yes! They stopped, and picked a letter out from the rest.

"Noel Vanstone, Esq.," did you say?" asked the postmaster, keeping the letter in his extended hand.

"Noel Vanstone, Esq.," replied the captain, "at Admiral Bartram's, St. Cross in the Marsh, Essex."

"Cossy, Essex," chimed in the postmaster, throwing the letter back into the box. "Pity lady has made no mistake, Sir. Time address quite right."

Nothing but a timely consideration of the debt he owed to appearances prevented Captain Wragge from throwing his hat within hat up in the air as soon as he found himself in the street once more. All further doubt was now at an end. Mrs. Lecount had written to her master. Before Mrs. Lecount was on her way to Zurich!

With his head higher than ever, with the tip of his respectable frock-coat floating behind him in the breeze, with his bosom's native impulses stifling lightly on its surface, the captain strung to the inn and called for the railway time-table. After making certain calculations (in black and white, as a matter of course), he ordered a chaise to be ready in an hour, so as to reach the railway in time for the coach that was running to London, with which there happened to be a communication from Aldborough by coach.

His next proceeding was one of a far more serious kind; his next proceeding implied a terrible certainty of success. The day of the week was Thursday. From the inn he went to the church, saw the clerk, and gave the necessary notice of a marriage by license on the following Monday.

Bold as he was, his nerves were a little shaken by this last achievement; his hand trembled as it lifted the latch of the garden gate. He contored his nerves with brandy-and-water before he sent for Magdalen to inform her of the proceedings of the morning. Another outburst might reasonably be expected when she had that the last irrevocable step had been taken, and that notice had been given of the wedding-day.

The captain's words warned him to lose no time in emptying his glass. In a few minutes he spent the necessary message up stairs. While waiting for Magdalen's appearance he provided himself with certain materials which were necessary to carry the conspiracy on to its crowning point. In the first place, he wrote his assumed name (by no means in so fine a hand as usual) on a visiting-card, and added, underneath, these words: "Not a moment is to be lost. Am at once there all alike to the following address." Thomas Bygrave, Esq., Monsard's Hotel, Sherbury Street, Strand, London." After carefully placing the envelopes and the card in his breast-pocket he shut up the desk. As he rose from the writing-table Magdalen came into the room.

The captain took a moment to decide on the best mode of opening the interview; and determined, at his own phrase, to dash at it. In two words he told Magdalen what had happened and informed her that Monday was to be the wedding-day.

He was prepared to quiet her if she burst into a fervor of passion; to reason with her if she

"NOEL VANSTONE, ESQ.? DID YOU SAY?" ASKED THE POSTMASTER.

begged for time; to sympathize with her if she smiled into tears. To his inexpressible surprise he found himself at his calculations. She heard him without uttering a word, without shedding a tear. When he had done she dropped into a chair. Her large gray eyes stared at him vacantly. In one mysterious instant all her beauty left her: her face stiffened awfully, like the face of a corpse. For the first time in the captain's experience of her, fear—all-mastering fear —had taken possession of her body and soul.

"You are not flinching?" he said, trying to rouse her. "Surely you are not flinching at the last moment."

No light of intelligence came into her eyes; no change passed over her face. She was dead to him—for she moved a little in the chair and slowly shook her head.

"You plotted this marriage of your own free will," pursued the captain, with the furtive look and the flattering tones of a man ill at ease, "it was your own idea, not mine. I took to have the responsibility laid on my shoulders—no! not for once two hundred pounds. Your resolution fails you, if you think better of it—?"

He stopped. Her face was changing; her lips were moving at last. She slowly raised her left hand, with the fingers outspread—she looked at it as if it was a hand that was strange to her—and she counted the days on it—the days before the marriage.

"Friday, one," she whispered to herself; "Saturday, two; Sunday, three; Monday—" Her hands dropped upon her lap; her face suddened again. The deadly fear fastened its paralyzing hold on her once more, and the next words died away on her lips.

Captain Wragge took out his handkerchief and wiped his forehead.

"Damn the two hundred pounds!" he said. "Two thousand wouldn't pay me for this!"

He went back to the writing-table, took the envelopes which he had addressed to himself out of his pocket, and returned to the chair in which he had sitted before. The envelopes he held out.

"House yourself," he said; "I have a last word to say to you. Can you hear me?"

She struggled and roused herself—a faint tinge of color stole over her white cheeks—she bowed her head.

"Look at these," pursued Captain Wragge, holding up the envelopes. "If I turn them to the use for which they have been written, Mrs. Lecount's master will never receive Mrs. Lecount's letter. If I tear them up, he will have by to-morrow's post that you are the woman who visited him in Vauxhall Walk. Say the word! Shall I tear the envelopes up, or shall I put them back in my pocket?"

There was a pause of dead silence. The murmur of the summer waves on the shingle of the beach, and the voices of the summer idlers on the parade floated through the open window, and filled the empty stillness of the room.

She raised her head; she lifted her hand and pointed steadily to the envelopes.

"Put them back," she said.

"Do you mean it?" he asked.

"I mean it."

As she gave that answer there was a sound of wheels on the road outside.

"You hear those wheels?" said Captain Wragge.

"I hear them."

"You see the chaise?" said the captain, pointing through the window, as the chaise which had been ordered from the inn made its appearance at the garden-gate.

"I see it."

"And, of your own free-will, you tell me to go?"

"Yes. Go!"

Without another word he left her. The servant was waiting at the door with his travelling-bag.

"Miss Bygrave is not well," he said. "Tell your mistress to go to bed at once."

He stepped into the gig and started on the first stage of the journey to St. Crux.

CHAPTER XII.

TOWARD three o'clock that afternoon Captain Wragge stopped at the nearest station to Ousey which the high way passed in the county through Essex. Inquiries made on the spot informed him that he might get to St. Crux by the main there for a quarter of an hour, and return to the station in time for an evening train to London. In ten minutes more the captain was on the road again, driving rapidly in the direction of the coast.

After proceeding some miles on the highway, the carriage turned off, and the coachman invoked himself in an intricate network of country roads.

"Are we far from St. Crux?" asked the captain, growing impatient, after mile on mile had been passed, without a sign of reaching the journey's end.

"You'll see the house, Sir, at the next turn in the road," said the man.

The next turn in the road brought them within view of the open country again. Ahead of the carriage Captain Wragge saw a great inlet—against the sky—the line of the sea-wall which protects the low-coast land from inundation. The flat intermediate country was intersected by a labyrinth of tidal streams, winding up from the invisible sea in strange fantastic curves—rivers at high water, and channels of mud at low. On his right hand was a quaint little village, mostly composed of wooden houses, straggling down to the brink of one of the tidal streams. On his left hand, further away, among the gloomy ruins of an Abbey, with a long, low, desolate pile of building, of vast extent and great age, attached to it. One of the streams—for the sea (called in Essex "beakwaters") curled almost entirely round the house. Another, from an opposite quarter, appeared to run straight through the grounds, and to separate one side of the shapeless mass of buildings, which was in moderate repair, from another, which was little better than a ruin. Bridges of wood and bridges of brick crossed the stream, and gave access to the house from all points of the compass. No human creature appeared in the neighborhood, and no sound was heard but the distant barking of a house-dog from an invisible court-yard.

"Which side of the house, Sir, do I go?" asked the coachman; "the front or the back?"

The back," said Captain Wragge, feeling that the less seeming he made of his present position the safer that position might be.

The coachman turned the sea stream before the coachman made his way through the ponds into a dreary inclosure of stone. At an open door on the inhabited side of the house was a weather-bitten old man-servant, busily at work on a half-finished model of a ship. He rose and came to the carriage door, lifting his spectacles on his forehead, and looking disconcerted at the appearance of a stranger.

"Is Mr. Noel Vanstone staying here?" asked Captain Wragge.

"Yes, Sir," replied the old man. "Mr. Noel Vanstone came yesterday."

"Take that card to Mr. Vanstone, if you please," said the captain; "and say I am waiting here to see him."

In a few minutes Mr. Noel Vanstone made his appearance, breathless and eager, shorebird in manner for a man from Aldborough. Captain Wragge opened the carriage door, seized his outstretched hand, and pulled him in without ceremony.

"Your housekeeper has gone," whispered the captain, "and you are to be married on Monday. Don't contradict me, and don't express your feelings—there isn't time for it. Get the first active person to Ousey you can find in a hurry to pack your bag in ten minutes, take leave of the admiral, and come back at once with me to the London train."

Mr. Noel Vanstone faintly attempted to ask a question. He was not allowed to hear it.

"As much talk as you like on the road," he said. "Time is too precious for talking here. Have I or have I not saved you from the Devil of it? How do we know she may not turn back before she gets to Zeeland?"

That startling consideration terrified Mr. Noel Vanstone into instant submission.

"What shall I say to the admiral?" he asked, helplessly.

"Tell him you are going to be married, to be sure. He will know nothing to the contrary when he is turned." If he wonders you didn't tell him before, say I'm a nervous man, and the bride is waiting for you. Stop! Any letters addressed to you in your absence will be sent to this place, of course? Any solicitors' letters, envelopes, and tell him to forward your letters under cover to me. The old customer at the hotel we are going to, and if we find the place full the landlord may be depended on to take care of any letters left behind. Now you know all you need to know for your correspondence may be of the greatest importance. How do we know Lecount may not write to Ousey, or come to Zorich?"

"What a head you have got!" cried Mr. Noel Vanstone, eagerly taking the envelopes. "You think of every thing."

He left the carriage in high excitement, and ran back into the house. In ten minutes more Captain Wragge heard his name called again, and the horses started on their return journey.

The travelers reached London in good time that evening, and found accommodation at the hotel.

Knowing the restless, inquisitive nature of the man he had to deal with, Captain Wragge had anticipated the many little difficulties and disappointment in meeting the questions which Mr. Noel Vanstone might put to him on the way to London. To find some relief, a startling chemistic discovery absorbed his traveling companion's whole attention at the outset of the journey. By some extraordinary oversight, Miss Bygrave had been left, on the eve of her marriage, unprovided with a mask! Mr. Noel Vanstone declared that he would take the whole responsibility of correcting that deficiency on his own shoulders on his own shoulders; he would not trouble Mr. Bygrave to give him any assistance; he would comfort, when they got to their journey's end, with the landlady of the hotel, and would examine the candidates for the vacant office himself. All the way to London he returned again and again to the same subject; all the evening, at the hotel, he was in and out of the landlady's sitting-room, until he fairly obliged her to lock the door. In every other proceeding which related to his marriage he had been kept in the back-ground; he had been compelled to follow in the footsteps of his bargain-driver. In the matter of the lady's-maid he claimed his fitting position at last—he followed nobody; he took the lead.

The forenoon of the next day was devoted to obtaining the necessary information and making the declaration on oath being eagerly accepted by Mr. Noel Vanstone, who swore in the most solemn manner (on information obtained from the captain) that the lady was of the highest rank and position. The bridegroom returned to examine the characters and qualifications of the women-servants out of place whom the landlady had engaged to summon to the hotel; while Captain Wragge turned his steps "on his own responsibility," to the office of the correspondence of a friend in a distant quarter of London.

The captain's friend was connected with the law, and the captain's business was of a legal nature. His first object was to inform himself of the legal bearings of the approaching marriage on the future of the husband and the wife. His second object was to provide beforehand for destroying all traces of the destination to which he might betake himself when he left Aldborough on the wedding-day. Having reached his end successfully in both these cases, he returned to the hotel, and found Mr. Noel Vanstone nursing his offended dignity in the landlady's sitting-room. Three ladies'-maids had appeared to pass their examination, and had all, on coming to the question of wages, impudently declined accepting the place. A fourth candidate was expected to present herself on the next day; and, with that one hope for appearance, Mr. Noel Vanstone positively declined removing from the metropolis. Captain Wragge showed his annoyance openly at the unnecessary delay that occasioned in the return to Aldborough, but without producing any effect. Mr. Noel Vanstone shook his obstinate little head, and resolutely refused to trifle with his responsibilities.

The first event which occurred on Saturday morning was the arrival of Mrs. Lecount's letter to her master, inclosed in one of the envelopes which the captain had addressed to himself. He received it (by previous arrangement with the waiter) in the bedroom, read it with the closest attention, and put it away carefully in his pocket-book. The letter was omitted of serious events to come when the bridegroom returned to England, and it was due to Magalaen—who was the person threatened—to place the warning of danger in her own possession.

Later in the day the fourth candidate appeared for the inspection in situation—a young woman of small expectations and subdued manners, who (backed by the landlady remarked) like a person conversant with watches. She passed the ordeal of examination successfully, and accepted the proffered engagement. The terms of the engagement having been ratified on both sides, fresh delays ensued, of which Mr. Noel Vanstone was once more the cause. He had not yet made up his mind whether he would or would not give leave them a dress for the wedding-ring; and he wasted the rest of the day to no sort of purpose in one jeweler's shop after another, that he and the bridegroom, and the new lady's-maid (who traveled with them), were to have the honor to each his train from London that evening.

It was late at night when they left the railway at the nearest station to Aldborough. Captain Wragge had been strangely silent all the evening. He was absent-minded, and he was wholly ignorant of the progress of events, in his absence, at North Shingles.

I'll take the nearest ford and go,
I'll leave thee, darling, to the foe,
But do not let him kick me so,
Maryland, my Maryland!

You've dashed my hopes, ungrateful State,
Maryland, my Maryland!
Go! bless your stars I came too late,
Maryland, you understand!
I meant to dress you well in black,
And scar you with the battle's track,
And I had scourges for your back,
Maryland, my contraband!

Oh where are Longstreet, Hill, and Lee?
Maryland, my Maryland!
And "Stonewall" Jackson, where is he?
Maryland, my Maryland!
Four coat-tails streaming in the breeze,
And that is all a body sees;
Better than dangling from the trees,
Maryland, my Maryland!

Gray geese are flying southward, ho!
Maryland, O Maryland!
It's getting cold up there, you know,
Maryland, O Maryland!
I should have thought it rather warm,
South Mountain yonder took by storm,
Antietam yielded in alarm,
Maryland, O Maryland!

Blood-red my hand, and dead my heart,
Native land, my native land!
Columbia from her grave will start,
Murder'd land, my murder'd land!
Thy flag is like a sword of fire,
I'll fly, I'll fly its vengeful ire,
Beneath its stroke its foes expire,
Native land, my native land!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Saturday, October 11, 1862.

THE STATE ELECTION.

THE contest for Governor in this State possesses an importance scarcely second to that of the contest in the field on the banks of the Potomac or in the plains of Kentucky. A singular chance has arrayed the two parties who divide the North squarely and fairly against each other.

Horatio Seymour is a man of large political experience and decided ability. He has been Governor. His integrity has not been questioned. Whatever be the character of his leading supporters, his own is without stain. He presents himself as a war Democrat. He is in favor of the prosecution of the war. Though he rather intimates, in his speech accepting the nomination, that the responsibility for the war rests with the North, not the South—in other words, that it was the sheep's fault he was so tender, and the wolf couldn't help eating him—he is ready to overlook the initial fault committed by the Northern people, and to accept their cause with all its demerits.

James S. Wadsworth is a farmer of large means: born rich, handsomely educated, now a millionaire. Inexperienced in political life, he first loomed into notice when, fifteen months ago, he chartered and loaded a steamer with provisions for our troops, then beleaguered at Annapolis. Since then he has become a General, and it is charged against him that, while under the command of M'Clellan, he spoke and wrote in such wise as to bring his commander into disrepute; that he disapproved of his policy, and was so reckless of discipline as to sneer publicly and privately at his being in command of the army. For the rest, General Wadsworth has fairly described himself as having been chosen by a Convention of men who were in earnest because they knew that he was in earnest.

If it can be substantiated that General Wadsworth is an enemy of General M'Clellan, and that while acting under his orders he worked with the politicians who were bent on undermining and ruining him, and wrote and spoke publicly against his commanding officer, he will lose a large number of votes which he would otherwise have polled. At the hour we write an immense majority of the people of New York believe that General M'Clellan is not only an able General, but is the best General we have for the command of the Army of the Potomac, and that he has been hardly used by the politicians at Washington. If the M'Clellan issue be fairly raised, and Wadsworth be placed before the people as the champion of the anti-M'Clellan party, he will lose not only the entire Democratic, but a large proportion of the Republican vote.

With regard to Seymour a new issue has been raised by the President's proclamation of freedom to the slaves. Is Horatio Seymour ready to stand upon that proclamation? If he is, and if Wadsworth can be identified, fairly and honestly, with the politicians who hampered M'Clellan, then the chances of the Democratic party will be very fair indeed.

But if Seymour can not stand upon the President's proclamation, it will become the clearest duty of every loyal citizen to vote against him, and to see to it that for the honor of the State of New York he is defeated by an overwhelming majority.

In time of peace honest men divide on questions of minor importance, and of local or temporary policy, without involving any question of their loyalty. In time of war there can be but two parties—the party in favor of the country, and the party in favor of the enemy. Any man who opposes the Government on fundamental questions of public policy, at the present crisis, is a public enemy and an ally of the rebels. There may have been, and there may be, many points upon which honest citizens may differ with the President. But this is not the time to discuss them. The question now is, whether the nation shall be saved or lost? Those who are in favor of its being saved will support the recognized Government even in measures which they do not heartily approve. Those who are in favor of its being lost will assail the Government by opposing its policy, and thus crippling its efforts to maintain the Union.

On and after 1st January next the war will be carried on not only for the restoration of the Union, but for the protection of over three million black men in the enjoyment of liberty. Can Horatio Seymour heartily help to prosecute the war on this basis? If he can not, then he is an enemy of the United States, and if New York elects him, it will be a triumph for Jefferson Davis.

THE LOUNGER.

THE PROCLAMATION.

The President's proclamation was discussed elsewhere in this paper last week. But every tongue that speaks or hand that writes will have a word to say of an act which is in itself simply just, but which in its results becomes sublime.

Nearly four millions of innocent human beings, against every instinct of justice and humanity, and in direct contradiction of the fundamental principle of this Government, are held as slaves and counted as property by the local law of certain States. The owners of these slaves, foreseeing that the natural increase of population in a nation of laboring men would limit a system of forced labor which can not live except by directly competing with free labor, and knowing that the limitation of slavery is its death, rose in rebellion against the Government of the people, hoping either to win a separation or to fatigue the people into granting a perpetual guarantee for slavery.

Meanwhile the system itself, as it was the source of the war, became its strength. It supplies the armies which fight against the country. It is more the strength of the rebellion than the cannon and powder and ball which mangle and murder the loyal citizens who oppose it with arms. The Government of the United States does not hesitate to seize and appropriate all those guns and that ammunition, and to take the lives of those who use them just as fast and as far as it can. And in obedience to the same necessity, and acting by the same right, it will destroy the assistance which slavery gives to the rebellion just as fast and as far as possible.

The act is in itself a military measure, dictated by common sense. In its scope it is a national purification. Its temporary intention is the maintenance of the Union and the Government. Its ultimate result is permanent peace and prosperity, founded upon the only principle that can secure either. Had the slaveholders trusted to political and constitutional means, they could not have evaded but they could have delayed the result. When they rushed to arms they gave the Government, under the Constitution, the right and the power to strike the system directly. And after due warning, after the ripening of the popular conviction that the blow must fall, at the very moment when it would tell most truly, the word is spoken, the honor of the nation is pledged, and the rebellion, and despotic Europe sympathizing with it, see the religious earnestness of a people which moves gradually, wisely, irresistibly to its triumph.

Like the old statue of the God which had one foot of marble and one of clay, so stood the Union, strong with its marble foot of Liberty, weak with the clay of Slavery. Failing and breaking from that weakness, the great statue itself tottered to its fall. But from the clouds and terror of that wild upheaval it emerges radiant, supreme, steadfast forever, both feet of spotless marble.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL WILDER DWIGHT.

At the dinner of the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Harvard University, in July last, after General Devens had made a stirring speech, and Holmes, in a clear, ringing voice, had chanted the fiery music of his battle-lyric, "Never or Now," and the other speakers had all obeyed the imperial impulse of the hour, there was a sudden and loud call for a young man who was trying to escape from the hall—the only retreat he ever willingly attempted—and at last, yielding to the summons, he turned and fronted the company with a bright, ardent smile, while, amidst the shouts and thunders of applause, the President introduced him as Lieutenant-Colonel Wilder Dwight, a prisoner of war, at large upon his parole.

The heroic aspect, the burning words, the passionate appeal he made for honor and liberty, we shall none of us forget. And, now that he shall be seen no more, we remember him as he stood there, the express image of that dauntless daring, that blithe earnestness, that religious faith, by which alone the great victory is to be won.

At the beginning of the war Lieutenant-Colonel Dwight devoted himself, with the aid of friends, to raising the Massachusetts Second Regiment, of which he went into the field as Major. The regiment was assigned to Banks's division, and, with the exception of a rapid march to cover the retreat from Ball's Bluff, it remained inactive until the advance into the Shenandoah Valley in the early spring. In the retreat from the valley the regiment protected the rear, passing through a sharp engagement in the streets of Winchester, and Major Dwight, commanding the rear-guard, was wounded and captured. He was presently paroled, and upon the elevation of Colonel Gordon to a brigadiership Major Dwight was made Lieutenant-Colonel, and was exchanged in time to join his regiment after the battle of Cedar Mountain, where it was so fearfully cut up. The regiment marched with the army into Maryland, and at the battle of Sharpsburg, after riding triumphantly along the line of his regiment, showing the men the rebel colors they had taken, he was talking with his Colonel, when he was struck by a ball. "Colonel, I think I am hit," he said, reeled, fell, and died after two days.

Wilder Dwight went to the war, with the clearest knowledge of its object, and of the desperation with which it was to be fought. With the most cheerful calmness he looked death in the face: offered his joyous youth, his high hopes, the bright promise of his future, as so many of his friends had done, a glad sacrifice to God and his fellow-men, and God has accepted it. Oh, not in vain! not in vain! The costly heart's-blood of all these young and brave shall not be wasted. Every sacred drop is counted, every pang of wound or disease remembered, and the cause of human liberty, which is the precious care of the country they died to save from the most cruel barbarism, shall be hallowed forever by the memory of their valor.

OUT OF THE FOG.

All political parties in this country are now annihilated. They will, of course, retain their old names and use their old organizations. But the only question now is of the maintenance of the Government. We are all either for it or against it. If we are for it, it can be attained only by supporting the constitutional authorities, and the policy adopted by them. If we are against it, we can serve the cause of disunion only by resisting the measures of the Government.

By resistance we do not mean discussion. These columns have always claimed and exercised the right of candid, loyal debate, just as they have insisted that as in war words are things, the disloyal speeches of persons like Vallandigham and his fellows should be suppressed. But a lukewarm, hesitating, doubtful support of the Government, now that it has declared itself upon the only question about which we differ, is an unhesitating assistance to the national enemy. And circumstances now compel every man to declare himself.

Every close observer of affairs knows that we were drifting in a fog, in which we were likely to be wrecked upon the shoals of compromise. But the fog is lifted. We see the channel and every rock and shallow. To drop the figure, the game of the gentlemen who usurp the name Democratic to annihilate the essential principle of Democracy, was to clamor loudly in support of the Government whose action they thought to be so inefficient that it would disgust the people and incline them to believe that the war could not be successfully ended. They depended upon the fatigue of the war, upon the pressure of the tax, upon the prostration of general trade, upon the old cry of abolitionism, upon the new cry of arbitrary oppression, and upon the feeling of the weakness of the administration, to tire the nation into asking "how can we make this thing up?"

"If we can only get an armistice," said these gentlemen, "and persuade Jeff Davis and his States to send representatives and Senators to Congress, we will try to send enough 'conservative' men to meet them—and to give Davis and Toombs and Floyd and Cobb and Wigfall and Company the guarantees they want. Then will follow the reaction. Any allusion to slavery will be stopped every where. The slave States will be a unit for us. We can count upon the reaction to give us enough power in the free States, and, presto! we are made men! Then we will undo the doings of the last Congress, on the ground that grave measures were passed when half of the country was unrepresented. The bill prohibiting territorial slavery is only an act, and can be repealed. The confiscation act tends to exasperate our lately-goaded brethren—we will strike that off the books. And so, by giving perpetual guarantees to slavery, and securing its unlimited extension, as our worthy and fit leader Mr. Seymour advised us to do before the rebellion broke out, we Democrats, or lovers of the rights of man, will become perpetual cocks of the walk. The first step to all this is to dishearten the people with the war. The course of the Government does that, so we will scoff at its incapacity, but declare that there is nothing left but to support it."

This was the pretty plan. Suddenly comes what the Herald calls "a burst of sunshine." The fog scatters, and, not to speak it irreverently, Messrs. Seymour, Wood, and Co. are caught without their clothes.

GENERAL MITCHELL.

Two years ago next December there was a famous meeting at the Academy of Music in favor of the Union. Mr. Charles O'Conor made a speech. He thought the Union endangered by those who insisted that Justice was good policy, and not by those who denied equality of rights. The most striking and eloquent speech of the evening, however, was that of Professor Mitchell, the astronomer, a Kentuckian, and "a conservative," as the word was technically used.

Professor Mitchell is now General Mitchell. He is for the Union now, as he was then. Then he thought it could be saved by words, and his words were fiery. Now he knows that it is to be saved by war, and his theory of war is that it shall hurt. He has served in the Southwest, and no general hurt the enemy or thrilled the country with victory more than he. Why? Because he is thoroughly in earnest: earnest in every conviction, wish, and aspiration of his soul; in every drop of his blood, in every muscle, nerve, and fibre of his frame. He believes in the cause as children in their parents, and Christians in God. He comprehends the scope of the war: its origin, its purpose, and its awful importance. His words burn. They go through his men like flames, and they kindle with the purest enthusiasm. He has the ardor, the conviction, the skill, and rapidity which are irresistible. If every soldier and every general were like him, the rebellion would be utterly consumed as by fire.

General Mitchell has lately been placed in command of the Department of South Carolina, etc. He arrived and visited every camp and spoke with every regiment. His address to the garrison of Fort Pulaski is reported; and there has been no such talking to the soldiers in this war.

> "This is a contest for human freedom: a contest for the absolute supremacy of the people: it is a contest in which is arrayed absolute liberty on one hand, and on the other the most hateful and abominable aristocracy."

He told the soldiers their duty as soldiers, in the clearest and most intelligible manner. He continued:

> "A good soldier when he lies down at night conscious of having performed his duty perfectly don't care whether he gets up alive or dead. I want you to understand that you have made a free-will offering of yourselves to your country, and to the great cause of human liberty. Your lives are not your own. My life is not my own." * * * * "Your fortunes are to a certain extent in my keeping. Rest assured that day and night I shall think of you; day and night I shall care for you, and your interests shall be in my thoughts. Rest assured that I shall endeavor to see that you get from the Government all that it has promised you, punctually and systematically. In return, I shall expect from you the most complete and perfect service: the most absolute devotion. When I order you to move, I shall expect you to go forward with spirit and alacrity. When I ask you to attack yonder battery, I shall expect you to march over it, and to plant your bayonets beyond it, halting when the word is given, not before. Now, boys, we understand each other."

Of course they do. There is no stuff in all this. It is not rhetoric copied from Napoleon's bulletins, which is the vice of all our military addresses hitherto. These are the words of a man who is a soldier for a special, heart-felt, and most solemn purpose. They show a leader who is every inch a man and an American, who knows that this rebellion must be stricken and annihilated in every form and force, or it will utterly overthrow the Government either by its arms or its arts.

AN OBJECTION ANSWERED.

"Granting, what no sensible man will dispute, that the President has the constitutional right and power to issue a proclamation, is it not likely to be what he said to the Chicago delegation there was a chance of its being, a Pope's bull against the comet?"

This is a question that many a loyal man asks himself, and it deserves an answer.

As to the President's characteristic expression, it will not be forgotten that he said he was wondering if it might not be so. If he thought it would, he would not issue it. If he thought it would not, he would issue it. As he has done so, it is very clear what he thinks upon that point.

But the positive effects of the step are the declaration of the unhesitating energy and thoroughness with which the war is to be waged. It is the manifesto of a policy. It is the clear announcement that the integrity of the Union is more sacred than Slavery. It says that it will do every thing that it can do to weaken and destroy the rebellion. It informs the rebels in arms that the Government is as determined as they are, and the secret friends of the rebels at the North that they can no longer mask treason in the guise of upholding the President. It sends the conviction, as with a stream of light into every home and heart in the land, that this bloody agony of the nation shall not be in vain; that we shall not have spent these noble lives, nor have quietly endured the restrictions of speech and the habeas corpus, nor have spent our money and mortgaged that of our children, merely to have the rebels win by craft what they have lost by cannon.

While in such ways it is a moral fortification of the Government such as no other step could be, it puts in force the laws of Congress so that henceforward every slave who falls within our lines is free; and any General who assumes to send men within the enemy's lines, either to help them or to be harmed by them, will be disgraced before God and the country. How infamous the conduct of many an officer has been in this matter we all know. They have deliberately thrust men who sought their protection back within the enemy's lines! By what conceivable rule of common sense or of common honor does a General of the United States send men to the enemies of this country to be tortured by them? Still more, why does he send the enemy assistance from our own lines? This stupid crime, at least, is forever stopped.

But while thus the advance of the army advances the lines of liberty, every slave now knows that they are so advanced, and that the nearer the army, the nearer his freedom. The advantage of this knowledge is to be reckoned by every man's common sense. If the Proclamation had issued before the advance of the Western and Southern armies, Alabama, Tennessee, and Mississippi, with Carolina, Georgia, Florida, and Louisiana, would now be held by native black garrisons. They will be so held in the future. Why did Jeff Davis so savagely denounce Generals Hunter and Phelps? Because, as we have said before, he knows what hurts him. He knows where he is weak and must wince if hit. Now if the proclamation of a General in a Department, repudiated by the Government, wounds him so sorely, what is he likely to think of the proclamation of the Government, enforced by all its armies and Generals? He knows, and every man in the South knows, that the news will flash like daybreak all through the world of slaves. It will be as silent but as swift. But if, in time of peace, when there is no hope of successful movement felt by the slaves, the apprehension of the community expresses itself in such laws for the suppression of disorders as fill the slave State statute-books, what will be the condition of that community now?

If slavery be the just, patriarchal, happy, comfortable, and Christian condition of things, most fitted and most delightful to the slaves and to the peace of the country, which its friends and advocates declare it to be, then the Proclamation will produce no uneasiness in the rebellious States. But if it is a wrong, and the slaves feel it to be so, every man knows, whatever he professes, exactly what its operation will be.

WHO IS WHO?

THESE columns, we say, are neither Democratic nor Republican; they are simply Union. Harper's Weekly has no politics; but it has the unswerving loyalty to the Government which every honest citizen and paper owes, and it has a corresponding duty of censure upon all who seek to arouse old party passions.

This effort was deliberately made by Mr. Horatio Seymour, who was lately nominated by Mr. Fernando Wood and his friends for Governor of New York. His speech of acceptance, of which Mr. Fernando Wood said that he "indorsed every word," was neither a plea for the Government, nor a denunciation of the rebellion, nor an appeal to every patriotic heart to strain yet another nerve in saving the country, nor a burning tribute to the brave and noble martyrs in the cause, but a dry, elaborate special plea and justification for the party with which he has acted. No other party, he said, is fitted to carry on the government.

Mr. Seymour provokes a very brief historical reminiscence upon the point of peculiar fitness.

Mr. Buchanan was the late Democratic President. In his Cabinet and by his connivance the rebellion was matured. Mr. Cobb—now a rebel General—was the Democratic Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Floyd—now a rebel General—was the Democratic Secretary of War. Mr. Thompson—a conspicuous rebel instigator—was the Democratic Secretary of the Interior. Mr. Jefferson Davis, the rebel President; Mr. Toombs, his Secretary of State; Mr. Benjamin, his late Secretary of War; Slidell, the rebel emissary in Paris; Mason, the ditto in London; Wigfall, Yulee, Chestnut, and the rest, were Democratic Senators of the United States. The most conspicuous members of that party in the Cabinet and Senate, assisted by representatives of the same faith in the House, organized at the national capital the plot to overthrow the national Government, in which they were assisted by the Democratic Governors of Southern States. For seventeen months the country has, in consequence, been convulsed and desolated by a ferocious war. Every family is bereaved—every citizen is heavily taxed—the prosperity of the nation is paralyzed and its very existence menaced; and every open defender or secret sympathizer with this bloody effort to ruin the Government and the country has been identified solely with the Democratic Party.

The Republican party may be unfitted to direct the Government, but if this record proves that the Democratic party is better fitted, it can only be because words have ceased to have meaning.

The gentleman who brings the charge of unfitness has been selected in New York as the candidate of that party. He prides himself upon having urged the Government to surrender to the rebellion before a shot had been fired. His speech has ample and labored vituperation and accusation—not of the enemies of the country, but of the friends of the Administration which is maintaining the Government. Are his most vehement supporters, in or out of the Convention, the most loyal of Union men? Does he take his stand upon a purely partisan, or a purely patriotic platform? Will, or will not, Jeff Davis in Richmond, Slidell in Paris, and Mason in London, rejoice to hear of his election? and can that which pleases these men really be serviceable to the country in this extremity?

These are not party or political questions. They are questions of the further existence of the Government unawed by rebellion, and unchanged by compromise with rebels in arms.

LYING.

IT is quite time that every body concerned understood that this nation wants to know what has happened, not what might have happened, nor what somebody expected would happen. We don't want official optimism, civil or military, to be telegraphed as news. We are a serious people, engaged in a serious work, and whoever tells us lies does not help us, and hurts himself.

When a battle is fought why will not the General who reports it to the Government, the Government which tells it to the people, and the correspondents who describe it, remember that the questions asked by the people are: Did we whip? Were we whipped? Was it a drawn battle? "Glorious victory" has become as absurd a phrase as "Strategy." Nobody sees those words at the head of the column without a cold shudder as to what he is to find below.

In the late Maryland battles we were informed on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday mornings that we had achieved great and glorious victories: that the rebel army was to be annihilated or captured, and that Lee and Jackson were to be taken by sunset. On Friday morning it appeared that after a series of battles lasting for three or four days we rested upon our arms in face of the full force of the still undefeated enemy, while Harper's Ferry, the key of the position, had been snatched from our grasp.

That we had fought magnificently was most true; that we had lost up to that time two precious lives in Reno and Mansfield; that some of our bravest and best leaders were wounded; that, as General Hooker said, "the carnage was awful;" that we had gained some important advantages; that the opening action, under Hooker and Burnside, at South Mountain was most brilliant: all this was true. But so the rebels had fought well; and while we had some advantages, they had Harper's Ferry; and after the fourth day's fighting the issue was still doubtful. Where, then, was the "glorious victory" which had been thundered in our ears all the week?

Still, the newsmongers of all stations have high authority. When the English line fell back a little at Waterloo, and the final and fatal charge of French cavalry was ordered, Napoleon sent off a courier to Paris with the news of his "glorious victory." But his messenger had hardly left the roar of the battle behind him when the day was lost to France. If we are to imitate Napoleon, however, let it be in his power, not in his weakness; in his battles, not in his bulletins; in his marvelous rapidity, concentration, and persistence, not in his deceit and grandiloquence. This is a war of the people, not of a party, or of a general, or of a clique. Let us have the naked facts, and we can supply them with the necessary rhetoric.

THE TEST QUESTION.

SINCE the war began and the only public question of moment was the maintenance of the Government and the unconditional surrender of the rebellion, we have advocated in these columns the use of every constitutional means to that end. We have urged every man to bear constantly in mind the character and scope of the struggle, and to make every act and vote of his tell in the strongest manner against the rebellion. Whether he were a Republican or a Democrat, we have assumed that he had forgotten those names for the time, and wished to be known only as a patriot. The question of the particular course the ship was to steer was lost in the question of saving the ship itself. We are still engaged in the work. All hands are called to the pumps. The question still is, not shall we sail North or South? but shall we sail at all?

In the coming elections, therefore, the test question is, what result will please the rebels most? Here are candidates for Congress, for Governor, and for other offices. Even allowing that all are equally honest, whose success do Davis, Toombs, & Co. desire?

If you can settle that question, and find those candidates, those are the men you are to vote against. The men whom the rebels most detest, the Generals they most hate, the measures they most denounce, are the men, Generals, and measures for every sincerely and wholly loyal citizen.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

CUTTING off two feet from a man is making short work of him.

"I say, Jim, are there any bears in your country in the winter?" "Y-e-s; the ice bears!"

The herb doctors think that, to be healthy and vigorous, a man, like a tree, must take root.

The young lady who took the gentleman's fancy has returned it with thanks.

The man who attempted to whistle a bar of soap has injured his voice by trying to sing a stave off a barrel.

A railroad conductor, out of employment at present, wants to know when the "Equinoctial line" is to be opened, as he thinks of applying for a situation.

LOVE.—At three years of age we love our mothers; at six, our fathers; at ten, holidays; at sixteen, dress; at twenty, our sweet-hearts; at twenty-five, our wives; at forty, our children; at sixty, ourselves.

"Mr. Smith, I wish to speak to you privately. Permit me to take you apart a few moments."

SMITH (who wasn't the least frightened). "Certainly, Sir, if you'll promise to put me together again."

Mrs. Partington says she has heard of but one old woman who kissed her cow, but she knows of many thousand younger ones who have kissed very great calves.

A preacher in a funeral sermon on a lady, after summing up all her good qualities, added, "that she always reached her husband his hat without muttering."

"I repeat," said a person of questionable veracity, "that I am an honest man." "Yes," was the reply, "and how often will you have to repeat it before you believe it yourself?"

Can knocking a man down with a loaf of bread strictly be called smiting him with the "staff of life?"

THE VERY THING.—"Then I'll bring a suit for my bill," said an enraged tailor to a dandy, who refused to pay him. "Do, my dear fellow!" replied the imperturbable swell, pointing to his threadbare clothes; "that's just what I want."

Why is a man's coat larger when he pulls it out of a carpet-bag? Because he finds it in-creases.

Why is a widower like a house in a state of dilapidation? Because he should be re-paired.

"Don't want you any longer," said an employer to a very tall clerk.

"Look well before you leap," is very good advice in its way; but how can sickly-looking people follow it?

Physicians should make good sailors, they are so thoroughly used to see sickness.

"What blessings children are," as the parish-clerk said when he took the fees for christening them.

A man isn't likely to die from having his head carried away in a fight, if 'tis his legs that carry it away.

Troubles are like dogs—the smaller they are the more they annoy you.

Modesty in woman is like color on her cheeks—decidedly becoming, if not put on.

Why is it vulgar to send a telegram? Because it is making use of flash language.

REAL INN-DEPENDENCE.—Living at a hotel as long as you like, and going away without paying the bill.

Act upon your own conviction, or it may be the sheriff's duty to act upon your conviction before you are much older.

"You look as though you were beside yourself," said a wag to a fop standing by a donkey.

A juryman having applied to the Recorder to be excused from serving, on account of deafness, the latter asked, "Could you not hear my charge to the grand jury, Sir?" "Yes, I heard every word of it," was the reply, "but couldn't make any sense of it."

While thousands fall by clashing swords, ten thousand fall by corset boards; yet giddy females (thoughtless train!) for sake of fashion yield to pain.

A Parisian robber, who was seized in the act of stealing from the shop of a tobacconist, said, by way of excusing himself, that he had never heard of a law which forbade a man to take snuff.

A musical composer having been asked if he had done any thing lately, said, "Yes, my last work was a composition with my creditors."

A theoretically benevolent man, on being asked by a friend to lend him a sovereign, answered briskly, "With pleasure;" but suddenly added, "Dear me, how unfortunate! I've only one lending sovereign, and it is out."

A lively Hibernian exclaimed, at a party where Theodore Hook shone as the evening star, "Och, Master Theodore, but you are the hook that nobody can bate."

Robert Hall was unhappy in his courtship of Miss Steel. While he was yet smarting beneath the disappointment he went out to tea. The lady of the house said, with no very good taste, "You are dull, Mr. Hall; we have no polished steel here to entertain you." "Oh, madam, that's not the slightest consequence; you have plenty of polished brass!"

Among the expedients adopted by the sutlers to sell contraband liquor to the soldiers one is exceedingly novel. They drop a couple of peaches into a bottle of whisky, and sell the compound as "pickled peaches!" A more irreverent expedient is to have a tin can made and painted like a hymn-book, and labeled "The Bosom Companion!"

A one-legged Welsh orator, named Jones, was pretty successful in bantering an Irishman, when the latter asked him, "How did you come to lose your leg?" "Well," said Jones, "on examining my pedigree and looking up my descent, I found there was some Irish blood in me, and becoming convinced it was all settled in that left leg, I had it cut off at once." "Be the powers," said Pat, "it 'ud av been a good thing if it had only settled in yer head."

Why are indolent persons' beds too short for them? Because they are too long in them.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

A PROCLAMATION.

By the President of the United States of America:

Whereas, It has become necessary to call into service, not only volunteers, but also portions of the militia of the States by draft, in order to suppress the insurrection existing in the United States, and disloyal persons are not adequately restrained by the ordinary processes of law from hindering this measure, and from giving aid and comfort in various ways to the insurrection. Now, therefore, be it ordered, that during the existing insurrection, and as a necessary measure for suppressing the same, all rebels and insurgents, their aiders and abettors within the United States, and all persons discouraging volunteer enlistments, resisting militia drafts, or guilty of any disloyal practice affording aid and comfort to the rebels against the authority of the United States, shall be subject to martial law, and liable to trial and punishment by courts-martial or military commission.

Second: That the writ of habeas corpus is suspended in respect to all persons arrested, or who are now, or hereafter during the rebellion shall be, imprisoned in any fort, camp, arsenal, military prisons, or other place of confinement, by any military authority, or by the sentence of any court-martial or military commission.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington, this Twenty-fourth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two, and of the Independence of the United States the eighty-seventh.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

By the President.
WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

There is nothing new from the army of the Potomac. General M'Clellan is encamped on the Maryland side, his army stretching from Williamsport to Harper's Ferry. The rebels are believed to have fallen back in the direction of Winchester. On 26th General Griffin crossed at Blackburn's Ford and made a reconnoissance for a considerable distance without meeting any enemy in force. Several reconnoitring parties have been sent out in the direction of Centreville, but no force of the enemy could be found. A few cannon, abandoned by the rebels in the neighborhood of Manassas, were found and brought in. General Stahel proceeded as far as Brentsville, and dispersed a band of guerrillas who were lurking in that vicinity.

THE WAR IN KENTUCKY.

General Buell with the bulk of his army arrived at Louisville on 25th, having outstripped Bragg, and forced him to fall back toward the east. The two armies are still manœuvring, and a battle is expected somewhere in the Blue Grass country. Whether General Morgan still holds Cumberland Gap, or has advanced to Richmond, Kentucky, is an undecided question. Several of the gaps in the mountains have been closed by detachments from Buell's army. General Buell's army at latest dates was at and about Shepherdsville, and Bragg's near Bardstown. The excitement at Louisville, some account of which is given on page 654, has entirely subsided.

On 22d Colonel M'Cook's cavalry brigade succeeded in recapturing Munfordsville, driving out the rebel cavalry, who lost a colonel and a lieutenant-colonel in the engagement. Our loss was slight.

Several small squads of rebels were captured during the march of Buell's forces.

MURDER OF GENERAL NELSON.

Major-General Wm. Nelson was killed on 29th in Louisville by Brigadier-General J. C. Davis. It is said that Davis met Nelson in the hall of the Galt House, and attempted to speak with him—that Nelson refused to listen, turning away from him. That Davis followed and again addressed him, when Nelson turned and said, "Do you wish to insult me, you cowardly puppy?" and struck him over the head. Davis retired, and got a pistol from another officer, and then pushed through the crowd and shot Nelson through the breast, mortally wounding him. Nelson walked up stairs, saying that he was murdered, and died in about half an hour. From all the statements thus far at hand, it seems that General Nelson treated General Davis with unbearable insult.

REBELS AT AUGUSTA, KENTUCKY.

From Augusta, Kentucky, we are informed that, on a date not named, the place was attacked by 640 mounted rebels, with two cannon, under the command of a brother of the guerrilla John Morgan. The Union forces, under Colonel Bradford, numbering 120 men, took refuge in houses and fired from windows, killing and wounding 90 of the rebels. Among the rebels killed were three captains, one of them a younger brother of John Morgan. Among the rebels mortally wounded was Lieutenant-Colonel Prentice, a son of George D. Prentice, editor and proprietor of the Louisville Journal. Our loss was 9 killed and 15 wounded. The remainder of our forces were taken prisoners. Subsequently a Union force from Maysville intercepted and attacked the rebels, when they fled in a perfect panic. The result of the pursuit has not yet been learned.

THE CONVENTION OF GOVERNORS.

The Convention of the Governors of the loyal States commenced on 25th ult. at Altoona, Pennsylvania. There were sixteen States represented in the Convention, the following Governors neither being present themselves nor sending proxies: E. D. Morgan, Republican, of New York; William A. Buckingham, Republican, of Connecticut; William Burton, Democrat, of Delaware; Charles Robinson, Republican, of Kansas; Austin Blair, Republican, of Michigan; Alexander Ramsay, Republican, of Minnesota; John Whittaker, Democrat, of Oregon; Leland Stanford, Republican, of California. The official record of the Governors' meeting shows that they discussed, and with a single exception adopted, an address to the President setting forth the following points: First. A cordial personal and official respect for the President. Second. A determination, under all circumstances, to support and maintain the President's constitutional authority, the Governors therein speaking for themselves and the people of their respective States. Third. Pledging to the President their aid in all measures calculated to bring the war to an early termination, which should be prosecuted to ultimate victory unless all the rebels should return to their constitutional duty and obedience. Fourth. Congratulating the President upon his Proclamation to emancipate the slaves, believing it will be productive of good as a measure of justice, humanity, and sound policy. Fifth. Referring to the wants of the soldiers who have fought our battles. This address was the whole story; no counter-propositions or amendments were offered; they proposed to bring wounded soldiers to their own homes, suggested reformation in the abuse of furloughs, and agreed that it would be good to have an army of reserve of 100,000 men for future emergencies.

THE LOSS AT ANTIETAM.

Official reports of the killed and wounded in the late battle are published. The total loss of the Union army at the battle of Antietam, in killed, wounded, and missing, has been ascertained to be 10,000, and may be divided as follows:

Loss in General Sumner's corps	5,209
Loss in General Hooker's corps	2,619
Loss in General Burnside's corps	1,600
(Estimated) in General Banks's and Franklin's corps	572
Total	10,000

REBEL VIEWS OF THE MARYLAND CAMPAIGN.

The Richmond Enquirer claims the battle of Antietam as a great rebel victory. It was directed by General Lee in person with 60,000 men in his command. The rebel account makes our force 150,000. General Jackson commanded the left of the rebel line, General Hill the right, and General Longstreet the centre. It is admitted that our artillery was used with fearful effect, and that upon the whole the battle was the most severe of the entire campaign. Two rebel Generals were killed—Stark, of Mississippi, and Branch, of North Carolina—and six others were wounded. The Petersburg Express makes the significant admission that all hopes of Maryland uniting her destinies with the South must now be banished. The experiment to rouse her people to follow the fortunes of the rebel army is proclaimed to have been a dead failure, and the devoted adherence of the State government, the press, and the majority of the people to the Federal Government is acknowledged by the Express.

FORT MORGAN CHALLENGED.

On the afternoon of the 30th the United States gun-boat Winona, Lieutenant Commanding Thornton, ran under the fire of Fort Morgan, which is considered the defense of Mobile, and opened fire on a rebel steamer lying inside, driving off her crew and damaging her greatly by the explosion of an 11-inch shell in her bow. Fort Morgan opened a heavy fire on the Winona, but she escaped unhurt.

AFFAIRS ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

A special dispatch from Helena speaks of an expedition from that place down the Mississippi as far as Napoleon, where our boats were fired upon from Prentiss, a one-horse Mississippi town on the eastern bank. We had seven killed and nine wounded. Our boats shelled the shore, but it is not known what damage was done. At another town—Randolph—on the Mississippi one of our steamers was hailed; the clerk went ashore to know what was wanted, when he was seized by ambushed guerrillas. The boat returned to Memphis for troops, with the intention of obliterating the traitors' nest now known as Randolph.

ANOTHER ORDER FROM GENERAL BUTLER.

General Butler has issued an order forbidding the transfer of property, or rights of property—real, mixed, personal or incorporeal—except necessary food, medicine, and clothing, either by way of sale, gift, pledge, payment, lease or loan, by any inhabitant of the Department who has not returned to his or her allegiance to the United States—the person transferring and the person receiving to be punished by fine or imprisonment, or both. All registers of transfer of certificates of stock or shares in any incorporated or joint stock company or association, in which such person has any interest, are likewise forbidden.

MAINE FILLS HER QUOTAS.

Maine has filled her entire quotas under both calls for 800,000 men. Her quota under the first was 7000, and all the men have been in the field for four weeks past. Under the last call for drafted men, Maine has 9600 men ready, all raised by volunteering, and they have all been in the camps at Portland, Augusta, and Bangor since the 15th inst. They are all ready to move the moment they are uniformed and equipped. Prior to these contributions, Maine had sent over 18,000 men, and, including the 4000 seamen she has given to the navy, she has raised 40,000 men for the Union. The population of Maine is 628,000. She claims the pre-eminence of being the Banner State in raising volunteers.

IOWA DOES THE SAME.

Iowa has filled her quota under the call for 600,000. She has every man in the field by voluntary enlistment, and all for three years or the war.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

REBEL STEAMERS BUILDING.

IT is reported that the Southern rebels are having a large number of war steamers built in England; that they are purchasing steam vessels already finished, and that a steam ram is being constructed in the River Mersey for their service.

A CONFEDERATE CANDIDATE FOR PARLIAMENT.

Mr. Beresford Hope, when seeking an election to Parliament for the borough of Stoke-on-Trent, England, bases his claim to popular support chiefly on his former advocacy of the recognition of the independence of the South in the House of Commons. His arguments were heard with disfavor at first, but the electors were inclined toward his views at the conclusion of his speech. The Manchester politicians, under advice of Mr. Bright, circulated pamphlets against Mr Hope's prospects, on account of his sympathy with the rebels, and the danger of involving England with the United States by such legislation as he advocated.

ITALY.

THE ROMAN QUESTION.

The Roman Question is keeping up a great excitement all through Europe, but no new movement of importance is announced. Garibaldi's wounds are reported to be worse; with regard to his trial, the official paper of Turin announces that justice must take its course.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE first circumstance that occurred at Aldborough after Captain Wragge's departure was destined, at a later period, to lead to serious results.

As soon as her husband's back was turned Mrs. Wragge received the message which he had charged the servant to deliver on leaving the house. She hastened into the parlor bewildered by her stormy interview with the captain, and penitently conscious that she had done wrong, without knowing what the wrong was. If Magdalen's mind had been unoccupied by the one idea of the marriage which now filled it—if she had possessed composure enough to listen to Mrs. Wragge's rambling narrative of what had happened during her interview with the housekeeper—Mrs. Lecount's visit to the wardrobe must, sooner or later, have formed part of the disclosure; and Magdalen, although she might never have guessed the truth, must at least have been warned that there was some element of danger lurking treacherously in the Alpaca dress. As it was, no such consequence as this followed Mrs. Wragge's appearance in the parlor; for no such consequence was now possible.

Events which had happened earlier in the morning, events which had happened for days and weeks past, had vanished as completely from Magdalen's mind as if they had never taken place. The horror of the coming Monday—the merciless certainty implied in the appointment of the day and hour—petrified all feeling in her, and annihilated all thought. Mrs. Wragge made three separate attempts to enter on the subject of the housekeeper's visit. The first time she might as well have addressed herself to the wind or to the sea. The second attempt seemed likely to be more successful. Magdalen sighed, listened for a moment indifferently, and then dismissed the subject. "It doesn't matter," she said. "The end has come all the same. I'm not angry with you. Say no more." Later in the day, from not knowing what else to talk about, Mrs. Wragge tried again. This time Magdalen turned on her impatiently. "For God's sake, don't worry me about trifles! I can't bear it." Mrs. Wragge closed her lips on the spot, and returned to the subject no more. Magdalen, who had been kind to her at all other times, had angrily forbidden it. The captain—utterly ignorant of Mrs. Lecount's interest in the secrets of the wardrobe—had never so much as approached it. All the information that he had extracted from his wife's mental confusion he had extracted by putting direct questions derived purely from the resources of his own knowledge. He had insisted on plain answers, without excuses of any kind; he had carried his point as usual; and his departure the same morning had left him no chance of reopening the question, even if his irritation against his wife had permitted him to do so. There the Alpaca dress hung, neglected in the dark—the unnoticed, unsuspected centre of dangers that were still to come.

Toward the afternoon Mrs. Wragge took courage to start a suggestion of her own—she pleaded for a little turn in the fresh air.

Magdalen passively put on her hat; passively accompanied her companion along the public walk, until they reached its northward extremity. Here the beach was left solitary, and here they sat down side by side on the shingle. It was a bright, exhilarating day; pleasure-boats were sailing on the calm blue water; Aldborough was idling happily afloat and ashore. Mrs. Wragge recovered her spirits in the gayety of the prospect; she amused herself like a child by tossing pebbles into the sea. From time to time she stole a questioning glance at Magdalen, and saw no encouragement in her manner, no change to cordiality in her face. She sat silent on the slope of the shingle, with her elbow on her knee, and her head resting on her hand, looking out over the sea—looking with a rapt attention, and yet with eyes that seemed to notice nothing. Mrs. Wragge wearied of the pebbles, and lost her interest in looking at the pleasure-boats. Her great head began to nod heavily, and she dozed in the warm, drowsy air. When she woke the pleasure-boats were far off, their sails were white specks in the distance. The idlers on the beach were thinned in number; the sun was low in the heaven; the blue sea was darker, and rippled by a breeze. Changes on sky and earth and ocean told of the waning day; change was every where, except close at her side. There Magdalen sat in the same position, with weary eyes that still looked over the sea, and still saw nothing.

"Oh do speak to me!" said Mrs. Wragge.

Magdalen started, and looked about her vacantly.

"It's late," she said, shivering under the first sensation that reached her of the rising breeze. "Come home—you want your tea."

They walked home in silence.

"Don't be angry with me for asking," said Mrs. Wragge, as they sat together at the tea-table. "Are you troubled, my dear, in your mind?"

"Yes," replied Magdalen. "Don't notice me. My trouble will soon be over."

She waited patiently until Mrs. Wragge had made an end of the meal, and then went up stairs to her own room.

"Monday!" she said, as she sat down at her toilet-table. "Something may happen before Monday comes!"

Her fingers wandered mechanically among the brushes and combs, the tiny bottles and cases placed on the table. She set them in order, now in one way, and now in another—then on a sudden pushed them away from her in a heap. For a minute or two her hands remained idle. That interval passed, they grew restless again, and pulled the two little drawers in the table backward and forward in their grooves. Among the trifles laid in one of them was a Prayer-book which had belonged to her at Combe-Raven, and which she had saved with her other relics of the past when she and her sister had taken their farewell of home. She opened the Prayer-book, after a long hesitation, at the Marriage Service, shut it again before she had read a line, and put it back hurriedly in one of the drawers. After turning the key in the lock, she rose and walked to the window.

"The horrible sea!" she said, turning from it with a shudder of disgust. "The lonely, dreary, horrible sea!"

She went back to the drawer and took the Prayer-book out for the second time, half opened it again at the Marriage Service, and impatiently threw it back into the drawer. This time, after turning the lock, she took the key away, walked with it in her hand to the open window, and threw it violently from her into the garden. It fell on a bed thickly planted with flowers. It was invisible: it was lost. The sense of its loss seemed to relieve her.

"Something may happen on Friday; something may happen on Saturday; something may happen on Sunday. Three days still!"

She closed the green shutters outside the window, and drew the curtains, to darken the room still more. Her head felt heavy; her eyes were burning hot. She threw herself on her bed, with a sullen impulse to sleep away the time.

The quiet of the house helped her; the darkness of the room helped her; the stupor of mind into which she had fallen had its effect on her senses: she dropped into a broken sleep. Her restless hands moved incessantly; her head tossed from side to side of the pillow; but still she slept. Ere long words fell by ones and twos from her lips—words whispered in her sleep, growing more and more continuous, more and more articulate, the longer the sleep lasted—words which seemed to calm her restlessness, and to hush her into deeper repose. She smiled; she was in the happy land of dreams—Frank's name escaped her. "Do you love me, Frank?" she whispered. "Oh, my darling, say it again! say it again!"

The time passed, the room grew darker, and still she slumbered and dreamed. Toward sunset—without any noise inside the house or out to account for it—she started up on the bed, awake again in an instant. The drowsy obscurity of the room struck her with terror. She ran to the window, pushed open the shutters, and leaned far out into the evening air and the evening light. Her eyes devoured the trivial sights on the beach; her ears drank in the welcome murmur of the sea. Any thing to deliver her from the waking impressions which her dreams had left! No more darkness; no more repose. Sleep that came mercifully to others came treacherously to her. Sleep had only closed her eyes on the future to open them on the past.

She went down again into the parlor eager to talk—no matter how idly, no matter on what trifles. The room was empty. Perhaps Mrs. Wragge had gone to her work; perhaps she was too tired to talk. Magdalen took her hat from the table and went out. The sea that she had shrunk from a few hours since looked friendly now. How lovely it was in its cool evening blue! What a godlike joy in the happy multitude of waves leaping up to the light of Heaven!

She staid out until the night fell and the stars appeared. The night steadied her.

By slow degrees her mind recovered its balance, and she looked her position unflinchingly in the face. The vain hope that accident might defeat the very end for which of her own free-will she had ceaselessly plotted and toiled vanished and left her, self-dissipated in its own weakness. She knew the true alternative, and faced it. On one side was the revolting ordeal of the marriage; on the other, the abandonment of her purpose. Was it too late to choose between the sacrifice of the purpose and the sacrifice of herself? Yes! too late. The backward path had closed behind her. Time that no wish could change, Time that no prayers could recall, had made her purpose a part of herself: once she had governed it; now it governed her. The more she shrank, the harder she struggled, the more mercilessly it drove her on. No other feeling in her was strong enough to master it—not even the horror that was maddening her—the horror of her marriage.

Toward 9 o'clock she went back to the house.

Walking again!" said Mrs. Wragge, meeting her at the door. "Come in and sit down, my dear. How tired you must be!"

Magdalen smiled, and patted Mrs. Wragge kindly on the shoulder.

"You forget how strong I am," she said. "Nothing hurts me."

She lit her candle, and went up stairs again into her room. As she returned to the old place by her toilet-table, the vain hope in the three days of delay, the vain hope of deliverance by accident, came back to her—this time in a form more tangible than the form which it had hitherto worn.

"Friday, Saturday, Sunday. Something may happen to him; something may happen to me. Something serious—something fatal. One of us may die!"

A sudden change came over her face. She shivered, though there was no cold in the air; she started, though there was no noise to alarm her.

"One of us may die! I may be the one."

She fell into deep thought—roused herself after a while—and, opening the door, called to Mrs. Wragge to come and speak to her.

"You were right in thinking I should fatigue myself," she said. "My walk has been a little too much for me. I feel tired, and I am going to bed. Good-night." She kissed Mrs. Wragge, and softly closed the door again.

After a few turns backward and forward in the room, she abruptly opened her writing-case and began a letter to her sister. The letter grew and grew under her hands; she filled sheet after sheet of note-paper. Her heart was full of her subject: it was her own story addressed to Norah. She shed no tears; she was composed to a quiet sadness. Her pen ran smoothly on. After writing for more than two hours, she left off while the letter was still unfinished. There was no signature attached to it—there was a blank space reserved, to be filled up at some other time. After putting away the case, with the sheets of writing secured inside it, she walked to the window for air, and stood there looking out.

The moon was waning over the sea. The breeze of the earlier hours had died out. On earth and ocean the spirit of the Night brooded in a deep and awful calm.

Her head drooped low on her bosom, and all the view waned before her eyes with the waning moon. She saw no sea, no sky. Death, the Tempter, was busy at her heart; Death, the Tempter, pointed homeward to the grave of her dead parents in Combe-Raven church-yard.

"Nineteen last birthday," she thought; "only nineteen!" She moved away from the window, hesitated, and then looked out again at the view. "The beautiful night!" she said, gratefully; "oh, the beautiful night!"

She left the window and lay down on her bed. Sleep that had come treacherously before came mercifully now—came deep and dreamless, the image of her last waking thought—the image of Death.

Early the next morning Mrs. Wragge went into Magdalen's room, and found that she had risen betimes. She was sitting before the glass, drawing the comb slowly through and through her hair, thoughtful and quiet.

"How do you feel this morning, my dear?" asked Mrs. Wragge. "Quite well again?"

"Yes."

After replying in the affirmative, she stopped, considered for a moment, and suddenly contradicted herself. "No," she said, "not quite well. I am suffering a little from toothache." As she altered her first answer in those words she gave a twist to her hair with the comb, so that it fell forward and hid her face.

At breakfast she was very silent, and she took nothing but a cup of tea.

"Let me go to the chemist's and get something," said Mrs. Wragge.

"No, thank you."

"Do let me!"

"No!"

She refused for the second time, sharply and angrily. As usual, Mrs. Wragge submitted, and let her have her own way. When breakfast was over she rose, without a word of explanation, and went out. Mrs. Wragge watched her from the window, and saw that she took the direction of the chemist's shop.

On reaching the chemist's door she stopped—paused, before entering the shop, and looked in at the window—hesitated, and walked away a little—hesitated again, and took the first turning which led back to the beach.

Without looking about her, without caring what place she chose, she seated herself on the shingle. The only persons who were near to her, in the position she now occupied, were a nurse-maid and two little boys. The youngest of the two had a tiny toy-ship in his hand. After looking at Magdalen for a little while with the quaintest gravity and attention, the boy suddenly approached her, and opened the way to an acquaintance by putting his toy composedly on her lap.

"Look at my ship," said the child, crossing his hands on Magdalen's knee.

She was not usually patient with children. In happier days she would not have met the boy's advance toward her as she met it now. The hard despair in her eyes left them suddenly, her fast-closed lips parted and trembled. She put the ship back into the child's hands, and lifted him on her lap.

"Will you give me a kiss?" she said, faintly.

The boy looked at his ship as if he would rather have kissed the ship.

She repeated the question, repeated it almost humbly. The child put his hand up to her neck and kissed her.

"If I was your sister, would you love me?"

All the misery of her friendless position, all the wasted tenderness of her heart, poured from her in those words.

"Would you love me?" she repeated, hiding her face on the bosom of the child's frock.

"Yes," said the boy. "Look at my ship."

She looked at the ship through her gathering tears.

"What do you call it?" she asked, trying hard to find her way even to the interest of a child.

"I call it Uncle Kirke's ship," said the boy. "Uncle Kirke has gone away."

The name recalled nothing to her memory. No remembrances but old remembrances lived in her now. "Gone?" she repeated absently, thinking what she should say to her little friend next.

"Yes," said the boy. "Gone to China."

Even from the lips of a child that word struck her to the heart. She put Kirke's little nephew off her lap, and instantly left the beach.

As she turned back to the house the struggle of the past night renewed itself in her mind. But the sense of relief which the child had brought to her, the reviving tenderness which she had felt while he sat on her knee, influenced her still. She was conscious of a dawning hope opening freshly on her thoughts, as the boy's innocent eyes had opened on her face when he came to her on the beach. Was it too late to turn back? Once more she asked herself that question, and now for the first time she asked it in doubt.

She ran up to her own room with a lurking distrust in her changed self, which warned her to act, and not to think. Without waiting to remove her shawl or to take off her hat she opened her writing-case, and addressed these lines to Captain Wragge, as fast as her pen could trace them:

"You will find the money I promised you inclosed in this. My resolution has failed me. The horror of marrying him is more than I can face. I have left Aldborough. Pity my weakness, and forget me. Let us never meet again."

With throbbing heart, with eager, trembling fingers, she drew her little white silk bag from her bosom, and took out the bank-notes to inclose them in the letter. Her hand searched impetuously; her hand had lost its discrimination of touch. She grasped the whole contents of the bag in one handful of papers, and drew them out violently, tearing some and disarranging the folds of others. As she threw them down before her on the table the first object that met her eye was her own handwriting, faded already with time. She looked closer, and saw the words she had copied from her dead father's letter—saw the lawyer's brief and terrible commentary on them confronting her at the bottom of the page:

Mr. Vanstone's daughters are Nobody's Children, and the law leaves them helpless at their uncle's mercy.

Her throbbing heart stopped, her trembling hands grew icily quiet. All the Past rose before her in mute overwhelming reproach. She took up the lines which her own hand had written hardly a minute since, and looked at the ink still wet on the letters with a vacant incredulity.

The color that had risen on her cheeks faded from them once more. The hard despair looked out again, cold and glittering, in her tearless eyes. She folded the bank-notes carefully, and put them back in her bag. She pressed the copy of her father's letter to her lips, and returned it to its place, with the bank-notes. When the bag was in her bosom again, she waited a little, with her face hidden in her hands, then deliberately tore up the lines addressed to Captain Wragge. Before the ink was dry the letter lay in fragments on the floor.

"No!" she said, as the last morsel of the torn paper dropped from her hand. "On the way I go there is no turning back."

She rose composedly and left the room. While descending the stairs she met Mrs. Wragge coming up. "Going out again, my dear?" asked Mrs. Wragge. "May I go with you?"

Magdalen's attention wandered. Instead of answering the question, she absently answered her own thoughts.

"Thousands of women marry for money," she said. "Why shouldn't I?"

The helpless perplexity of Mrs. Wragge's face as she spoke those words roused her to a sense of present things.

"My poor dear!" she said, "I puzzle you, don't I? Never mind what I say—all girls talk nonsense; and I'm no better than the rest of them. Come! I'll give you a treat. You shall enjoy yourself while the captain's away. We will have a long drive by ourselves. Put on your smart bonnet, and come with me to the hotel. I'll tell the landlady to put a nice cold dinner into a basket. You shall have all the things you like, and I'll wait on you. When you are an old, old woman, you will remember me kindly, won't you? You will say, 'She wasn't a bad girl; hundreds worse than she was live and prosper, and nobody blames them.' There! there! go and put your bonnet on. Oh, my God, what is my heart made of! How it lives and lives, when other girls' hearts would have died in them long ago!"

In half an hour more she and Mrs. Wragge were seated together in the carriage. One of the horses was restive at starting. "Flog him," she cried, angrily, to the driver. "What are you frightened about? Flog him! Suppose the carriage was upset," she said, turning suddenly to her companion; "and suppose I was thrown out and killed on the spot? Nonsense! don't look at me in that way. I'm like your husband; I have a dash of humor, and I'm only joking."

They were out the whole day. When they reached home again it was after dark. The long succession of hours passed in the fresh air left them both with the same sense of fatigue. Again that night Magdalen slept the deep dreamless sleep of the night before. And so the Friday closed.

Her last thought at night had been the thought which had sustained her throughout the day. She had laid her head on the pillow with the same reckless resolution to submit to the coming trial which had already expressed itself in words when she and Mrs. Wragge met by accident on the stairs. When she woke on the morning of Saturday the resolution was gone. The Friday's thoughts—the Friday's events even—were blotted out of her mind. Once again, creeping chill through the flow of her young blood, she felt the slow and deadly prompting of despair which had come to her in the waning moonlight, which had whispered to her in the awful calm.

"I saw the end as the end must be," she said to herself, "on Thursday night. I have been wrong ever since."

When she and her companion met that morning she reiterated her complaint of suffering from the toothache; she repeated her refusal to allow Mrs. Wragge to procure a remedy; she left the house after breakfast, in the direction of the chemist's shop, exactly as she had left it on the morning before.

This time she entered the shop without an instant's hesitation.

"I have got an attack of toothache," she said abruptly to an elderly man who stood behind the counter.

"May I look at the tooth, Miss?"

"There is no necessity to look. It is a hollow tooth. I think I have caught cold in it."

The chemist recommended various remedies which were in vogue fifteen years since. She declined purchasing any of them.

"I have always found Laudanum relieve the pain better than any thing else," she said, trifling with the bottles on the counter, and looking at them while she spoke, instead of looking at the chemist. "Let me have some Laudanum."

"Certainly, Miss. Excuse my asking the question—it is only a matter of form. You are staying at Aldborough, I think?"

"Yes. I am Miss Bygrave, of North Shingles."

The chemist bowed; and, turning to his shelves, filled an ordinary half-ounce bottle with laudanum immediately. In ascertaining his customer's name and address beforehand the owner of the shop had taken a precaution which was natural to a careful man, but which was by no means universal, under similar circumstances, in the state of the law at that time.

"Shall I put you up a little cotton-wool with the laudanum?" he asked, after he had placed a label on the bottle, and had written a word on it in large letters.

"If you please. What have you just written on the bottle?" She put the question sharply, with something of distrust as well as curiosity in her manner.

The chemist answered the question by turning the label toward her. She saw written on it, in large letters—POISON.

"I like to be on the safe side, Miss," said the old man, smiling. "Very worthy people in other respects are often sadly careless where poisons are concerned."

She began trifling again with the bottles on the counter, and put another question, with an ill-concealed anxiety to hear the answer.

"Is there danger," she asked, "in such a little drop of laudanum as that?"

"There is Death in it, Miss," replied the chemist, quietly.

"Death to a child, or to a person in delicate health?"

"Death to the strongest man in England, let him be who he may."

With that answer the chemist sealed up the bottle in its wrapping of white paper, and handed the laudanum to Magdalen across the counter. She laughed as she took it from him and paid for it.

"There will be no fear of accidents at North Shingles," she said. "I shall keep the bottle locked up in my dressing-case. If it doesn't relieve the pain, I must come to you again and try some other remedy. Good-morning."

"Good-morning, Miss."

She went straight back to the house without once looking up—without noticing any one who passed her. She brushed by Mrs. Wragge in the passage as she might have brushed by a piece of furniture. She ascended the stairs, and caught her foot twice in her dress from sheer inattention to the common precaution of holding it up. The trivial daily interests of life had lost their hold on her already.

In the privacy of her own room she took the bottle from its wrapping, and threw the paper and the cotton-wool into the fire-place. At the moment when she did this there was a knock at the door. She hid the little bottle, and looked up impatiently. Mrs. Wragge came into the room.

"Have you got something for your toothache, my dear?"

"Yes."

"Can I do any thing to help you?"

"No."

Mrs. Wragge still lingered uneasily near the door. Her manner showed plainly that she had something more to say.

"What is it?" asked Magdalen, sharply.

"Don't be angry," said Mrs. Wragge. "I'm not settled in my mind about the captain. He's a great writer—and he hasn't written. He's as quick as lightning—and he hasn't come back. Here's Saturday, and no signs of him. Has he run away, do you think? Has any thing happened to him?"

"I should think not. Go down stairs; I'll come and speak to you about it directly."

As soon as she was alone again Magdalen rose from her chair, advanced toward a cupboard in the room which locked, and paused for a moment, with her hand on the key, in doubt. Mrs. Wragge's appearance had disturbed the whole current of her thoughts. Mrs. Wragge's last question, trifling as it was, had checked her on the verge of the precipice—had roused the old vain hope in her once more of release by accident.

"Why not?" she said. "Why may something not have happened to one of them?"

She placed the laudanum in the cupboard, locked it, and put the key in her pocket. "Time enough still," she thought, "before Monday. I'll wait till the captain comes back."

After some consultation down stairs it was agreed that the servant should sit up that night in expectation of her master's return. The day passed quietly, without events of any kind. Magdalen dreamed away the hours over a book. A weary patience of expectation was all she felt now—the poignant torment of thought was dulled and blunted at last. She passed the day and the evening in the parlor, vaguely conscious of a strange feeling of aversion to going back to her own room. As the night advanced, as the noises ceased indoors and out, her restlessness began to return. She endeavored to quiet herself by reading. Books failed to fix her attention. The newspaper was lying in a corner of the room: she tried the newspaper next.

She looked mechanically at the headings of the articles; she listlessly turned over page after page, until her wandering attention was arrested by the narrative of an execution in a distant part of England. There was nothing to strike her in the story of the crime, and yet she read it. It was a common, horribly-common, act of bloodshed—the murder of a woman in farm-service by a man in the same employment who was jealous of her. He had been convicted on no extraordinary evidence; he had been hanged under no unusual circumstances. He had made his confession, when he knew there was no hope for him, like other criminals of his class; and the newspaper had printed it at the end of the article, in these terms:

> I kept company with the deceased for a year or thereabouts. I said I would marry her when I had money enough. She said I had money enough now. We had a quarrel. She refused to walk out with me any more; she wouldn't draw me my beer; she took up with my fellow-servant, David Crouch. I went to her on the Saturday and said I would marry her as soon as we could be asked in church, if she would give up Crouch. She laughed at me. She turned me out of the wash-house, and the rest of them saw her turn me out. I was not easy in my mind. I went and sat on a gate—the gate on the meadow they call Pettit's Piece. I thought I would shoot her. I went and fetched my gun and loaded it. I went out into Pettit's Piece again. I was hard put to it to make up my mind. I thought I would try my luck—I mean try whether to kill her or not—by throwing up the Spud of the plow into the air. I said to myself, if it falls flat, I'll spare her; if it falls point in the earth, I'll kill her. I took a good swing with it and shied it up. It fell point in the earth. I went and shot her. It was a bad job, but I did it. I did it, as they said I did it at the trial. I hope the Lord will have mercy on me. I wish my mother to have my old clothes. I have no more to say.

In the happier days of her life Magdalen would have passed over the narrative of the execution, and the printed confession which accompanied it, unread—the subject would have failed to attract her. She read the horrible story now—read it with an interest unintelligible to herself. Her attention, which had wandered over higher and better things, followed every sentence of the murderer's hideously direct confession from beginning to end. If the man or the woman had been known to her—if the place had been familiar to her memory—she could hardly have followed the narrative more closely, or have felt a more distinct impression of it left on her mind. She laid down the paper, wondering at herself; she took it up once more and tried to read some other portion of the contents. The effort was useless; her attention wandered again. She threw the paper away and went out into the garden. The night was dark, the stars were few and faint. She could just see the gravel walk—she could just pace it backward and forward between the house-door and the gate.

The confession in the newspaper had taken a fearful hold on her mind. As she paced the walk the black night opened over the sea, and showed her the murderer in the field hurling the Spud of the plow into the air. She ran, shuddering, back to the house. The murderer followed her into the parlor. She seized the candle and went up into her room. The vision of her own distempered fancy followed her to the place where the laudanum was hidden, and vanished there.

It was midnight, and there was no sign yet of the captain's return.

She took from the writing-case the long letter which she had written to Norah, and slowly read it through. The letter quieted her. When she reached the blank space left at the end she hurriedly turned back and began it over again.

One o'clock struck from the church clock, and still the captain never appeared.

She read the letter for the second time: she turned back obstinately, despairingly, and began it for the third time. As she once more reached the last page she looked at her watch. It was a quarter to two. She had just put the watch back in the belt of her dress when there came to her—far off in the stillness of the morning—a sound of wheels.

She dropped the letter, and clasped her cold hands in her lap and listened. The sound came on, faster and faster, nearer and nearer—the trivial sound to all other ears; the sound of Doom to hers. It passed the side of the house; it traveled a little further on; it stopped. She heard a loud knocking—then the opening of a window—then voices—then a long silence—then the wheels again, coming back—then the opening of the door below, and the sound of the captain's voice in the passage.

She could endure it no longer. She opened her door a little way and called to him.

He ran up stairs instantly, astonished that she was not in bed. She spoke to him through the narrow opening of the door, keeping herself hidden behind it, for she was afraid to let him see her face.

"Has any thing gone wrong?" she asked.

"Make your mind easy," he answered. "Nothing has gone wrong."

"Is no accident likely to happen between this and Monday?"

"None whatever. The marriage is a certainty."

"A certainty?"

"Yes."

"Good-night."

She put her hand out through the door. He took it with some little surprise: it was not often in his experience that she gave him her hand of her own accord.

"You have sat up too long," he said, as he felt the clasp of her cold fingers. "I am afraid you will have a bad night—I'm afraid you will not sleep."

She softly closed the door.

"I shall sleep," she said, "sounder than you think for."

It was past two o'clock when she shut herself up alone in her room. Her chair stood in its customary place by the toilet-table. She sat down for a few minutes thoughtfully—then opened her letter to Norah, and turned to the end, where the blank space was left. The last lines written above the space ran thus:

> I have laid my whole heart bare to you; I have hidden nothing. It has come to this. The end I have toiled for at such terrible cost to myself, is an end which I must reach, or die. It is wickedness, madness, what you will—but it is so. There are now two journeys before me to choose between. If I can marry him—the journey to the church. If the profanation of myself is more than I can bear—the journey to the grave!

Under that last sentence she wrote these lines:

> My choice is made. If the cruel law will let you, lay me with my father and mother in the church-yard at home. Farewell, my love! Be always innocent; be always happy. If Frank ever asks about me, say I died forgiving him. Don't grieve long for me, Norah—I am not worth it.

She sealed the letter and addressed it to her sister. The tears gathered in her eyes as she laid it on the table. She waited until her sight was clear again, and then took the bank-notes once more from the little bag in her bosom. After wrapping them in a sheet of note-paper, she wrote Captain Wragge's name on the inclosure, and added these words below it: "Lock the door of my room, and leave me till my sister comes. The money I promised you is in this. You are not to blame; it is my fault, and mine only. If you have any friendly remembrance of me, be kind to your wife for my sake."

After placing the inclosure by the letter to Norah, she rose and looked round the room. Some few little things in it were not in their places. She set them in order, and drew the curtains on either side at the head of her bed. Her own dress was the next object of her scrutiny. It was all as neat, as pure, as prettily arranged as ever. Nothing about her was disordered but her hair. Some tresses had fallen loose on one side of her head; she carefully put them back in their places, with the help of her glass. "How pale I look!" she thought, with a faint smile. "Shall I be paler still when they find me in the morning?"

She went straight to the place where the laudanum was hidden and took it out. The bottle was so small that it lay easily in the palm of her hand. She let it remain there for a little while, and stood looking at it.

"DEATH!" she said. "In this drop of brown drink—DEATH!"

As the words passed her lips an agony of unutterable horror seized on her in an instant. She crossed the room unsteadily, with a maddening confusion in her head, with a suffocating anguish at her heart. She caught at the table to support herself. The faint clink of the bottle, as it fell harmlessly from her loosened grasp and rolled against some porcelain object on the table, struck through her brain like the stroke of a knife. The sound of her own voice, sunk to a whisper—her voice only uttering that one word, Death—rushed in her ears like the rushing of a wind. She dragged herself to the bedside, and rested her head against it, sitting on the floor. "Oh, my life! my life!" she thought; "what is my life worth that I cling to it like this?"

An interval passed, and she felt her strength returning. She raised herself on her knees and hid her face on the bed. She tried to pray—to pray to be forgiven for seeking the refuge of death. Frantic words burst from her lips—words which would have risen to cries if she had not stifled them in the bed-clothes. She started to her feet; despair strengthened her with a headlong fury against herself. In one moment she was back at the table; in another the poison was once more in her hand.

She removed the cork and lifted the bottle to her mouth.

At the first cold touch of the glass on her lips her strong young life leaped up in her leaping blood, and fought with the whole frenzy of its loathing against the close terror of Death. Every active power in the exuberant vital force that was in her rose in revolt against the destruction which her own will would fain have wreaked on her own life. She paused: for the second time she paused in spite of herself. There, in the glorious perfection of her youth and health—there, trembling on the verge of human existence, she stood, with the kiss of the Destroyer close at her lips, and Nature, faithful to its sacred trust, fighting for the salvation of her to the last.

No word passed her lips. Her cheeks flushed deep, her breath came thick and fast. With the poison still in her hand, with the sense that she might faint in another moment, she made for the window and threw back the curtain that covered it.

The new day had risen. The broad, gray dawn flowed in on her over the quiet eastern sea.

She saw the waters, heaving large and silent in the misty calm; she felt the fresh breath of the morning flutter cool on her face. Her strength returned; her mind cleared a little. At the sight of the sea her memory recalled the walk in the garden overnight, and the picture which her distempered fancy had painted on the black void. In thought, she saw the picture again—the murderer hurling the Spud of the plow into the air, and setting the life or death of the woman who had deserted him on the hazard of the falling point. The infection of that terrible superstition seized on her mind as suddenly as the new day had burst on her view. The promise of release which she saw in it from the horror of her own hesitation roused the last energies of her despair. She resolved to end the struggle by setting her life or death on the hazard of a chance.

On what chance?

The sea showed it to her. Dimly distinguishable through the mist she saw a little fleet of coasting vessels slowly drifting toward the house, all following the same direction with the favoring set of the tide. In half an hour—perhaps in less—the fleet would have passed her window. The hands of her watch pointed to four o'clock. She seated herself close at the side of the window, with her back toward the quarter from which the vessels were drifting down on her—with the poison placed on the window-sill and the watch on her lap. For one half hour to come she determined to wait there and count the vessels as they went by. If, in that time, an even number passed her, the sign given should be a sign to live. If the uneven number prevailed, the end should be Death.

With that final resolution she rested her head against the window, and waited for the ships to pass.

The first came—high, dark, and near in the mist—gliding silently over the silent sea. An interval, and the second followed, with the third close after it. Another interval, longer and longer drawn out, and nothing passed. She looked at her watch. Twelve minutes, and three ships. Three.

The fourth came; slower than the rest, larger than the rest, farther off in the mist than the rest. The interval followed—a long interval once more. Then the next vessel passed—darkest and nearest of all. Five. The next uneven number—Five.

She looked at her watch again. Nineteen minutes, and five ships. Twenty minutes, twenty-one, two, three, and no sixth vessel. Twenty-four, and the sixth came by. Twenty-five, twenty-six, twenty-seven, twenty-eight, and the next uneven number—the fatal Seven—glided into view. Two minutes to the end of the half hour. And seven ships.

Twenty-nine, and nothing followed in the wake of the seventh ship. The minute-hand of the watch moved on half-way to thirty, and still the white heaving sea was a misty blank. Without moving her head from the window she took the poison in one hand and raised the watch in the other. As the quick seconds counted each other out, her eyes, as quick as they, looked from the watch to the sea, from the sea to the watch—looked for the last time at the sea—and saw the EIGHTH ship.

Life! At the last moment, Life!

She never moved; she never spoke. The death of thought, the death of feeling, seemed to have come to her already. She put back the poison mechanically on the ledge of the window, and watched, as in a dream, the ship gliding smoothly on its silent way—gliding till it melted dimly into shadow—gliding till it was lost in the mist.

The strain on her mind relaxed when the Messenger of Life had passed from her sight.

"Providence?" she whispered, faintly to herself. "Or Chance?"

Her eyes closed and her head fell back. When the sense of life returned to her the morning sun was warm on her face—the blue heaven looked down on her—and the sea was a sea of gold.

She fell on her knees at the window and burst into tears.

* * * * * * * *

Toward noon that day, the captain, waiting below stairs, and hearing no movement in Magdalen's room, felt uneasy at the long silence. He desired the new maid to follow him up stairs, and, pointing to the door, told her to go in softly, and see whether her mistress was awake.

The maid entered the room, remained there a moment, and came out again, closing the door gently.

"She looks beautiful, Sir," said the girl; "and she's sleeping as quietly as a new-born child."

THE WAR IN THE SOUTHWEST.

ON page 651 we publish several illustrations of JACKSON, TENNESSEE, and of SCENES ON THE RAILROAD between Columbus and Corinth, from sketches by our special artist, Mr. Alexander Simplot. Mr. Simplot writes:

"CORINTH, September 19, 1862.

"I herewith send you a couple of sketches from Jackson, Tennessee. This place is the largest on the railroad from Columbus to Corinth, and is a fine town. Pretty dwellings embowered in trees meet the eye at almost every turn.

"Brigadier-General John A. Logan has command of the post, and is fortifying it very strongly.

"The enemy is known to have a great desire to repossess the town, and an attack from them is momentarily expected. All the streets entering into the city are barricaded with cotton bales, and, from appearance, are fully sufficient to oppose the ingress of a very large force.

"Near the dépôt is a cotton fort—a sketch of which I send you—for the protection of that portion of the town. It is amply provided with water reservoirs, in the shape of barrels sunk into the ground, to stand a long siege.

"An engineer on General Logan's staff has constructed an admirable railroad battery for the protection of the road from guerrilla raids. They have as yet had but one occasion to use it, and that was at Henderson, a few days since, where the woods were shelled sufficiently to make it too hot to hold the rebels. At every trestle-work or bridge along the road are stationed a few soldiers as guard, and it is to this we owe our security as we go dashing along at a headlong pace."

THE LOUISVILLE SCARE.

On the preceding page we reproduce a picture of Mr. Meeker's representing the

PARTIAL EVACUATION OF LOUISVILLE

by the women and children, in consequence of the approach of Bragg's army. On the 23d September General Nelson issued the following order, in addition to which the scare with a declaration that all probability it would become necessary to evacuate the city:

HEADQUARTERS, ARMY OF KENTUCKY,
LOUISVILLE, SEPT. 23, 1862.

The women and children of this city will prepare to leave the city without delay. By order of GENERAL NELSON.
J. EDWARD STACEY, A. A. G.

SPECIAL ORDERS—No. 22.

HEADQUARTERS, ARMY OF KENTUCKY,
LOUISVILLE, SEPT. 23, 1862.

1. The Jeffersonville Ferry will be used exclusively for military purposes. Private vehicles will not be allowed to go aboard of the ferry-boats without a special permit from these head-quarters. Persons on foot will pass as usual. This order will go into effect at 12 M. to-day.

By command of
J. EDWARD STACEY, A. A. A. G.

The publication of these orders created a terrible flurry at Louisville, and General Nelson has been much blamed for issuing them. But they may have helped to convince Bragg of the hopelessness of his enterprise, for he would not naturally care to cause the destruction of such a city as Louisville, and the order showed him plainly that the place would not be evacuated. On news being received of the retreat of the enemy business was resumed, and the people of Louisville returned to their homes.

IN EARNEST.

HERMY and there was a rift of grayish cloud formed with the sunset, but the rain fell in sheets of cloud hills, not with sweety buss and glowing tops, but sullen inky forms; all the country round lay in one sodden desert stretch, water running with tiny foam crests, wind moaning; all the landscape hushed and sad, as if waiting in silent conversation for the mischief that air and wave were brewing.

It was only on the very lowly of the great Barnole's left the drawing-room because there was a fire in the library, and as some one said, "it was such a comfort to get cedar shavings enough for all the bright things were not dead." They were gossiping and lounging in the library, and the bright pine cracken in purpose and vacant in heart will, while apart in the window, half behind the curtains, Maisel Winthrop told slowly to

"No danger shall affright, no difficulties intimidate me, and in the support of our rights we are called to encounter even death, we will not be daunted, sensible that he can not die too soon who has done well for the support of the rights and liberties of his country."

That was what the American David said in 17— to the English Goliah, the assured words of men who have the truth and are in earnest about it.

"Are any of us in such solemn earnest?" thought Mabel, sighing, as she looked around her.

There was Del Cameron and her brother Reginald in the alcove of one of the bay windows, for a low-spoken word she had turned her head half away, her color slightly heightened, her eyes with the slight quiver of the full lips, the gleam in the downcast eyes; it was only another flirtation on the lis of Del's foolish that season of it, and Reginald, for what or whom did he care? Mabel, his sister, could hardly know as yet. He was an Eastern story, he had angled for gold and silver fish that turned black in the frying, and died utstering threat of prophecy; he had plucked apples of Sodom and fed on ashes; he had ridden enchanted horses of dumsy to dizzy height of exhilaration, and returned to earth with the eye of Faith put out; at last coldly resigned himself to exist.

Then was Viola Bernole and Alice current enough about each other; nuccing Mayne Warren certainly in earnest about Isabel Stewart's fortune, it hardly seemed to matter which; Hesperia, wife of Grant Barnole, and other cadet matrons enthusiastic over their babies and their husband's promotions; in a corner Grant Barnole and Jack Delaunay discussing a military reputation after approved fifth-table cancen, and having it well down at last every body closed in at the death with his or her particular thrust.

Mabel listened with eyes growing suspiciously soft and dark, like the summer sky before rain, and at last—

"Do you think people talked like that in 1775?" came out from the window in a voice a little impatient and tremulous.

Every body stared blankly, trying to piece the question and the conversation together. Reginald found the clew first in the book still lying open on her lap.

"Oh! you have been reading up; but your history knows nothing of the tea-table gossip and about-the-fire that. Hearts were made of much the same stuff than as now."

"Yes; but there is a difference. I can't explain, but I can feel it.

Reginald seemed to dismiss the subject with a careless jest, but Mabel turned toward him with a distressed and quivering face that he stopped short; and she looked disliked impatience, and suddenly the infection of her pain, waking feelings forgotten under the tea-spoon of his selfish wakefulness, followed by words crisp and stinging.

"You are right. Those queer, prim-powdered people were in desperate, deadly earnest, and we are not. That is just the difference."

Half a dozen voices broke out in full cry, "Not in earnest!"—the very thing that every body is talking about, that the papers are urging.

"Exactly," replying—every face urging somebody else. The Government — the army — the mass—our neighbors—my own but ourselves. It is high time for somebody to do it, and there is very much in earnest indeed. The handwriting is already on the wall. If some one don't bestir himself, who knows how soon the fun will come crashing in among us? One man or woman's effort is but a drop toward the wave, therefore valueless; but if enterprise could only infect us in the lump—by thirties and forties—because there is such desperate necessity that somebody should do something to tighten that mischievous screw that is turned 'loose' in every one's mouth, and near no one's grasp."

People sat aghast—partly at the heresy, partly at the source. Speech could have been expected from the marble-lipped Plato over their heads with as much reason as any young person like Reginald Winthrop.

Mabel left her seat to cover to him and take his hand in both of hers.

"Why not be in earnest, then? You who, if you would—"

He placed a finger on her lips.

"Have I ever announced myself as a candidate for martyrdom? and besides, though I call our vanity at vaulties loudly as any Solomon, am I such a shuttlekin in the stock, drawing my dividends with tolerable complacency? I kindle sometimes at noble possibilities, just as I like a ballet, with much of the same reason—our mother sang it. We have all had our dreams, and perhaps it is now that for the middle-aged imaginations are stupified; but facts or dreams, they are dead enough now, make our playthetics as broad as we will, and see you are getting tired."

"I don't believe it, I won't believe it!" burst out Mabel, quite passionately.

"You need not," said a quiet voice, as a gentleman who had entered during the discussion now came forward. "You do not believe, and if we are, it is not of necessity."

Mabel rose up cross and excited.

"Oh! Dr. Philips. Now you will help me."

(Reginald, cool and half displeased), "But we never met discussing here."

"That, however, is your creed."

"If you mean that I believe that each man and woman is entitled to the full enjoyment of life and interest, the only difference lying between base and lofty enjoyment—yes, I suppose I do."

"We are so many spoiled children newly come to an estate contested and in confusion; we have yet to earn that we are worthy to enjoy it, and we are too slow in coming to knowledge of the truth; but the estate is left to us, and we shall not, and will not lift our birthright of liberty for a mess of pottage. God gave it us, and by his grace we will preserve it."

"From which I infer that Dr. Philips has volunteered for performing his share of the work," said Reginald, smoothly.

"I have. I am here to spend my last day with you all."

The answer was most unexpected. Every one started a little, but still Reginald was incredulous.

"Do you mean to enlist, or is it a medical mission?"—which, translated by the air of eye and lip, meant in the ranks, vulgar, "If it is not so very serious in a country doctor to accept an opening to distinction."

"Yes, as a private."

This time people gasped, as after a shower-bath, and Grant said with a little irritation—

"Thorston, I believe that you are in the incipient stages of brain fever, and that I should be justified in ordering you to bed, even without a physician."

A smile, sweet but how unutterably sad, shone out in the clear blue eyes.

"Et tu Brute! don't you see that any gentlemen that can be spared must, scores can as a private."

"But the degradation! the association!" said Grant cool and sarcastic as he had plucked apples of Sodom and fed on ashes; he had ridden enchanted horses of dumsy to dizzy height of exhilaration, and returned to earth with the eye of Faith put out; at last coldly resigned himself to exist.

Then was Viola Bernole and Alice current enough about each other; nuccing Mayne Warren certainly in earnest about Isabel Stewart's fortune, it hardly seemed to matter which; Hesperia, wife of Grant Barnole, and other cadet matrons enthusiastic over their babies and their husband's promotions; in a corner Grant Barnole and Jack Delaunay discussing a military reputation after approved fifth-table cancen, and having it well down at last every body closed in at the death with his or her particular thrust.

Mabel listened with eyes growing suspiciously soft and dark, like the summer sky before rain, and at last—

"Do you think people talked like that in 1775?" came out from the window in a voice a little impatient and tremulous.

Every body stared blankly, trying to piece the question and the conversation together. Reginald found the clew first in the book still lying open on her lap.

"Oh! you have been reading up; but your history knows nothing of the tea-table gossip and about-the-fire that. Hearts were made of much the same stuff than as now."

"Yes; but there is a difference. I can't explain, but I can feel it.

Reginald seemed to dismiss the subject with a careless jest, but Mabel turned toward him with a distressed and quivering face that he stopped short; and she looked disliked impatience, and suddenly the infection of her pain, waking feelings forgotten under the tea-spoon of his selfish wakefulness, followed by words crisp and stinging.

"You are right. Those queer, prim-powdered people were in desperate, deadly earnest, and we are not. That is just the difference."

Half a dozen voices broke out in full cry, "Not in earnest!"—the very thing that every body is talking about, that the papers are urging.

"Exactly," replying—every face urging somebody else. The Government — the army — the mass—our neighbors—my own but ourselves. It is high time for somebody to do it, and there is very much in earnest indeed. The handwriting is already on the wall. If some one don't bestir himself, who knows how soon the fun will come crashing in among us? One man or woman's effort is but a drop toward the wave, therefore valueless; but if enterprise could only infect us in the lump—by thirties and forties—because there is such desperate necessity that somebody should do something to tighten that mischievous screw that is turned 'loose' in every one's mouth, and near no one's grasp."

People sat aghast—partly at the heresy, partly at the source. Speech could have been expected from the marble-lipped Plato over their heads with as much reason as any young person like Reginald Winthrop.

Mabel left her seat to cover to him and take his hand in both of hers.

"Why not be in earnest, then? You who, if you would—"

He placed a finger on her lips.

"Have I ever announced myself as a candidate for martyrdom? and besides, though I call our vanity at vaulties loudly as any Solomon, am I such a shuttlekin in the stock, drawing my dividends with tolerable complacency? I kindle sometimes at noble possibilities, just as I like a ballet, with much of the same reason—our mother sang it. We have all had our dreams, and perhaps it is now that for the middle-aged imaginations are stupified; but facts or dreams, they are dead enough now, make our playthetics as broad as we will, and see you are getting tired."

"I don't believe it, I won't believe it!" burst out Mabel, quite passionately.

"You need not," said a quiet voice, as a gentleman who had entered during the discussion now came forward. "You do not believe, and if we are, it is not of necessity."

Mabel rose up cross and excited.

"Oh! Dr. Philips. Now you will help me."

(Reginald, cool and half displeased), "But we never met discussing here."

"That, however, is your creed."

"If you mean that I believe that each man and woman is entitled to the full enjoyment of life and interest, the only difference lying between base and lofty enjoyment—yes, I suppose I do."

"We are so many spoiled children newly come to an estate contested and in confusion; we have yet to earn that we are worthy to enjoy it, and we are too slow in coming to knowledge of the truth; but the estate is left to us, and we shall not, and will not lift our birthright of liberty for a mess of pottage. God gave it us, and by his grace we will preserve it."

"From which I infer that Dr. Philips has volunteered for performing his share of the work," said Reginald, smoothly.

"I have. I am here to spend my last day with you all."

The answer was most unexpected. Every one started a little, but still Reginald was incredulous.

"Do you mean to enlist, or is it a medical mission?"—which, translated by the air of eye and lip, meant in the ranks, vulgar, "If it is not so very serious in a country doctor to accept an opening to distinction."

"Yes, as a private."

This time people gasped, as after a shower-bath, and Grant said with a little irritation—

"Thorston, I believe that you are in the incipient stages of brain fever, and that I should be justified in ordering you to bed, even without a physician."

A smile, sweet but how unutterably sad, shone out in the clear blue eyes.

"Et tu Brute! don't you see that any gentlemen that can be spared must, scores can as a private."

"But the degradation! the association!" said Grant cool and sarcastic as he had plucked apples of Sodom and fed on ashes; he had ridden enchanted horses of dumsy to dizzy height of exhilaration, and returned to earth with the eye of Faith put out; at last coldly resigned himself to exist.

Then was Viola Bernole and Alice current enough about each other; nuccing Mayne Warren certainly in earnest about Isabel Stewart's fortune, it hardly seemed to matter which; Hesperia, wife of Grant Barnole, and other cadet matrons enthusiastic over their babies and their husband's promotions; in a corner Grant Barnole and Jack Delaunay discussing a military reputation after approved fifth-table cancen, and having it well down at last every body closed in at the death with his or her particular thrust.

She sat down before her dressing-table, her long hair falling all about her slender waist, her chin supported in her hands, staring fixedly into the glass, and Hesperia, who had followed, watching her under pretense of playing with her fat golden haired baby, and chattering something after this fashion.

"When are you going to town, Mabel? I am in a hurry for Le Monsieur. Some one told me they mean to wear short cloaks. Won't it be dreadful?"

"Very."

"Do you like them?"

"Yes, I suppose so."

"Then I suppose that you suppose that you like them; which do you mean, Belle?"

"I—don't—what were you saying?"

"That it is such a pity that Thornton Philips is going."

Mabel jumped up and began to do up her hair with energy.

"You will lose a good physician."

"Do you know," went on Hesperia, as if entirely absorbed in her own speculations, "that I think we are going—Ella, stop, was there ever such a mischief?—going to develop a romance? Del Cameron, I think, really likes Thornton.—Don't you, Mabel? Ella—Belle has some queer ideas of nobility, and the love of a man like him might make of her a true-hearted woman."

"I am sure I don't see what it has to do with my heart," answers Mabel with unusual distinctness, very busy and preoccupied with her hair, which crowds into her hair very hard indeed, at which deepchesting Hesperia put down her head to indulge in a little giggle, and she went on baby.

"Only I must say," went on this consistent Mabel, from under the floating white shirt just then going over her head, "that there is a certain degree of propriety to be expected even from Del Cameron—there is a limit to her thought (cottoning up her dress vigorously) that Thornton Philips had too much sense to make himself so ridiculous."

"Oh! but I think we are never sensible, my dear; with which axiom the two ladies go down the broad staircase together.

Hitherto I have said nothing of Mabel's beauty, because I hardly knew how to translate into words her bright and delicate style, or thought to seize and locate. I might, like Olivia, give an inventory of features—their color, form, eyes, line top lip indifferent red, and still you would not see Mabel. It was a certain morning—seeming as if she had just dawned from somewhere, with a look as a child's eyes have just waked, and with the sweet solemnity of the day-spell still upon it, that was the subtle secret of her attraction, which made the people in the drawing-room below start a little, as though they had not seen her exactly in that light before.

Del Cameron with one glance (feminine) took in every thing, from the soft rolls of hair and mistaken dress to the pure calm enthroned on her forehead, and her face lengthened visibly, but blind Thornton Philips saw nothing. He was busy looking into Del's blue eyes and singing "How can I leave thee?" with an emphasis.

Reginald, in the background, viewed in the light of the conversation near the book-case, was unconscious, but Mabel, who had been provided with a meaning smile to Thornton, who nothing daunted turned to Del with

"Will it be a ta ta thy heart

And think of me."

"Brava!" cried Reginald, as Del took the favor at which that young lady had the grace to blush.

"No, eleven, isn't this?" asked Jack Delaunay, who had always admired Mabel, coming to sit by her on the sofa.

"What do you mean?"

"Simply that Mabel is Del's eleventh flirtation. I have been keeping count. There was Charlie Stevens, and Jenkins—"

"Spare the list! I will take your word."

"I think, though, this is serious. Del has been angling for Thornton all summer, simply because he fought shy of her; and now, if he is in love, I suppose that she is."

"You call that love?"

"Why not? There are half a dozen different kinds of love. It has its varieties, like the rose, and fever, or any other epidemic. There is the mushroom growth—for example, when the Champagne sort, the slow product of years, the fierce passion that lives cycles in a week, the deep self-sacrificing devotion that lasts for life and soul, and then— There is the dinner-bell. Permit me to leave you."

That was a lamentable dinner indeed. They sat opposite Thornton and Del. If Mabel turned every body seemed to think that she was cold, and looked she was afraid that she should care. She could not keep her wandering attention on Jack Delaunay, who was grave piqued and sullen; but it was hardly over when the Doctor came to bid her good-by.

"Miss Winthrop, you will not refuse me a game of chess—our last, perhaps," at the same time commencing to arrange the pieces as if nothing was impossible.

The table stood a little apart in the recess of a window opening directly on the grounds. The light curtains, lifting and swaying with little puffs of wind, shut in the rest of the drawing-room in a measure. Jack Delaunay and Del walked away; Reginald, engaged with a book, left Mabel quite alone; and having neared nature, though ever so little, felt in her truthful presence the utter pitiableness of the whole scene existing. Thornton certainly Mabel had thrown aside her smile and carelessness look like a mask, and sat sober and silent, looking down at the board; while the keen, cold speculation that had dwelt in the Doctor's eyes all day melted away into soft depths of feeling, and his voice trembled slightly when he commenced to play.

"Miss Mabel, suppose we try and add interest to the game by putting on stakes. Say, for instance, that, if I win, you will—you will—"

Mabel looked and crimsoned on the instant. It was the betrothal ring of the Thorntons—diamonds in an antique setting, with their motto, "Fidelis," graved on the gold. His eyes were fixed full on her, questioning, yet combating also resistance on her part. Impossible now to assume coldness; her first look had betrayed her; more impossible to meet his eyes. He had made the first move, and was waiting for her.

"And how if you lose?" she asked, with a faint hope of hurrying the affair into a jest.

"I shall not lose."

Now, if the floor would but have had bowels of compassion and opened to receive her, or an accommodating fairy godmother had only been on hand to whisk her into the chimney, it was pitiless. He would smile his triumph into her very eyes, the eyes that had kept him at such cool distance all summer. Del Zenobia chained to the drawing-wheels chafed more fiercely. With heart and soul she vowed to herself that he should not win. She was no contemptible player, and she bent all her energies on the game, but she was flurried, and her nervousness could not be determined; and so at last her heart gave a sudden quivering throb and was still, and even Thornton's steady face gleamed and quivered as he said under his breath, "Checkmate."

Some one parted the curtains, and bright golden hair and pink cheeks showed themselves in the opening. Del Cameron come to look after them.

"Who wins? What an age you have been!"

Mabel looked in dismay, but the fatal thing was gone, and the next moment half the chessmen were swept off by a careless touch of Thornton's. On one face he bent to recover them, and Mabel felt her hand seized under the table and pressed to a quickened lip, as she herself was slipped on her finger, emblem of what? She dared not look at it, but slipped away, and left the window to Del and Thornton.

The twilight was almost over, the drawing-room already lighted, and Mabel, sitting in the shadow of the lamps, the thing on her finger sparkled as if flashing out a laugh at her. Ethel, talking with Jack Delaunay and Hesperia, was in full career.

"How odd, and how pretty! Have you ever seen that ring before, Belle? I have never seen it."

Mabel's cheeks grew warm again. Hesperia smiled incredulously. Jack Delaunay looked pale, blank and smile, and his face grew dark.

"My mamma wore it many years, Miss Ethel," he said, with a world of meaning. "I have seen it before. It is not easily forgotten."

"It is an unusual pattern," said Ethel, indifferently, passing on into the hall lighted only by dim flame, and cool with the damp night-breeze. Out on the wide piazza the still night was moaning, sighing and brooding low over the earth, like a tender mother hearing over her cradle the sleeping babes. The vines hardly rustled on the trellis, and one could scarce have guessed at the neighboring ocean but for the light that here mirrored in its dark surface; but as she looked through the branches of a lately planted tree, a faint glimmer, and streamed from behind a jagged boulder of cloud up into the dark heavens a sudden glory, flowing up in golden and crimson and transparency and vapor islet, and throbbing in glancing ripples over the still water. At the moment Thornton's voice sounded behind her: "I have been looking for you. Here is your shawl."

"Oh, did I? I am glad you came. I wanted to give you 'this.'"

"This" was the ring. Thornton put it gravely back.

"One moment, Mabel, till I say what I exact more determinedly than I did. All this summer you have halted between two opinions. You did not hate me absolutely, I think, but always sounded in your ears that old 'Ought' and 'Duty' and 'Right,' and if ever at any time check began to glow and eye to kindle, you stiffened and kept down propriety. Now it is even worse. It will be 'a private in the army,' or at best "a commander in chief" at the front. Mabel, you are in my heart to live and die for you. If you will trust me, with God's help I will make your happiness. Choose now. Keep or give back the ring. I shall know how to interpret it."

The little hand had been extended was withdrawn, slowly, tremblingly, to cover a bowed and averted face, and then followed a hush, broken at last by Thornton: "I had forgotten in my selfishness. I have news for you."

"For me?"

"Yes. Reginald is going with me."

"As what?"

"A private."

It was too stupendous. Mabel received it by fibbs; takes fainting and recovering by turns; and now even when she read, as doubtless you did, reader, a few days ago, the two beloved names in a corner of a daily paper, the unpretending list of a few men who are in earnest.

THE BATTLE OF ANTIETAM.

We devote several pages this week to illustrations of the great BATTLE OF ANTIETAM, from sketches by our artist, Mr. A. R. Waud.

The long picture across pages 648 and 649 represents

THE BATTLE-FIELD ON THE RIGHT, WITH GEN. SUMNER'S CORPS JUST ENTERING INTO POSITION.

It was just at this moment that the General was killed. Mr. Waud writes:

"The battle-field is represented the woods on the left from which Hooker so gallantly drove the left wing of the rebel army, and also the woods on the right in which they took refuge, and which they subsequently held till they retreated, repulsing the efforts of our troops to drive them out. The fields between these woods were twice fought over, and thickly strewn with the dead and wounded. General Mansfield's corps is that where he is represented with his staff. In the corn-field beyond a battery is shown, drawn and firing. The infantry, in the front, lying down, is the Forty-third New York Volunteers; beyond, in line-of-battle, the Third Wisconsin and Sixteenth Indiana. Toward the centre the brave Thirty-second New York Volunteers, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Pinto, can be seen engaging the enemy's line; while in the distance the smoke of battle rises from the centre in all directions. The distant mountains are the same on which the battle of the Sunday previous was fought."

The Herald account says:

The army corps which has been under General Banks since the withdrawal of Gen. McClellan's forces to the vicinity of Washington was assigned to the command of the veteran General Sumner. It consists of three divisions, under the respective Generals Williams, Augur and Hooker, and is known in the name of action in close columns of companies, entering the field with a single line of battle, and with a strong reserve. General Williams's division occupied the right of the column on the left when the enemy opened the attack in the morning. The battle was raging fiercely on the right when our corps came up. With remarkable alacrity the divisions were placed in position, ready to push on to the contest. Four regiments of Williams's division being heavily, and sustained was required. Rapidly the regiments moved into position and were soon in the thick of the fight. General Mansfield was unfortunately wounded while directing the formation of his forces. A rebel sharp-shooter, seeing him mounted in front, within range of an excellent rifle, and evidently with a good eye, fired, and the bullet struck him in the breast. As a general officer, and a man of character and worth, he was deservedly held in high esteem by the whole army, and his wound was received in the most honorable manner, and becomes engaged in the important operations of the day. Immediately on the corps coming into action General Williams, being senior officer, assumed command of the corps, and General Gordon, of the First brigade, made a brigade, took charge of his division. The corps was formed in line of battle in the rear of Hooker's division, and entered a portion of that officer's brave but decimated regiments.

On page 644 we give the CENTRE OF THE FIGHT.

Mr. Wood says: "At this point, in the course of the day, four batteries were posted in turn. They were chosen to represent the First Maryland Battery, which fought like fury for about two hours, and was put in the work of driving the invader from its native land, testifying to Maryland's loyalty by hard blows for the Union. Its battery was raised in Baltimore, and is armed with eight rifled light Parrott guns. In the picture is represented the ground upon which one of the rebel division lines was formed, the dead lying so thick as to mark distinctly their position right across the field. Here, on the right is a church on the edge of the rebel position in the woods, and in front of the church, the body of wife was enormous, the little road in front being filled (as well as the adjacent fields) with corpses. Turned the other way, the sketch is taken on the orchard, where there was some awful fighting, the dead lying piled up in groups. The lines were formed along the little hills from which the ground rises rising, where M'Clellan's artillery shelled the rebel positions with a murderous precision. The shells had one or two batteries badly used up in the fields near the little white church, among them the Sixth Pennsylvania Cavalry; but as the rebels retain claim the honor of their destruction, it will be yet as well perhaps to leave it an open question."

On page 641 we illustrate the

COURT OF HIGH DIGNITARIES OF SHARPSBURG,

who had no notion of being "delivered" by Jeff Davis. Mr. Wood says: "Sharpsburg contains a population of about 2000, mostly Germans, the exceptions being very few. It suffered considerable in the recent battle, several buildings being burned, one of them being destroyed by the explosion of the rebel soldiers who were cooking in it. All that was eatable they ate in Sharpsburg the night, and furniture they destroyed, even digging up things which the inhabitants had cached. Most of the citizens left the town with their wives and children, hiding in the surrounding country till the rebel horde had left. The inhabitants generally remained and pointed out to the Southern rebels the houses of prominent Union men, it is to be hoped will be dealt with as they deserve. It would be a good idea to confiscate their goods for the benefit of the sufferers."

On page 648 we give an illustration of the

BURNING OF MUNNA'S MILLS.

Mr. Wood writes: "The burned mills are seen in the centre of the picture. In the foreground is the Twelfth New York Volunteers, protected in the bed of the canal (from which most of the water has been run off) from the fire of the enemy's sharpshooters, which the color-bearer is endeavoring to drive. The colors, presented to the regiment by the ladies of Syracuse, bear marks of shot and shell, and are as battle-scarred and worn that it would be difficult for the before-mentioned ladies to recognize them now."

Sharpsburg is almost entirely destroyed. A fellow correspondent says:

Nothing through Sharpsburg can be struck with the appearance of the village. You will remember it was occupied for several hours on Wednesday morning by the rebels, by Burnside's artillery. The terrible effects of the fire were instantly seen the moment we entered the town. Scarcely a house remained untouched. Chimneys were knocked down, fences were demolished, roofs riddled up and carried off, and almost every form of damage possible to conceive of as the result of a fierce cannonade was seen street. The large church, standing upon the left hand as the right of the village, was fairly riddled with shot and battered so terribly that a new edifice will have to be erected on the broken ground. Shells were found in the heart of the town had fourteen shots cut through them. Strange to say that to all this destruction and ruin of the village was killed or wounded. All did not leave, many remain shelter in the cellars of their houses.

On page 652 we publish a picture representing

THE CORN-EXCHANGE REGIMENT CROSSING THE POTOMAC,

in the advance of Fitz John Porter's corps. Mr. Wood writes: "This splendid regiment was one of those which crossed to reconnoitre the enemy's position on the opposite side, the whole brigade shortly engaging from the large force which the enemy brought against it. Some killed and a number of wounded were left on the opposite side, and were not brought over till the next day, when the rebel sharp-shooters having failed to prevent their use for some time, a number of the men went over and brought the wounded back."

Another picture on page 649, introduces us to the

HORRORS OF THE BATTLE-FIELD.

A World correspondent says:

The severest fighting of the war was followed by the most appalling sights upon the battle-field. Never, I believe, was the ground strewn with the bodies of the dead and the limbs of the wounded as upon the ridges and hillsides. Let those who desire to witness a great battle, and gratify themselves with a sight of the pomp and circumstance of war, go there, but let not the cries and groans of the wounded, and see the piles of dead men, in attitudes which show the terrible agony in which they died, distorted with the pains which afflicted the dead in their violent moments, be forgotten. Every orchard, wood, ditch, arms and legs torn from the body or the body itself torn asunder, and the whole ground, for the space of many hills, fill one with horror and sadness, and they will be content to leave the glorious pomp and circumstance of war to others, when they think upon the horrors of the field where the dead lie in their thousands, and the dying and wounded are scattered by hundreds. The faces of those who had fallen in the battle were, in many cases, turned upward, black from the sun and rain. Over-suspect that they had been white. All looked like negroes, and many of the dead in place where they had fallen, were quite black, they filled the by-standers with a sense of horror. The dead, and the dying scattered all over the field, and the ground where the heiles decomposing in the sun was almost unendurable. Burning after night from sharpshooting to Sharpsburg and the turnpike, it required the greatest care to keep my horse from trampling upon the dead, so closely were they strewn around. Along the line for not more than a mile at last one thousand dead Confederates were found.

On page 641 Mr. Waud introduces us to the present position of affairs by showing us

THE ENEMY ACROSS THE POTOMAC.

At the time he sketched they were within easy gun-shot of each other across the narrow river. Now, we learn, the barbarous custom of picketing has ceased.

OUR MAP.

On page 650 we give a Map of Washington County, Maryland, which shows not only every village and road, but every house, and likewise every farm in the county; and will be found of the greatest value.

ON THE UPPER POTOMAC.

On page 646 we reproduce three sketches by Mr. Davis, one of them representing THE LAST SHOT BY BROADIE OF UNION TROOPS moving from Hagerstown toward the battle-field of Antietam; another, THE BATTLE-FIELD OF ANTIETAM; and a third, HOSPITAL SCENE. General Kenly, late Provost Marshal of Baltimore, commanded the Maryland regiment which suffered so severely at Front Royal, is now in command of a Maryland brigade, in the advance of General M'Clellan's army. He is thorough soldier, and his men have proved that they are the right stuff. In the next battle we are much mistaken if they do not make themselves known. Mr. Davis writes that words fail to describe the kindness of the ladies of Hagerstown and the vicinity to our wounded. They are to be met at every house on the road and especially during the hospitals with articles of food and little comforts which "ministering angels" so well know how to procure. Many owe their kindness against the rude behavior of the secesh females of Baltimore, and remember only the former.

THE WAR IN KENTUCKY.

On page 652 we give a picture, from a sketch by our special artist in Kentucky, Mr. H. Mosler, representing a GUN-BOAT IN THE OHIO on the look-out for rebels. Mr. Mosler writes:

"LOUISVILLE, September, 1862.

"Inclosed please find a sketch of the boats defending the Ohio River at this point. It might be forder, or stationed at different points to prevent the erection of batteries on the Kentucky shore. These boats are defended by bales of hay, and their pilot-houses made bullet-proof by heavy oak planking. They constantly traverse the banks of down the river, shelling the woods, as represented in my sketch."

JESSIE'S VOW.

In one of our large army hospitals—now, alas! a common sight,in this once peaceful country—a wounded boy lay dying. He was a mere child, mere boy. One glance at the fever-flush on his fair cheek, the unnatural brilliancy of the beautiful blue eyes, together with the physician's quiet movement that tossed the bright curls from his heated forehead, told with mournful certainty the tale that his hours were numbered.

Yet only a fellow-soldier sat beside him. No fond mother's or sister's hand bathed that fevered brow; and tender tones whispering words of love and comfort were wanting to the bedside of the dying lad. The physician approached him, and, used as he was to such scenes, said, sadly, "What child's name is this? Such a fair promising young boy, and to day so chance. Poor boy!" he continued, as he under stood, "I wonder where his mother is! but she could never get here in time. Well! it's fretting so much has done it." Here the kind doctor's voice trailed off in a whisper, and, stepping to the next patient, he left the soldier to his task as well as he pleased, passed on—he had no time to spend by any one case. The encouraging to talk—for the young soldier had his senses perfectly—he turned to his comrade, saying, "Will you hear me tell it, James? It wad mak the time soon shorter to speak out what is in my head. Well, then, I'll begin at the time when father, mither, Jessie, an I all lived in that sweet wee home wa among the Scotch mountains. We had na much, to be sure, but enough to keep ourselds, and some'at to spare for our poorer neighbors. Father was a farmer, and owned his farm well by some years, and it was na lang till she was promised to the minister of the place. A nice young man was he, an all the country round was glad when it was known. It came Jessie's birthday just three months before the wedding-day. She was very sad, as we kep saying how happy she had been at hame, an how no other spot could ever to to her what it had been; and then, in the middle of the dancing an fun, she up an threw her arms round my mither's neck, an vowed that always, on that evening, so lang as my mither was alive, she would come—whether 'in the body or in the spirit,' she would never fail.

"I read a hard word for her to speak, an many o' the neighbors shook their heads as they heard; an the talk went round the town that Jessie micht be buried by day, for fear o' a stranger.

Here the boy paused from extreme exhaustion, and his companion, one of the nurasses, seemed to be looking at something very far off; then, rousing himself, said, "I mean to short; it is near the time." A smile, unearthly, not one hearty was put as glad as children; till she was dead. Then the wedding-day would were removed. In crossing a little loch to visit some sick folk the boat was 'a overturned, for it was found floating; but we saw nae Jessie among us.

"Why 'twas a bitter time! My mither fretted mony a day, though she kenned it true, she couldna think of our bonnie lassie lying in the cauld at her husband's arms, on the stanes at the bottom of the loch. But she rested too. He wadna think that she was dead, but kep saying she wad soon be back to gladden our hearts ance mair; but she never came, an three, wi' sickning hearts waited for her lifetime; we kenned right weel that, dead or alive, her promise wad to us true.

"The night came, an we sat wi' open door an curtain drawn from the window (for when they come in they will only through the window they can look). We three by the bright fire sat waiting for the hour to have gone fortune. I heard it first, as, wi' the water dripping from her clothes, she cam swiftly up the walk, an, putting aside the rose-bush, knocked gently for one moment; then she was gone; but by that we kenned she was true. It seemed to my mither; so she said, when I left soon after to come here, I made the same vow, 'that so lang as my mither lived, whether in the body or out of it, I wad, as the same night, stand by Jessie's side;' an I mann," he added, his eyes brightening, and a cold damp gathering on his brow. "Does no one me? Don't you hear the water dripping frae her dress? My mither, wi' her long hair! See, she is putting the roses awa. How cold an clammy her hand is! It is dark!" and, with these words, fell back lifeless on the bed. In awe-struck silence his eyes were closed, and the cheeks of the bravest boy in the hospital that the spirit of the dead beloved and revered for unfailing tenderness and true courage might be, at that moment, standing by the sister it had so dearly loved, looking through the casement on the house and parents of their childhood, while the beautiful frame it had inhabited lay motionless before them.

MARRIED.

HICKCOX—BOGERT.—In this City, on Tuesday, the 23d, at the residence of the bride's brother, by Rev. P. D. Gurley, of Washington, D. C., A. M. D. HICKCOX to Miss ALIDA ANN BOGERT, both of Brooklyn.

MAJOR-GENERAL FRANZ SIGEL, COMMANDING TWELFTH CORPS ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.—FROM A DRAWING BY MR. EMIL SIGEL.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

MAJOR-GENERAL SIGEL.

Major-General Franz Sigel, whose portrait we give on the preceding page, was born at Baden, in Germany, in 1824, and is consequently thirty-eight years of age at the present time. He was educated at the military school at Carlsruhe, closed his course with honors, and obtained a high position in the army of his country. In the year 1847 he was esteemed by his brother officers the most scientific artillerist in Germany. When the rebellion broke out he took sides with the insurgents, lost his commission, and took service with the popular party. At one time he was in chief command of the popular army, and managed by a skillful retreat, in which he led away 30,000 men from a pursuing army of 80,000, and saved all his guns and trains, to elicit the warm eulogiums of the oldest soldiers in Europe. At the overthrow of the rebellion Sigel emigrated to this country.

Here he engaged in teaching, and fairly settled down to the dull life of a professor, and married the daughter of the principal of his academy. About the year 1858 he obtained a position in a college at St. Louis, and removed thither. When the rebellion broke out he tendered his services to the Government, and was given the command of the 2d Regiment of Union Volunteers, raised in St. Louis. He was soon appointed Brigadier-General, and accompanied General Lyon on his famous campaign against Price. At the battle of Springfield, where Lyon was killed, Sigel succeeded to the command, and withdrew our little army with skill and success. He subsequently commanded a corps throughout the bloodless campaign under Frémont; and when General Curtis was detached to operate in Arkansas, Sigel led one of his divisions. It is understood that he planned and won the great battle of Pea Ridge almost against the wishes of his superior, General Curtis. After the battle some difficulty about commands arose, and Sigel was called to Washington and given the command of Harper's Ferry. On the organization of the Army of Virginia a place was created for him by the resignation of General Frémont, and he accordingly took command of his army corps. In all the terrible battles which Pope fought in order to delay the advance of Lee against Washington Sigel took an active part. At the Rappahannock his cannon incessantly thundered; and though the enemy outnumbered him by at least five to one, he held them at bay until M'Clellan's army arrived at Washington. When the Army of Virginia was merged into the Army of the Potomac Sigel was given the command of the Twelfth Army Corps, and is now moving in the direction of Warrenton and Gordonsville, apparently in order to cut off the retreat of the rebels.

General Sigel is universally admitted to be a splendid officer, and is enthusiastically loved by the German troops. It is to be hoped that General Halleck will give him a suitable force.

THE PRESIDENT'S PROCLAMATION IN SECESSIA.

The iron is at last entering the rebels' soul. The blustering braggarts who insulted the spirit of the age by attempting to destroy the noblest Government on earth, and to rear up on its ruin a hideous deformity modeled on the pattern of the kingdoms of Ashantee and Dahomey: the sham chivalry who sickened Christendom by their pretensions, while they were living on the labor of 4,000,000 unpaid servants: the barbarous creatures, who thrust our prisoners into new Black Holes of Calcutta, and dug up our dead soldiers' bodies to make rings and drinking-cups and keepsakes of their poor bones: these monstrous products of the system of slavery are at length realizing the gulf into which they have plunged. Ordinary language fails to provide expletives for their wrath: there is no precedent in history fierce enough for the policy they are going to adopt. They call Mr. Lincoln an "ape," a "fiend," a "beast," a "savage," a "highwayman." Their Congress is resolved into a dozen committees, each trying to devise some new form of retaliation to be inflicted upon United States citizens and soldiers, if we dare to carry the proclamation into effect, and tamper—to use the words of the Richmond Enquirer—with "four thousand millions' worth of property!" They are going to hoist the black flag. They are going to put to death not only soldiers on the battle-field, but every Northerner found on Southern soil. Some they are going to try by courts-martial. But it doesn't seem that that is to benefit them much; for the end of the trial is to be death. No one has yet suggested torture before execution; but that will probably come. It will be nothing new in parts of the South.

Well: all this fuss and fury over, what then? As to the black flag, the rebel soldiers will have something to say about that. At the recent battle of Antietam a Louisiana Regiment was almost exterminated. One of our soldiers explained the circumstance to a visitor. "You see, Sir, the other day at South Mountain that regiment charged with the cry of 'No quarter;' so when our boys met them again we let them have it a little hotter than usual, and there was hardly a corporal's guard of 'em escaped." A lesson or two of this kind will show these insane warriors in the rebel Congress that departures from the regular laws of warfare cut both ways. If the game of murder is to be played, there will be two parties to play at it, and twice as many players on our side as on theirs.

As to negro insurrections. When this war first broke out it was commonly supposed that the negroes would rise at the South. This expectation has not been fulfilled. There have been negro insurrections. But they have been so promptly and so thoroughly suppressed that they exercised no appreciable influence on the war. The very fact of the war, and of the wholesale military organization of the Southern people, have rendered insurrection much less likely to be successful than it ever was. The slaves are unarmed and unorganized; the whites are under arms and thoroughly organized. Every town and village at the South contains more or less companies of armed troops—amply sufficient to put down insurrection in the neighborhood. Now the proclamation will no more alter this state of things than the Pope's Bull altered the course of the comet. What it will effect will be to destroy utterly and forever the legal tenure of slavery in the rebel States, and to deprive the slaveholders, wherever our armies go, of the peculiar property on whose behalf they made war upon us, and for whose protection they desire to erect a separate government. In point of fact, the slaves, when freed, are much more likely to trouble us than their old masters. We shall have to feed them until some new organization of their labor can be effected. They are not at all likely to attempt to massacre their old masters—unless, indeed, those masters should be foolish enough to try to massacre them. All the bugaboo stories about the slaughter of women and children are mere moonshine, intended to affect opinion in Europe. Even in San Domingo the negroes did not begin to kill the whites until they were satisfied the whites intended to exterminate them. If the rebel leaders are so afraid of their wives and children being massacred, why did they publish the proclamation in their papers? If there was really any danger of the kind, does any body believe that the negroes would have been so openly invited to commence the work of massacre?

The thing, the only thing, which the rebels do fear is the loss of "four thousand millions of property." The chivalry see that after 1st January, if the rebellion lasts, they will have to work for their living, instead of fattening on the unpaid labor of four millions of blacks. This is the awful prospect which unmans them. It is this which convulses the rebel newspapers, and has thrown their Congress into paroxysms of anguish.

GOOD EXAMPLES.

A few days since the President was induced, by representations from Western politicians, to remove General Buell from the command of his army, and appoint General Thomas in his place. The change was no sooner made known to the latter than he at once declined to accept the command, and telegraphed to Washington earnestly begging that General Buell be retained, and assuring the Government that no better man for the place could be found in the army. The reply to his telegram was an order reinstating General Buell.

A few days previously, shortly after the return of General M'Clellan from the peninsula, and when men's faith in the hitherto popular General had been shaken, the powers at Washington were casting about for a new chief for the Army of the Potomac. It is understood that their first choice was General Wright, who was killed at Centreville. Next they turned to Burnside, and offered him the command. He promptly declined it. With characteristic modesty he questioned his own fitness for so responsible a station, and he declared, as his own and the soldiers' conviction, that the very best possible man for the command was M'Clellan. Accordingly, General M'Clellan was reinstated, and the battles of South Mountain and Antietam were won.

There is nothing finer in history than the lofty examples of patriotism and self-sacrifice thus given by Generals Burnside and Thomas. It is refreshing to find that, even in our day, when politicians are disgracing the country by their selfish intrigues and squabbles, there are men who can afford to surrender for the sake of the public good what must always be the dearest prize of ambition. The war will not have been in vain if its fire purges men's souls of some of the dross of peace, and develops more noble acts like these. Burnside, commanding an army corps when he might have led the whole army, and stoutly refusing to be elevated at the expense of M'Clellan; Thomas, promptly telegraphing to Washington to decline the honor that is dearest to his heart, because he would not do injustice to Buell: these are the men, these the acts that will live in history, and which future generations will love to recall as evidences of the spirit which animated men in the terrible crisis of 1862.

THE LOUNGER.

THE UNION-AS-IT-WAS.

The speeches of Andrew Jackson Hamilton, of Texas, are so clear, manly, and convincing, that it is to be hoped every citizen in the loyal States will ponder them well. Mr. Hamilton was born in Alabama, and was a late representative in Congress from Texas. He is a Southerner and a slaveholder. But he believes in something besides slavery; and values the Union and the freedom of its inhabitants more than he does a system which is, has been, and always will be, essentially incompatible with republican government.

"I do not wish," he says, "the Union-as-it-was in Texas." Why? Because he dislikes the Constitution-as-it-is? Far from it. But because in the Union-as-it-was in Texas, the Constitution-as-it-is was constantly trampled under foot, and the very objects of the Union despised and outraged. "Because, in short," as Mr. Hamilton says, "because I might say what Washington said, believing it; what Jefferson wrote, and what all the good and great men of that day believed; and under the Union-as-it-was in Texas I should be stigmatized as a traitor, and meet a traitor's doom. If I can enjoy the right of speech, the great and inestimable right intended to be secured to me by the Constitution, then I can bless the Union." But a Union that gags him, and hangs him for claiming his constitutional rights, is a Union that he curses and does not bless. And who does? Who does?

Let every man remember that the loud-mouthed bayers for the Union-as-it-was do not mean the Constitution-as-it-is. Its most sacred provisions were outraged in every State now rebellious. No man's life was safe below Mason and Dixon's line who exercised the right, guaranteed to him by the Constitution, of saying what he thought upon public affairs. He was insulted, hunted, hung. Mr. Hamilton tells the terrible tale for Texas. Nor only that, but free citizens and voters in the loyal States were seized and sold into perpetual slavery; and when Massachusetts sent a venerable lawyer to discuss the question before the Carolina Courts, he was mobbed and forced to fly.

Grant that citizens used their constitutional right of speech in a manner "distasteful" to a certain class in the South. What then? Is the Constitution of the United States subject to the "taste" of a body of slaveholders? Was the simple plea of any speaker for the natural rights of man more "distasteful" to a certain class at the South than a speech of Yancey in a Northern State telling us that he and his friends would, of course, hang us if we spoke at the South as he did at the North, and that if he and his friends could not have their way they would break up the Union? He was protected, and properly, by the Constitution in saying what he had to say. But if the "taste" of his audience had done what Southern "taste" always did in the Union-as-it-was, Mr. Yancey would have been suddenly dumped into the nearest slave State, or he would have been ——! So the Constitution protected, and properly, the man who was brought from Tennessee as the grandson of Patrick Henry, and who driveled to honest and hard-working laboring men of the extreme happiness of slaves, and the immense delight for hard-working men and women of having their babies sold at auction.

Does any body suppose that the wretched stuff of this kind, insulting to humanity and common sense, which was so freely spouted by slavery-orators every where, was "tasteful" to the people of the Free States? No; but its free expression was a guaranteed right of the people of this country under the Constitution, and that right was perfectly respected. Yes, and often the right of saying such things was more respected than that of expressing faith in the Declaration of Independence. Mr. Yancey could say without danger any where in the Free States, "I am for dissolving the Union to save Slavery." But if Mr. Phillips said "I am for dissolving the Union to save Liberty," he was in personal danger.

From that kind of Union-as-it-was, in which the most sacred rights and the clearest provisions of the Constitution-as-it-is were outraged and violated, Mr. Hamilton, a slaveholder of Texas, desires to be delivered. So says he; so say we all. Amen, Amen.

THE POLITICIANS AND THE COUNTRY.

The honest and sober citizen will not fail to remark that the politicians at the North who strenuously supported the rebels when they threatened to destroy the Government, and who advised the people and the Government to surrender to their threats, are now equally anxious about what they call Constitutional rights and a Constitutional conduct of the war. They mean simply, as every body knows, such a conduct of the war as will leave slavery untouched. The Constitutional right of a rebel to his life they are willing to forego, but his Constitutional right to his slaves they insist upon protecting with an edifying ardor. Now as the right of a citizen to his life is the chief and most sacred of all his rights, why is it that the politicians find it Constitutional enough to kill him if in armed rebellion, but fearfully unconstitutional to liberate his slaves whom he compels to aid him in his rebellion?

Simply because these politicians are solely anxious for the preservation of their party, not of their country. They know that if the rebellion is suppressed and slavery is saved, they are sure of the political support of the entire slave interest which controls the South. And they equally know that, if the rebellion succeeds and the slave States secede, they (the politicians) have a political capital upon which to begin the agitation for reconstruction. But if in the process of suppression slavery disappears, these same gentlemen know that their political ambition is forever defeated.

It is not the welfare of the Union, nor the Constitution, nor the country, which inspires them, but their own political predominance. When they thought it necessary for the maintenance of that predominance to support those who threatened the Government, and the Union, and the country, in case of the constitutional election of a President they did not like, they did not hesitate to give that support, and thereby to threaten the Government. Now when they think that a truly earnest and constitutional conduct of the war, including emancipation, imperils their political future, they do not hesitate to denounce that conduct. Their sole interest is themselves. Their only care is their party.

But the Government which they denounce—the Government which can not constitutionally be changed for two years and a half, has not taken a party ground. Loyal men of all parties are in its honored employ to-day. In too many cases its desire to be truly impartial and patriotic has caused the retention of utterly unfit civil and military officers. The Government elected by a party has aimed only at the preservation of the Union, and not at the perpetuity of the party. In the interest of the Union, of the country, and of the Constitution, it has issued a military order of prospective emancipation.

In the interest of their party the politicians denounce it. Which is dearest to the sober citizen, to whatever party he may have belonged, the success of a party or the salvation of the country? If the former, he will support the politicians. If the latter, he will support, with all his soul and all his strength, the Government constitutionally elected.

"OUR FELLOW-CITIZENS."

"But when you talk of severe measures and a vigorous prosecution of the war, do you not forget that the rebels are our fellow-citizens, with whom, when we have subdued the rebellion, we must live as fellow-citizens still?"

No; it is not in the least forgotten. But while they have been and shall yet be fellow-citizens, they are now desperate conspirators and rebels. The first duty, as also the most pressing necessity of the Government, is the overwhelming and speedy suppression of the rebellion. For the possible future peace of the country, and for our living together at all, that is the paramount duty of the hour. Killing them, overrunning their estates, destroying as an army necessarily destroys, shelling their camps and their towns, if necessary; seizing their property for the use of the army, and to help pay the expense of the war they have waged against the Government; liberating their slaves who reach our lines, and at last freeing all slaves, that the rocking foundations of their industrial system may strike a panic to their hearts—all these measures are not gentle. They do not win affection although they do compel respect, as power always does. They certainly exasperate and embitter. But they are war; and war never makes immediate friends.

To call men who have risen in arms against this Government without a shadow of right or excuse—for the debate upon slavery was just as constitutional as that upon a tariff or a bank—and who have pursued that purpose by every dishonorable and bloody means—who have filled with anguish hundreds of thousands of hearts and homes—who have paralyzed the prosperity of a great nation, and, for a moment, affrighted the hope of humanity and civilization—to call these men "our erring Southern brethren" is to mock the agony of a nation and insult common sense.

But they are to be our fellow-citizens? Well, suppose they are. They are to be so only when they have satisfied themselves that they are not strong enough to break away and disown us. They are to be made our fellow-citizens in the future by conquest, by subjugation. Pray for what other purpose have we hundreds of thousands of men in arms, ships of war, and tremendous artillery? For what other purpose did we kill and wound thirty thousand of them, as General M'Clellan reports, at Antietam? Why have there been a hundred thousand of them disabled in the hospital at Richmond? Simply because they do not yet believe that we mean what we say, when we declare that the Union shall be maintained. For the Union we know is the nation; and to destroy the Union is to ruin the nation.

The rebels are to be forced at the point of the bayonet to be our future fellow-citizens. That is the result to which every loyal man looks forward. They are not to be conciliated, nor wheedled, nor bamboozled. They are to be starved and shot and maimed and impoverished and exposed in every way until they submit. There is but one other result of the war. There can be but one. And that is, that we shall be starved and shot and maimed and impoverished and hurt in every way until we are tired out and surrender.

Under these circumstances—and there are no other—what is the obvious condition of their consenting to be our fellow-citizens? Simply that further resistance now and future insurrection shall be clearly hopeless. If we patch up an armistice, a truce, a peace, we shall be merely Samson treacherously fondled to sleep by Delilah. Let us stop before the work is done, and we shall have it all to do over again. Leave a chance, a hope, a nucleus of future rebellions, and our "fellow-citizens" will again rebel.

It is, therefore, for the very reason that we bear in mind that they are, at every cost, to be our future fellow-citizens that the most stringent measures are the most conservative. The great point is to show the rebels that they inevitably must be fellow-citizens, and they do not believe it while we pat them and play war. If the popular mind had justified, as it did not, upon the breaking out of the rebellion, the employment of every power and resource of the Government, and every recognized means of war, the peace we all desire had been long ago conquered, and thousands of the brave and true, whom we shall see no more, would have hailed with us the dawn of that day in which, the seed of war being destroyed, we can indeed become fellow-citizens.

YANKEEIZATION.

The rebel Virginian Governor Letcher's late diatribe against the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad as a "nuisance" that ought to be abated recalls irresistibly the famous outburst of the old Virginian colonial Governor Berkeley, in 1671: "I thank God there are no free schools nor printing, and I hope we shall not have these hundred years; for learning has brought disobedience and heresy and sects into the world, and printing has divulged them and libels against the best government. God keep us from both!"

What state of society is that in which schools and railroads are nuisances? It appears from the Virginian papers that these are "Yankeeizing" institutions. Yankeeizing is therefore another name for introducing intelligence, skill, enterprise, and thrift. The great Yankee idea of education has been Yankeeized; and it is a tolerably flattering specimen of the results of this process. This war is the Yankeeization of the great South. Our life is to be shaken up, renewed, developed into full civilization and the use and benefit of its magnificent resources. It is to be made to come to itself, as in the parable the prodigal son, after eating husks and lying with swine. It is to awaken, also, to its real powers and consciousness and conscience. From a sot he became a man.

Yankeeization is the unwelcome and awkward and spiteful word for civilization. And that is the concentrated protest which Virginia and the other capitulous States are to derive from this war. Poor Virginia has always labored under the terrible misfortune of an original settlement by a people who were called "gentlemen," and others defined in the petition of the Virginia Congress as "vagabonds and condemned men." It was a sorry beginning; but let the poor State which, nevertheless, standing like a rock, repelled gentlemen men a century ago take heart. Despite the present and recent crops of Magruders, Lechers, Floyds, and Tysons, it shall be Yankeeized into peace, prosperity, and an honorable regard for human rights.

THE POSTAGE STAMP NUISANCE.

The simplest way is usually the shortest and best. When the Government found it necessary to issue paper shillings, a plain shilling was at once dealt by the thing required. The unnecessary complication upon the simple idea of a shilling partly provoked the question of an intelligent foreigner: "Can the Yankee genius, in straits for a circulating medium, devise nothing simpler than a bill?"

Whether postage stamps are currency or not, is a question practically answered every time you get your change in stamps, and you make your purchases with them. They are the meanest and most inconvenient of all substitutes for coin; and the Government, of course, has received what it considers good money for them. But when you are informed that a "soiled" stamp will not be received upon letters, and that letters not posted with clean stamps will be sent to the Dead-Letter Office,

By what right does the Government repudiate its promises? What is a postage stamp but the evidence of payment for valuable service to be performed by the Government? The Government has made that contract with the mailing public, in the breach of trust to refuse to honor the certificate. Undoubtedly the order is made in the hope of throwing the stamps out of circulation as a medium. But whose fault is it that they have not already dropped out? And how can the fact that they are used as a convenience for exchange, or that they have become soiled, possibly affect the other fact that the Government has received the value for them?

The whole business is a botch and a disgrace. If a convenient medium has been discovered, as it is with reasonable rapidity, furnished to the people, there would have been little trouble about postage stamps.

DISCUSSION AND REBELLION.

In his admirable speech at Syracuse Mr. Tremain spoke one truth which ought to be thoroughly and constantly remembered. It is that those words indulged in as freely by the South as the North—affect justification for untold murders and the most wanton waste of life, are the fruit of the author of this mischief?"

This remark is in reply to Mr. Seymour's accusation of the North as the real author of the rebellion. "Who," asks Mr. Seymour, "stained our hand with blood? Who caused this civil war?" All these things are written your own knowledge. Are their authors the leaders to whom you look for calamities? They are the men who have made the mischief they have wrought, and tell you it is an impossible conclusion.

Freed from the rhetoric in which the orator finds it convenient to wrap it, this statement is precisely that the leaders of the rebellion slavery was discussed as the North. It is another form of the remark, "The abolitionists are the cause of the war." Mr. Tremain's reply is exactly to the point and conclusive. Words, the right of free speech, are the simplest discussion of every question that affects the welfare of the people, is the most sacred and precious privilege of the citizen under the Constitution of the United States, in the time of peace, there is no question whatever that may not be discussed with the most absolute freedom. It is the Constitution of a republic, but it allows and protects the expression of a preference for a monarchy or for a despotism. It is a Constitution of compromises upon certain points; but its spirit admits and its letter defends the most radical discussion of the wisdom or the folly of those compromises. Under no such thing as a free form of government without the most perfect liberty of discussion; and the only spirit in this country which has ever attempted to deny that liberty practically denied it by mobs and Lynch law, is the spirit of slavery, precisely the spirit which to-day and now seeking its overthrow—a spirit which worked its will in the Free States of the country through the agency of those who are the fastest friends of Mr. Seymour.

Under the Constitution of the United States a man has the most absolute right, and has always had, to discuss slavery in whatever terms he thought fit, just as he has to discuss property statutes, tariffs, forms of election, banks, laws of divorce, or any other subject which interested him. If he slanders any person, he is amenable to the law of libel. If he decries and accuses the Government, or charges the majority of his fellow-citizens with the guilt of a bloody civil war, or stealthily suggests to them the most dishonorable and destructive betrayal of the national integrity—as Mr. Seymour does in his speech—he is amenable under the Constitution neither to mobs nor to courts but simply to public opinion. Mr. Seymour charges the blood of the rebellion upon those at the North who thought and said that slavery was wrong and dangerous. That was the gravest offense, to say that and to hold in good faith to the Government and Constitution, or to say what Mr. Seymour himself says? If he is justly protected by the Constitution in saying at this time what he says in this speech, he was by the Constitution in complain of what Mr. Seward (whose famous phrase he repeats) and other orators said in honor while publicly denying the fact of an irrepressible conflict.

To charge upon the expression of any opinion the guilt of treason, which the overthrow by violence of a war is to flout the Constitution, which guarantees full liberty of speech. And to the eternal honor of the American people be it said, that while the advocates of slavery were dubbed "traitors," they were patiently borne with, and that in the end there were Americans who were resolved that Freedom should sometimes have a word at least in the Free States. Mr. Seymour, then, may attack at discussion because it knew that discussion was fatal to it. And when discussion, under the guise of traitor and treason, attacked the eyes of the people to the encroaching despotism which was threatening slavery itself, it is the Government whose control it had lost forever.

Great is the fall of slavery, Mr. Seymour, but no more final and less than that of those who declare that the exercise of any right under the Constitution justifies treason. Mr. Seymour knows what can not be discussed will not be tolerated; and discussion will surely expose also what is not worth tolerating. Judge Douglas said, "Words do not justify unlawful murders and the rankest treasons.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WHEN near a choir he said to dislike you?—When it was singing.

A horse-dealer, in showing off a spirited nag to a customer, received a kick in his rib, and although smarting with pain, he said to the man, "Don't you see he is only playfulness?"

"Yes, Mr. Johnson, my poor husband and his sister Sarah, he died in the same month, and Mrs. Smith. But then, we must have got rid of the chicken; that is, my husband and Sarah, for they were always a-picking at one another." "You said, Mrs. Smith, that you had six children. Will he do, for I want a boy with both died together?"

A few days ago a gent in the neighborhood of Cardiff was out with his dog shooting. The dog was remarkably fond of the water, but the "sporting gent" walking up, declared that he would not go in. "Nonsense, sir," said the man, "why you've shocked up already!"

A gentleman at a public discussable lately asked the Rev. Mr. Judge if he could tell him what was meant by "Gin," said the man, "do you mistake me for a waiter?" "No, sir," was the reply; "I wished to know what it was to."

Francis I. being desirous to raise one of the most learned men in his kingdom to the dignity of Cardinals of the Church, asked him if he was of noble descent. "Sire," replied the learned man, "there were three brothers in Noah's Ark, but I can not tell positively from which of them I am descended."

"When I was quite a boy," says Smith, "my father used to say that a penny saved was a penny earned. Such arguments cause boys it was large enough for two or three of them." "Undoubtedly," said Brown, after trying to gulp or up the fullness in the back with his hand, so that the boy might not see it or get hold of it, "undoubtedly the cost was 'good,' it was so built of to-eat, to cast its cost enough, to buy you and your father."

A man that catches his handsome with scolding her servants is apt to be reminded that the peacock, with all its beauty, has a disagreeable voice to match.

A juvenile sporter belonging to a primary school, boasted to his play-fellows the other day that he would speak to the Queen when he grew up, and tell her to put an article of youthful aspiration. "My father," said he, "has spoke to the Queen, and if he gets talking to her, I can get a fish-line."

"Is it possible to oblige in the Pacific," said a Dutchman to a clerk in a shipping-office. "Well," said the clerk, pen in hand, "what is it you want?" "Vell, I want Mynheer Jacobus Vanderpumpkinbottomsupperdumplingvandermidden-dorpsmeerschaumpipe to go to Batavia." "Very well," said the clerk; "do you know what it is in English?" "Yes," said the Dutchman, "it is Jack Brown."

An ex-saint of Bangor was very peculiar as to the nature of his meals, and having once to dine on sunday with an old friend, he was asked what he would like to eat for his dinner. "Why," said he, "I should like to read the Tribune, and having to wait until breakfast was over, he sat down and was soon seen engaging in his ear, in the strike notes quite new!

"Is a cobbler's got a bird-quarter of lamb, What shall she do with?"

The cripple was astonished, but promptly replied, in bass, "Boast the loin and bell the leg, And make a pudding of the rest."

With which answer the lady apparently decamped.

FEMALE DEATH PRECOCITY.—"Woman," remarked the Contemplative Man, at Margate, "are dcep as the blue ocean." "Yes," said the Practical Man, "replied the Disappointed Man," and as full of crabs."

"We frequently see it stated," said Mr. Oldfox, "that gold and silver have been discovered in certain localities, and even town in the first place without a farthing of money, and that they have to borrow to get here, and I've been a-trying to borrow money to get here, and I've been a-trying to borrow money to get here, and I've been a-trying to borrow ever since. It is a great thing to be able to have published such a wonderful credit."

A DEVOUT SOUL.—"How old are you?" said Major Kilpatrick, as he was examining a recruit. "Twenty-one." "I wonder you aren't right down ashamed of being so bigger—you look like a boy of fifteen." "All comes of being a faithful child of the Church, your honor. I've been a-praying to God to put on my head, and said, 'Stop there!' and he then put on my shoulders, and said, 'Stop there!' and I don't think I right in me to—growing without his leave."

Put a good face upon every thing, unless you are up that you have.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

GENERAL McCLELLAN'S REPORT OF THE BATTLE OF ANTIETAM.

NEAR SHARPSBURG, September 19—1 P.M.

Major-General H. W. Halleck, General-in-Chief of the United States Army:

GENERAL—I have the honor to report the following as the result of the battle of Antietam of South Mountain and Antietam:

The battle-ground here was two and three, 1000 wounded and 70 missing. Total, 12,469.

The rebel force was by no means less than 120,000, 8426 wounded, 1313 killed, and 1000 prisoners. Total loss in the two battles, 14,794.

The loss of the rebels in the two battles, as near as can be ascertained from the number of their dead found upon the field, and from reliable data, will not fall short of twice the loss being estimated.

Major Ives, Assistant Inspector-General, who superintended the burial of the dead, reports about three thousand rebels buried on the field of Antietam by our forces.

Previous to this, however, the rebels had buried many on the field, which they occupied after the battle—probably as many as we buried.

The battle-ground at South Mountain can not be estimated with accuracy; but as our troops continually drove the enemy from position to position, the rebels lost a much greater number of their dead wherever on the field they were buried. It is not unreasonable to suppose that their loss was greater than ours. Estimating their killed at the low number of 1000, their killed in the two battles would be four thousand. According to the rule of our own loss in proportion to the wounded, would make their wounded eighteen thousand seven hundred and forty-one.

Their loss can be estimated at this time, the number of prisoners taken by our troops in the two battles will, in all probability, amount to 5000. The rebel Governor will no doubt show a larger number. Of them about 1200 are wounded.

This gives a total of rebels killed, wounded, and prisoners of 24,000. It will be observed that this does not include the rebels left dead on the field of which a list is impossible here to be kept.

The rebel army conducted, therefore, that the rebel army lost at least 30,000 of their best troops.

From the best information I can get concerning the enemy in Maryland, until he was driven back into Virginia, we captured 13,000 stragglers, 7 battle flags, 3 field batteries, 39 caisson bodies, 29 colors, and 1 signal flag. We have 305 rebel deserters in our hands.

On the battle-field of Antietam 14,000 small-arms were picked up. Probably the same number carried off by the rebels and those distributed on the ground to recruit and other unarmed men during the battle will not fall short of it.

At South Mountain my estimate of stands of arms was also large, as they were on the heels of the pursuit from that point, 400 were taken on the field of Antietam.

GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN,
Maj.-General Commanding.

GENERAL HALLECK'S ANSWER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Sept. 20, 1862.

Major-General McClellan, commanding, etc.:

GENERAL—Your report of yesterday, giving the results of the battles of South Mountain and Antietam, has been received and submitted to the President. They were not only battles fought, but well-earned and most victorious victories.

The valor and endurance of your army in the several conflicts which terminated in the occupation of the enemy's soil by the citizens of Maryland, are creditable alike to the troops and to the commander. The national forces, and the country, while mourning the lamented dead, will not be unmindful of the services of the living.

H. W. HALLECK, General-in-Chief.

THE EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION IN SECESSIA.

The Richmond Examiner of Saturday, September 20, says the rebellion has fallen like a fire-brand into rebeldom. In the Southern States, on the 1st inst., Mr. Seward, of Georgia, published a joint resolutions on the proclamation, and said, "We will not submit to it, and we will not obey it. We will not as an invitation to service; and therefore should be glad to see the people given to their own resources to meet the enemy with their own means, such force as they can command. The Richmond Dispatch thinks "that the proclamation will be a dead letter in the South, and that the only way in which it has been an embarrassment to the Government is in the Border States, and as fast as the people there are willing to go wherever their soldiers and possessions can be carried." The Richmond Enquirer has a rabid editorial on the proclamation. It says that document "announces startling news, but has been received with a most thunderstruck North or South." It styles President Lincoln "a tyrant and a traitor," and says that the document in which driven him to his own destruction. It says that the proclamation will not even emancipate the enemy to be the darkest servile insurrection with the Northern people ever recorded in history. The Enquirer says: "It is one of the most extraordinary documents ever issued by any human being." The article closes: "Do . . . more we implore you, Southern country all turns between . . . The next campaign will be a tremendous one, both for the North and the South. Let our people be up and doing. Let them prepare the whole strength of our people for a tremendous effort."

MORE RETALIATORY MEASURES.

On 1st October Mr. Semmes introduced into the rebel Congress a resolution for still more retaliatory measures, declaring that after the 1st of January, 1863, all negroes captured in arms, or who have been found inciting the Confederate States to servile insurrection, shall suffer death by the civil authorities, at the end of the war, or the repeal of the Confederate States laws, and officers on any conviction of such negroes or ministers for military service against the Confederate States, shall suffer death by the civil authorities. Other pains and penalties are prescribed for different acts of our officers, in the way of extermination in which the rules of civilized warfare are to be ignored, is proclaimed. The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Retaliation.

In the House the spirit evinced was still more bitter. Mr. Lyons, of Virginia, introduced a resolution declaring that the people of the Confederate States will every officer, soldier, and sailor of the enemy captured in the Confederate States service, treated as felons; declaring that after the 1st of January, 1863, all negroes captured in arms, or who have been, or if encountered should be immediately hung; and offering a reward of $1000 for the capture and safe delivery dollars for life, to every slave and free negro who shall, after the 1st of January, 1863, kill one of the enemy.

The Virginia Legislature resolved to grant immunity to all persons who will buy partial land of the estate of any rebel, armed or unarmed, aiding to carry out the "British and Yankee abolition programme."

THE PROCLAMATION IN NORTH CAROLINA.

The Union feeling in North Carolina appears to be developing. The President's emancipation proclamation has been received there with much favor. Governor Vance, in his address to the people, says he told a great Union movement in the spring of 1861, and that he would do all in his power to the two neighboring Congressional districts which had elected Union men. He says the proclamation was given to both districts are to be present and address the people on the occasion.

THE PRESIDENT'S VISIT TO GENERAL M'CLELLAN.

The President, accompanied by General M'Clellan, had a grand review of the Army of the Potomac on Friday, October. His reception and that of the President connot fail to interest patriotic hearts. The President, accompanied with General Burnside, Governor Curtin, Governor Andrew, Governor Sprague, and Franklin, and the division of General Couch, crossed the Potomac at Harper's Ferry, by the Pontoon Bridge at Boteler's Ford, and proceeded to the residence of Antietam Creek to Sharpsburg.

The President arrived at Hagerstown before his visit to the army on Saturday night, 5th, and immediately had an interview with Mr. Stanton. The enthusiastic reception of the President at Frederick, and the loyalty displayed by the Marylanders on the occasion, will have a most excellent effect upon the prospects of the war.

ANOTHER BATTLE AT CORINTH.

The forces of General Rosecrans had a terrible battle with the rebels under General Price, Van Dorn, and Lovell, at Corinth, lasting from Saturday, 4th, until three o'clock P.M. on 5th. General Price attacked our army with forty thousand men, but was completely met by General Rosecrans, assisted by General Grant, and, after two days' desperate fighting, the rebels were repulsed with great slaughter, leaving their dead and wounded behind: and were nearly pursued by our troops to the Tuscumbia. The rebels is said to be heavy. General Hackleman was killed at the head of his brigade. The rebels fought with hatred and desperation, twenty miles from Corinth, up to three o'clock on Sunday.

We lost between five and six thousand. General Oglesby, by was dangerously wounded, and Colonels Smith, Gilbert, and Mower slightly. General Rosecrans had his horse shot under the enemy. Price was said to be in the forks of the Hatchie River, between Corinth and Bolivar, with Lovell and Hurlbut. The latter was endeavoring to cut him off.

THE OFFICIAL DESPATCHES.

GRANT'S HEAD-QUARTERS,
JACKSON, TENNESSEE, Oct. 5, A.M.

To Major-General H. W. Halleck, General-in-Chief, Washington, D. C.:

Yesterday the rebels, under Price, Van Dorn, and Lovell, were repulsed from their attack on Corinth with great slaughter. The enemy are in full retreat, leaving their dead and wounded in our hands. Our victory is complete, and that the loss is entirely on the rebel side, particularly as the battle-ground bears no comparison with that of the enemy. General Hackleman fell while gallantly leading his brigade. General Oglesby is dangerously wounded. General M'Pherson, who reinforced General Corinth yesterday morning, General Rosecrans pursued the retreating enemy this morning. General Ord will attempt to cut them off, while I will follow to their place. General Hurlbut is at the Hatchie River bridge, on the Bolivar road, and is no doubt with the pursuing column. From seven hundred to a thousand prisoners, besides those left in our hands, will be sent here.

U. S. GRANT, Major-General Commanding.

SECOND DESPATCH.

GRANT'S HEAD-QUARTERS,
JACKSON, TENNESSEE, Oct. 5, 1862.

To Major-General H. W. Halleck, General-in-Chief United States Army:

General Ord, who followed General Hurlbut, met the enemy this morning at the south side of the Hatchie, and skirmished from a dogtrack, and drove them across the stream and bridge, destroying the bridge after them.

General Ord took two batteries and about two hundred prisoners.

A large portion of General Rosecrans's force were at Chewalla.

At this distance every thing looks most favorable, and I am not one to be over-sanguine. I have strong hopes that every thing but the cavalry will be captured.

I will advise you every thing to take into the fight an adequate force of cavalry to follow up the victory.

U. S. GRANT, Major-General Commanding.

THE SITUATION IN KENTUCKY.

On Friday, 3d, the rebels had driven the cavalry thirty-five thousand men within a circle of eight miles diameter around Louisville, and made the advance of our army within four miles of that town. There had been considerable skirmishing with the rebel cavalry on Friday, and with the hundred prisoners taken. On Saturday, 4th, the rebels commenced to fall back on the line of the Salt River, and stood at its rear o'clock. General Van Cleve, Kirby Smith, with his force, was at Shelbyville, and General Buell's forces were on their way to Lexington. Bragg everes with the rebel army, and Kirby Smith was on the way to the north of the Ohio. On the rebels evacuated Frankfort, after destroying the bridge at Mr. Hawes gravecrossing. Our pickets are near Frankfort.

GENERAL MORGAN ON THE OHIO.

General Morgan has entered Kentucky, Kentucky, on the Ohio River, fifteen miles above Portsmouth, and recently defeated General Gay at Piketon on the 11th ult., with General Stevenson's army three miles in the rear. On the 12th ult. Morgan was at Piketon, and the fourth in his rear. On the 13th he was at Pound Gap, on the Kentucky border of General Stevenson and the guerrilla chieftain succeeded in crossing him. Morgan has only four-day consecutive hours, and on three successive days, driving their rear guard from the mountain pass. For three days his force were on a limited supply of water.

GENERAL BUELL'S COMMAND.

General Buell has issued an address to the command last week, and General Thomas appointed in his place. General Buell says, however, nevertheless, retains his stated at the request of General Thomas himself and all the Major-General's staff officers.

JOHN MORGAN DEFEATED.

The rebel guerrilla, John Morgan, with fifteen men, made an attack upon Glasgow County, Kentucky, on Glover hill, on 6d, and after a fight of several hours was totally defeated. He fled precipitately toward the Little Barren River, burning thirty-five houses on his way. Not a single Morgan man escaped alive.

THE WESTERN GUN-BOAT FLEET TRANSFERRED TO THE NAVY.

The War Department has issued an order transferring the Western gun-boat fleet to the Navy Department, and returns thanks to all the officers of the Navy and Army, and to the officers who aided them, for their zeal, skill, and patriotism exhibited in the service on the Western waters during the present war.

CIVIL LAW RE-ESTABLISHED IN NEW ORLEANS.

The New Orleans journals state that the operation of civil law has been restored, and that Gen. Butler has ordered that no open six district courts in proper form, and the usual law proceedings resumed.

THE ADDRESS OF THE LOYAL GOVERNORS.

The address to the President by the Governors of the loyal States was delivered, and privately no Altoona has been published. It is signed by all the Governors except the Governors of Rhode Island and Kentucky. The Governors of the two States are absent. The address declares that a reserve army of 100,000 men for one year's service should be called forth. It also advises the emancipation proclamation of Mr. Lincoln, and pay a full tribute to the value of the army in the field.

ITALY.

IS GARIBALDI COMING HERE?

The American Consul at Vienna wrote to Garibaldi, asking, as he understood, he had taken up his abode in that city, whether his valiant arm in the American struggle for liberty would be accepted by him an enthusiastic admirer of Garibaldi, under date of September 14, replied: "I am a prisoner and dangerously wounded. It is consequently impossible for me to dispose of myself. However, as soon as I am restored to liberty, and my wounds are healed, I shall take the first favorable opportunity to satisfy my desire to serve the great cause of humanity by fighting under the banner of a brave nation, of which I have so many friends. Receive, my dear friend, the expression of my sincere thanks for your kind offer. Wonder, of Vienna." He seems to cheer at the idea of Garibaldi taking service under the banner of Washington's flag. He says there "nine millions of people are fighting for the right to govern themselves."

THE PATRIOT'S SLEEP.

["Too many of the Wide-awakes of the last campaign are indeed fast asleep now, when their country needs them. I saw one of them slumbering by Culpeper Court House last week. He was sleeping with his right arm twisted in the spokes of a disabled caisson-wheel, and a purple mark was on his right temple. But he was not alone in his forgetful sleep, for near him, and rightly greeting his disengaged hand, was a Democrat, slumbering with his fingers clutching the flag, and many stars shed pleasant frames on their loyal souls forever!"]

Two soldiers slumbering, hand clasped in hand?
Not thus should freemen lie
When storms of trouble break upon the land,
And treason's hordes are nigh.
Not thus Columbia's children should give o'er
When tyrants boast and brag
Of Freedom vanquished. "Nay, we can no more!
We sleep here for the flag!"

"See!" one said, "here's a mark upon my brow
That coward never wear;
I have but left the battle-field just now—
A bullet hit me there!"
The other looked up smiling in my face,
His rigid lips apart;
And spoke no word, but motioned me to trace
His wound above his heart.

Oh! many slumbering by the flag we see,
By love of ease possessed,
Feeling no shame; not caring to be free—
Not so they sunk to rest.
They mut the foe, refusing to low down
Before a rebel rag:
Speak softly! give their memory a tear
We sleep thus for our flag!

Dear Flag, for whom so many sleep this day!
Let all thy bright stars shine
In pleasant dreams upon these loyal souls,
For they were always thine!
When others would have trailed thee in the dust,
And hailed thy fall with glee,
They sprang to save thee—fought in thy defense—
Now sleep in death for thee.

Sleep on, brave ones, ye shall not be forgot!
Though all the country's pain
Sue dreams not all of self—her tenderest thought
Is for her children slain.
When she shall stretch strong arms, and willing hearts,
And feet that never lag,
She wishes you were by her side again,
Who now sleep for the flag!

MISSING.

"What is it, dear?"

"Only the drums. Oh, if they would only stop one moment!"

I saw my dear aunt shake her head sorrowfully, while a look of meaning passed between her and my uncle. They thought I was out of my mind, but they were mistaken. I knew as well as they did that the noise which was wearing upon every nerve was only the reverberation of the crowd of carriages and omnibuses on Broadway. Still I could only hear the roll of drums. I had heard it, day and night, for five weeks.

It was a drum this time, after all, and muffled: they were approaching the house. My aunt started up, with a gesture of dismay, to try and close out the sound. Nearer and nearer came the heavy tramp of men, and now the sad dirge wailed out by low-toned instruments the Dead March that marks a military funeral. Strange to say, it was wonderfully soothing and restful as it rose and died away upon my ears, strained so long to a steady, monotonous roll! When they had all gone by, I was weeping, for the first time in many days. It was like the to my dry eyeballs—an unspeakably blessed physical relief to my aching heart.

Those funeral honors were in my mind apprehended to him. I felt no longer the bitterest, most maddening fear of all—that his dear form was left unburied, for the ill birds of prey to tear and mangle. A ghastly, blackened face, upturned to the morning sun, no longer glared upon me when I closed my eyes; but a low, quiet grave, where comrades had said a prayer as it was hollowed, and where dust should quietly mingle with dust. The grass should spring upon it some day; wild-flowers look up with showy eyes to heaven; and there peacefully, as in my arms, he should slumber until we should be reunited beyond all death and change.

Again that sad and touching strain floated back to my darkened room on its errand of mercy—fainter and fainter now as the footsteps receded—"Adeste fideles," our old Sunday evening hymn! For weeks my mind had gone in the same dull, maddening round; but now I saw my old home as vividly as if I were in reality the little fair-haired child seeting in my dear father's arms, while my mother looked on, the boys, and their voices rose upward in a solemn and tender unison—an emblem of their united girls' lives!

A feeling of pity for myself came over me to think I had come to this—that bright, eager, hopeful child I wondered if they did not pity me, removed as they were from the sorrows of earth; if they did not long to pluck me out of the dark waters that were surging over my soul. Who knows but it was their spirits ministering unto me; for from that moment the stupor of despair left me? I only wonder I had not died at first. It happened thus: I came down so cheerful and buoyant that morning, singing to my bird as I arranged the flowers that our city garden afforded, for it was my day for a letter from him, and all this long year he had never failed me. Twice a week his daily journal, in which every act and thought of his was chronicled for my eyes, came. There might be delays after it left his hand, but none through him.

I did not think to unfold the morning paper, not knowing that a movement of his corps was expected; but my uncle had known it for several days, and had been dreading disaster, as I afterward found, from the carefully-worded telegraphs of the War Department. But I was young and ever confident of our cause, and had paid no heed to the ominous mutterings of the coming storm. The sun fell on my daily path—what were the clouds to me!

There was a white, fixed look in my uncle's face; that was my first warning. I dropped the blood-red fuchsias and fragrant heliotropes which I held, and sprang to his side.

"What is it?—what is it?"

My voice sounded changed and husky to myself. The scared look passed from my uncle's kind eyes, and one of love and pity entered into them.

"He may be only a prisoner after all; do not worry before we hear."

But I could detect the deceit, as a child does the bitter drug hidden in the conserve.

"You mean that he is dead; and you are lying to me!"

It did not matter that "Missing" stood above the column in which his name was enrolled. They tormented me with watching, and writing for information, and all manner of hopeless devices for many a day. They were sure that when the list of the prisoners should be received from Richmond he would be reported among them, but I gave up from the first; and when that came with no news of him it was almost a relief, for they let me alone with my trouble.

You take up the papers day after day, and read those dreadful lists without a thought. Those names are no more to you than the columns of a directory, or a list of advertised letters. You have a kind heart, and you sigh, and say, "Poor fellows!" as you lay them down. How little do you understand of the sickening anxiety, the appalling shock, which those very columns carry to a thousand households! How eager eyes dilate with horror and unbelief as fearing, and hoping, and praying they come upon the name they seek for staring them in the face with such persistent reality—staring them into blindness.

So I read it, leaning over my uncle's shoulder, and following his finger with a dizzy brain:

Missing—ARTHUR L. GRANT.

The first on the list, followed by the name of a company and regiment that had marched proudest of all through our streets thirteen months before, since they had left wealth, and ease, and luxury, to go out for their country's sake—a pure enthusiasm in what they believed to be a noble cause.

Again and again he had been in the thickest of the fight, and had come out unharmed. I impiously believed it was my unceasing selfish prayers that protected him [—how impious and how selfish I had never known till now; for I had come to believe the angels had a special charge concerning him. But that veil of self-delusion fell from my eyes like a mist; my presumption in thinking God would exempt me from the trials common to all! I dare say you know every phase of mind I passed through with, if you have ever been visited with a sudden shock of fear; how, from what I conceived to be loving trust in my Heavenly Father and a glowing gratitude, I found myself madly rebellious, sullenly faithless, wholly unbelieving. What were all His promises worth since it had come to this! Only that morning before I left my room I had read with such a boastful confidence in the Bible which had been his earliest gift to me:

"He shall deliver thee in six troubles; yea, in seven shall no evil touch thee.

"In famine he shall redeem thee from death, and in war from the power of the sword."

But now He had "put forth his hand and touched all that I had," and the temptation to "curse him to his face" swept over me, as it had through the soul of the patient Chaldean!

During the slow decline which had taken my father from me, and exhausted my mother's little strength in long-continued care and watchfulness, we had sailed on a long voyage, in the hope that it might stay the cruel disease which worked out its end with such deceptive quietness. I was wretchedly feverish and ill for a long, long time, unable to leave my berth or to take any nourishment; yet, strange to say, I never slept without such heavenly dreams! An unaccountable happiness stole over me as I sank into sleep; my fever and the thirst were slaked on delicious fruits or at sparkling fountains of the clearest water. The most monotony of sight and sound, which almost maddened me when awake, was exchanged for the landscapes and the music of Paradise.

So it was with me now for a time; when awake, despair and desolation and eternal isolation closed around me; but when I sank into an unconsciousness that was not sleep, such bright, morking visions of the past, with every precious hour that memory held in store, was lived over with a minuteness and vividness that mocked the changeless reality of widowhood.

Every half-expressed thought or glance of tenderness—the perfect repose of the full knowledge of his love—the bitter bliss of our first parting, when the call to arms sounded through the land—the unspoken longing to be called his—to bear his name, at least, if his life should be laid down for his country; the long-lingering, passionate farewell, when I first felt all the intensity of his love; and his sudden, unlooked-for return.

That day came up before me continually. I heard the sound of clear ringing footsteps in the hall when I thought him hundreds of miles away, and started to be caught to his heart, and feel that my quick recognition of that familiar treat was indeed a blessed reality! How tenderly he smoothed back my hair as I clung to him—afraid he would vanish as strangely as he had come—and pressed my cheek close and closer to his breast, till I could hear the strong throbbing of his heart; and then he whispered, "I must be my wife, Agnes, before I leave you again; this separation will be intolerable if I can not pour out my whole heart to you, and think of you as all mine!"

Yet he was to return the next day; for his sad errand of secret to a deceased comrade, one of the first to baptize the soil of Virginia with heroic blood, was already accomplished. It was all so strange, so hurried, so dream-like, when I stood up between my kind uncle and aunt the next morning, and my uncle laid my hand in Arthur's, and, trembling from head to foot, I made those solemn vows that bound me to him for life and death.

Once—only once—I heard his dear voice utter the sacred name of "wife"—and then it was all over; my clasping arms were unlocked from his neck with tender and gentle force, my husband's first and last kisses were showered upon my face—and he was gone!

Was this the end of my faithful watching and waiting—ceaseless vigils in spirit by an unknown, unhonored grave?

But now neither bitter realities nor tender memories mingled in the sleep to which I sank; for hours my unstirred pillow was as dreamless as that of the dead, and I awoke so rested and so calm that at first they feared the new mood only as a more insidious symptom of mental malady. I had a plan and purpose of life—for a time, at least—which had come to me as suddenly as an inspiration. I had been denied that which I had coveted—to soothe his pain, to watch by his bed of suffering; but there were those who had suffered in the same holy cause to whom I could minister—his comrades, who, in turn, were far from all they loved.

My aunt called it madness when I told her of my intention to leave my sheltered home with her, and devote myself to the wearing, self-sacrificing life of nurse among the hospitals. "My health forbade;" "my strength had never been taxed;" "it was a romance I should soon be cured of;" "they would not undertake the risk to which my life would be exposed." But I had expected opposition, and met it quietly but firmly. An only child, self-will had been long a governing principle, and they finally gave way, believing what I told them, that it was my only escape from madness, the prospect of action, a mind and heart both occupied fully.

I knew he would have approved my course, and what was my ease and comfort that it could not be resigned when Arthur's had been so readily sacrificed? And suppose the worst came—or what they thought so—there was a selfish, cowardly pleasure to me in the thought that I should then be united to him again so soon.

I wanted to put on the mourning-dress which suited my condition, but that they would not allow me. Arthur's relations opposed it "while there was hope." Alas! there had never been hope. Some of them caviled at my purpose, and called it unwomanly; but then they had at my sudden marriage also—dull souls, who made religion of routine and social observance.

It was the first approach to happiness I had known when I put on the plain gray dress which Arthur had always liked so much, calling me his "little nun," and knelt down in the silence of my own room with a vow of consecration to my God and my suffering fellow-creatures; for He accepted it, I knew, blotting out the human weakness of my rebellion. I knew it by the power that I had given me at that moment to look upon the past without bitterness, and the long, weary future without a cowardly shrinking from it.

My dear aunt waited for me below, with tears that she could not restrain; she saw my blighted life in my thin, worn face, and she had tried so hard to make me happy after that first great loss, and be a mother to me. I stood on the spot where I had been made Arthur's wife. How should I return to my home again? How pass through those doors that now closed so reluctantly upon me?

But then all pain was over save meeting my uncle's pitiful looks, from time to time, as we went on our little journey together.

The surgeons did not care to admit me at first—my youth and inexperience were against me; but my uncle told them my story with a faltering voice, and I pleaded so humbly for the least and lowest office, that they allowed me to remain. My narrow, comfortless quarters were assigned me, and my longed-for task began.

The first day tried my resolution to the utmost; the long rows of sufferers, the wan and wasted faces, the pitiful imploring looks from eyes that followed me as I passed, the sickening sight of maimed and wounded limbs, the ghastly stump cushioned into sight and coolness, the ravings of delirium, the wan, ashen faces of the dying!—oh, my God, that such scenes should be!—repeated with unvarying sameness through those long, dull wards—through miles of wards like these all over our land! And then I saw his sufferings in theirs. Ah! I could not close my eyes, could not compose my limbs to sleep; could only start, and turn, and pray for them and for those they loved, and for my country, all those long wakeful hours.

After that I entered into my work with the exceeding comfort I had expected, and an eager interest in individual suffering that surprised me. When I first came upon the empty bed of one who had been my peculiar care, and who had passed beyond the reach of all ministry, I wept as if I had lost a brother. I forgot aching limbs and weary head when moistening lips blackened by fever, cooling the stiffened bandages, or turning the heated pillow. The close, heavy air ceased to sicken me, my nerves shrank no longer at cries of pain or sight of gaping wound, if so I could prepare a cordial or bathe the sinking pulse back to life again.

Two weeks had passed, and I had won the confidence of the surgeon who had opposed my admission most decidedly. He was abrupt and cold in his manner, but he had a warm and feeling heart; these men had found it out beneath his brusque exterior, for no woman's touch was more gentle, though so firm and rapid in all that required to be done.

I had never obtruded myself upon him, but I noticed, with a pleasure like the award of commendation, that he began to intrust his orders to me more and more; that he singled me out for cases that required the most constant watchfulness. This day he said to me, after giving his directions, "You have not broken down yet, poor thing! poor young thing!"

It was as if my father had pitied and caressed me; but it was so unlooked-for that I almost gave way to tears before him.

That same afternoon I found myself passing a ward that had been prepared some days for new arrivals, just as they were bringing in those sad and touching burdens. Men helpless as infants clung to the arms that supported them, or tottered to the beds prepared for them like little children just learning to walk; stretchers as ghastly as biers passed and repassed with those to whom all places were alike, so that motion would cease and they might be allowed to die in peace; others moaned or shrieked at the torture of the tenderest touch; and all were, without exception, squalid and wretched to the last degree. I wondered to see them so, even while I passed from one to another with restoratives; but still I had not heard that they were paroled prisoners, fresh from the filth and privations of the rebel capital. No; there was not even a tremor of possible hope that I might hear his name or his story among that suffering crowd, as one by one passed before me.

I stooped at length over a wan and wasted figure laid upon the bed in the most remote corner. The face was hollow and emaciated, the eyeballs sunken, the dry lips black and parched by fever; the dark hair and heavy beard were closely shaven; the thin hands clasped together, as if death had already released this poor sufferer. I thought it must be so at first; but as I bent down more closely the eyelids were feebly lifted, the lips quivered painfully.

"Yes—it is heaven!"

I caught the feeble, wandering whisper; but, oh, my Heavenly Father! was my mind wandering too?—had pity clouded my brain?

They must have thought I had gone mad! Perhaps the kind surgeon thought so when he turned, the moment after, to find me kneeling by the bed with that poor, wasted, shriveled face cradled in my arms, and my passionate outcries for help startling the painful quiet around us, for life seemed to have flickered and gone out with the look of recognition which I had caught.

I had said—oh how often!—that I would be content if he could die in my arms; and there he lay, slipping away from me into eternity!

I knew it was best, when they unwound my arms as he had done on that blessed morning, and the surgeon lifted me as if I had been a child and carried me from the room; but I crouched down by the door, blessing the falling darkness that sheltered me, and when he had passed out I crept back again to that bedside. Surely we might be trusted: we did not exchange one word! Sight and touch were sufficient; the grateful, almost adoring looks from those large, brilliant eyes, as my hand passed softly over his forehead, wooing for him the sleep that would save him, and praying that it might avail. And at last the lids fell softly, the hand that I clasped sank away, the painfully tense expression faded from his face; and I began to find that it was no cheating dream, but a blessed, hopeful reality, that Arthur had been given back to me from the dead!

How did I return to the home I had left with such a breaking heart? As a bride indeed, with the blessed consciousness that, but for my presence and watchful care, Arthur would have been at that moment lying among the crowded unknown dead of a soldiers' burial-ground. There had been no trace of his name or home, for the fever had been on him when he went out to the battle-field, and he was carried away from it to a prison shelter, wounded and raving in delirium.

Think of the change in my heart and life when I entered the room in which I had suffered those long, slow weeks of torture; when I knelt by the white-robed bed, too speechlessly thankful for words or tears, with Arthur's arm clasping me, and his dear voice thanking God for both of us, and for the strange deliverance which He had wrought!

THE BROKEN VOW.

I.

Dying lies young Effie Logan
While the snow-drops spring:—
Though her lily hand, so wasted,
Wears no bridal ring,
Yet a babe unto her white breast
Tenderly doth cling!

II.

She is dreaming of the false one,
And the traitor's vow
That beguil'd her heart so trusting—
Trusting even now!
"He will come!" she softly murmurs—
Death dews on her brow!

III.

Lo! a Chief spurs o'er the heather,
And the draw-bridge falls,
And a stately step is sounding
Through Glenallen's halls.

IV.

Well she knew that haughty footfall—
With a sobbing cry
Stretching wide her arms so wasted—
"Kiss me ere I die!

V.

"Fold me fondly to your bosom!
Clasp me closer still!
Let me feel my true-love's kisses
Though his kiss doth kill!

VI.

"Though my woes of hope bereft me,
Did my sore heart break?
No! I lived—that bliss was left me—
For thy bairnie's sake!

VII.

"Fast my soul is fleeting homeward
From this weary strife—
By the babe that calls ye Father—
By my ruined life—
Let the stone among the daisies
Bear the name of Wife!

VIII.

"Bring the priest and wed me, Gordon,
If ye love me still!"
See, his proud, wild heart is heaving
With a softer thrill;
With a pang he kiss'd her white lips—
"By Christ's love I will!"

* * * * *

IX.

When the clans swept down to battle
On Culloden's day,
Gallant Gordon bravely perish'd,
Foremost in the fray:
With his tartan pierced and bloody,
On the muir he lay.

X.

Effie and her babe are resting
From this weary strife,
And the stone among the daisies
Bears the name of wife.
She hath sinned, and she hath suffered—
Christ absolve her life.

THE WAR IN KENTUCKY.

We reproduce on page 660 a picture by our special artist, Mr. Mosler, representing the Entry of Buell's Army into Louisville, Kentucky; on page 661 another picture, also by Mr. Mosler, showing the Movement of Veterans on the Ohio; and on the same page a sketch by Mr. Hübner, representing Shelbyville, the only Union town in Tennessee.

Buell entered Louisville on September 25. The Herald correspondent, writing on that day, said:

I have to announce the junction of the main portion of the United States forces under General Buell, and the army under General Nelson, assembled for the immediate defense of this city. The advance of General Buell reached the city to-day, and is going into temporary camp on the eastern limits of the town. The advance consisted of General Crittenden's division. It is followed by those of M'Cook, Smith (formerly Ammen's), and Wood. General Buell reached here during last night, and will to-day assume the command of all the forces in the vicinity. A new organization of the two armies into one will doubtless ensue.

Speaking of Buell's rapid march from Green River, the same writer says:

The march from Green River has been made in the rear of Bragg, and battle has been several times offered him, but we have had no response. The whole march has had the appearance of a rapid retreat on the part of Bragg, but General Buell, as if designing to push him as far North as possible, has pursued slowly. The theory of an officer on General Crittenden's staff, with whom I have conversed is, that Bragg has been retreating ever since he reached Glasgow and made an attack on Munfordsville. Failing in his first attempt, the rebel moved up in force and took the position to find that Buell was in line of battle in his rear on Thursday morning. Too late to fall back to Glasgow, Bragg hastily moved forward to Elizabethtown, and, on Thursday night, made a forced march, evacuating Munfordsville in such haste that he did not destroy the railroad bridge at that point. General Buell did not discover this until next morning, when he immediately moved forward. Thomas's corps—Rousseau and Schœpff—by the Glasgow and Bardstown road, and Wood, M'Cook, Crittenden, and Ammen (now Smith), by the road to Elizabethtown.

Colonel Edward M'Cook, Second Indiana cavalry, had the advance of the main column in Bragg's rear. He began to feel Bragg at Bacon Creek, and skirmished with him for three days. Major William H. Polk, volunteer aid on General Crittenden's staff, describes this skirmishing on the part of Colonel M'Cook as exceedingly skillful and successful. He moved with rapidity, and was every where at the same time. He boldly attacked the rebel flanks, and made gallant dashes and charges upon the retreating column. Colonel M'Cook and his men were in the saddle night and day, and harassed the enemy most terribly. He killed a large number, and has brought in over seven hundred prisoners. He states that among the rebels killed in skirmishing with Bragg's rear were Colonel Forsyth, formerly editor of the Mobile Register, and on Bragg's staff; Major Wicks, of Hardee's staff; Lieutenant-Colonel Brown, in command of Bragg's rear-guard, and two captains. Among the prisoners are several majors and two captains. The privates, in many instances, were stragglers, but many were taken in actual skirmish. Colonel Edward M'Cook is a member of the M'Cook family. It is not ridiculous or obscure language I use when I say he is a son of old M'Cook, for the name is historical, and the old man and all his sons have made their mark in this war.

The picture on page 661 needs no description. As soon as it was known that the rebel armies were moving northward through Kentucky portions of our veterans were quietly sent north, on transports up the Mississippi and the Ohio, and distributed among the new levies at Louisville and Cincinnati. These are the troops who fought at Fort Donelson and Shiloh. Their arrival and their thoroughly soldierly aspect gave heart and hope to the frightened denizens of those cities.

Of Mr. Hübner's picture of Shelbyville the artist says: "Shelbyville is the county seat of Bedford County, in Middle Tennessee. It is not only noted for its beauty, but for the loyalty of its inhabitants. Shelbyville stands alone in the rebel States true to the Union. To the Federal soldier, on his march through the rebellious States, Shelbyville is like an oasis to a traveler in a great desert. Your correspondent had the pleasure of entering Shelbyville with the advance-guard of General Mitchell's division, it being the first to penetrate Middle Tennessee and Northern Alabama. The citizens shouted for joy at the sight of the columns of Union men. Flags were waved from the principal public buildings and most of the private residences. Unlike most portions of the South, the wealthiest and most influential persons of the town are loyal. The accompanying sketch represents the Stars and Stripes waving from a pole erected in the public square by the citizens, and although the place is not at present occupied by Union troops, the national banner still waves in defiance of the threats of rebellious citizens and guerrillas of the State. The names of such men as Wisener, Warren, and others deserve to be perpetuated in history for their unyielding fidelity to the great republic. Their sacrificing spirit should nerve up the loyal men of the North, and be an example to the weak-kneed Union men of the South.

"The kind hospitality of the citizens of Shelbyville will never be forgotten by the Union soldier whose good fortune it has been to enter the place."

THE PRIZE FLEET.

The illustration of the Prize Fleet, which we publish on page 668, by no means includes all the steamers captured by our naval forces, but only refers to those at present in our harbor.

The largest of the fleet is the Circassian, formerly one of the Galway line of steamers. She is about 2300 tons, and is a very fast and stanch vessel. She was captured in the Gulf, with an assorted cargo on board, bound for rebeldom. She is at present at the Navy-yard, where she will be put in order for the purpose, it is said, of carrying out the first colored emigrants to Chiriqui.

Next in size is the Memphis, also a British-built steamer, which was captured off Charleston on the 21st of July, 1862, by the Magnolia, formerly a rebel steamer. The Memphis was libeled August 8, and purchased by the Navy Department for a cruiser. She is at the Navy-yard, and is a splendid specimen of naval architecture.

The Stettin is also at the Navy-yard, to be fitted for naval service. She was captured on the 24th of May, 1862, off the coast of South Carolina, by the Bienville. She was loaded with munitions of war in great abundance.

The Elizabeth, a wooden vessel, has borne at least half a dozen names, among the number that of the General Miramon. She was captured, with a full cargo of war materials, on the 27th of May, by the steamer Keystone State.

The Patras was captured near Bull's Bay, South Carolina, on the 27th of May, by the Bienville, and was libeled April 21. Her cargo consisted of hardware, quinine, powder, arms, lead, etc.

The Tubal Cain was captured at sea on the 24th of July, by Commander D. D. Porter, in the Octorora. She was loaded with arms and munitions of war.

The Ann was captured on the 17th of July, by the Susquehanna, Kanawha, and Preble. She had a large cargo of powder, and some arms and medicines.

The Ella Warly, formerly the Isabel of Charleston, was captured on the 24th of April, by the St. Jago de Cuba, and was libeled June 4, 1862. Her cargo consisted of arms, skins, copper, paper, cigars, and powder.

The ship Alliance was captured by the army under General Burnside at Morehead city, North Carolina, May 12, 1862, when she was awaiting an opportunity to run the blockade. Her cargo consisted of rosin, turpentine, and pitch. She was turned over to Captain Lockwood, senior naval officer in command.

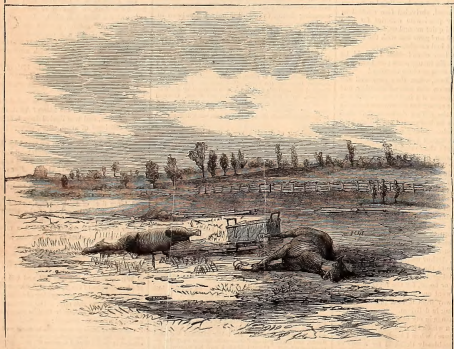
A large fleet of sailing vessels are now in the harbor awaiting the action of the United States Marshal.

Our neutral friend John Bull has unwillingly contributed somewhat to the increase of our navy.

THE BATTLE OF ANTIETAM.

We reproduce on pages 664 and 665 a number of photographs of the Battle of Antietam, taken by the well-known and enterprising photographer, Mr. M. B. Brady, of this city. The following description of these wonderfully lifelike pictures is from one who knew the ground:

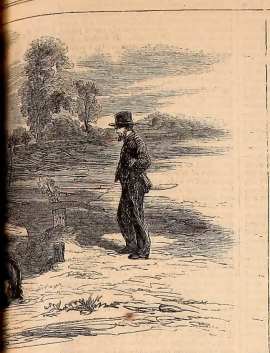
The first of these pictures—the large view of Antietam creek and bridge, the crossing of which General Burnside effected at such a fearful sacrifice of life—exhibits little or no traces of the conflict. The spot is just as lovely and tranquil as when last we visited it. Artistically speaking, the picture is one of the most beautiful and perfect photograph landscapes that we have seen. The tone is clear and firm, but soft, and every object is brought out with remarkable distinctness. Next to it is a smaller photograph, some seven inches square, which tells a tale of desperate contention. Traversing it is seen a high rail fence, in the fore-ground of which are a number of dead bodies grouped in every imaginal position, the stiffened limbs preserving the same attitude as that maintained by the sufferers in their last agonies. Minute as are the features of the dead, and unrecognizable by the naked eye, you can, by bringing a magnifying glass to bear on them, identify not merely their general outline, but actual expression. This, in many instances, is perfectly horrible, and shows through what tortures the poor victims must have passed before they were relieved from their sufferings.



Another photograph exhibits a deep trench or gully, one side of which had been protected by a strong fence, the rails of which are seen scattered about. Lying transversely in its depths, where they have evidently fallen in attempting to cross, are piles of rebel dead, many of them shoeless and in rags. On the left bank are a number of persons examining the spot with curious interest, visitors probably from some of the Northern cities.

A poetic and melancholy interest attaches to the next scene that we come to. There is such a dash of sentiment in it that it looks more like an artistic composition than the reproduction of an actuality. A new-made grave occupies the centre of the picture, a small head and foot board, the former with lettering, defining its limits. Doubled up near it, with the features almost distinguishable, is the body of a little drummer-boy who was probably shot down on the spot. How it happens that it should have been left uninterred, while the last honors were paid to one of his comrades, we are unable to explain. Gazing on the body, with a pitying interest, stands in civilian's attire one of those seedy, shiftless-looking beings, the first glance at whom detects an ill-spent career and hopeless future. It is some time, perhaps, since that blunted nature has been moved by such deep emotion as it betrays at this mournful sight.

We now pass on to a scene of suffering of another character, where, under tents, improvised by blankets stretched on fence-rails, we see the wounded receiving the attentions of the medical staff. Next to it is a bleak landscape, on which the shadows of evening are rapidly falling, revealing, in its dim light, a singular spectacle. It is that of a row of dead bodies, stretching into the distance, in the form of an obtuse angle, and so mathematically regular that it looks as if a whole regiment were swept down in the act of performing some military evolution. Here and there are beautiful stretches of pastoral scenery, disfigured by the evidences of strife, either in the form of broken caissons, dead horses, or piles of human corpses. In one place a farm-house offers visible marks of the hot fire of which it was the centre, the walls being battered in and the lintels of the windows and doors broken.



SCENES ON THE BATTLE-FIELD OF ANTIET

—From Photographs by Mr. M. B. Brady.—[See Page 663.]

WAITING.

When he comes back, all glorious,
With the love-light in his eye,
From the battle-field victorious,
Who'll be happier then than I!
See, the big arm-chair is waiting,
Vacant still, in its old place—
Time! press quickly on the hours
Till I see his pleasant face!

He was too young, they told me,
To march against the foe;
Yet when his country needed aid
His mother bade him go!
'Twere meet slaves should tremble
Whom tyrants hold in thrall;
But my boy was a freeman born,
He went at Freedom's call.

My small weak hand would waver
The shortest sword to bear;
But he stands steady in the ranks,
And holds his musket there.
My faint heart would falter
The battle-ground to see;
But his is strong in Freedom's might,
He fights for her and me.

I am watching and waiting,
As mothers watch and wait
Whose sons are in the army now,
And it is growing late;
My life's past its morning,
It's near sunset in the sky—
Oh! I long once more to clasp him
In my arms before I die.

Yet farther off the army goes—
He will return no more,
Till our glorious flag is free again
To float o'er sea and shore.
Where'er it waved in days gone by,
Its folds again shall rest,
From the depths of the lowest valleys
To the highest mountain crest.

And he, my boy, my darling,
The pride of my old heart!
Where'er his place may be, I know
He will fulfill his part.
Not until the war is over
Shall we meet in fond embrace—
Time! press swiftly on the hours
Till I see his pleasant face!

HOW THE ENGLISH PLUNDERED DELHI, IN 1857.

[The October number of Harper's Magazine contained an article giving some account of the atrocities perpetrated by the English in the suppression of the Sepoy "Rebellion." The London Cornhill Magazine for the same month contains an account of the Plunder of Delhi, which we reproduce with slight curtailment. It is a personal narrative of the proceedings of a single individual, and similar scenes were taking place all over the city. Imagine [illegible] execration that would be heard all over England could one of our officers at New Orleans or Nashville give a similar detail of his proceedings in either of those cities.—Ed. Harper's Weekly.]

The siege was over. We were safe within the red walls; our dead were buried. We had not time to weep, for Delhi was to be looted, and hodie mihi was every body's motto. Before the assault, confident of the result, we had elected prize-agents by vote, who were to see fair play, collect the spoil, and realize afterward; they did their duty well, but where's the money? At that time they were the greatest men within the walls—greater even than Wilson, who, as somebody said, can not be refused the credit of having commanded the army that took the city—greater even than poor Hodson, who had just brought back the old king from Humayou's tomb where he had fled for sanctuary, together with the bodies of the princes, slain before their father's eyes, to be exposed stark naked in the "Silver Road," the main street of Delhi. We were certainly savage in our wrath then. But for the man laid the other day in the Abbey, we should have done deeds of massacre and rapine in those times which England never could have sufficiently atoned for.

The prize-agents soon discovered that there was little valuable treasure overground; the jewelers, the workers in the precious metals (for whom Delhi is famous), the Cashmere fabric and silk merchants, the bankers and money-changers, had, months before the assault, when the sepoys first seized the city in the name of the Moghul, either hidden or buried their wealth; for they trusted their own countrymen not at all. In the panic flight of the inhabitants upon our getting in, they left their treasures behind them, hoping that they would not be discovered, and intending to return when things had become settled; for they wisely suspected that the English conquerors would at first take little trouble to distinguish between friends and foes. All did, in fact, shortly return, and many influential bankers and merchants were permitted, on proving their loyalty, to redeem their tenements and property, but all movables that could be laid hands on were prize. We were not at all scrupulous; we wanted to tear the gilt copper-sheeting off the domes of the mosques and temples, and add it to the prize heap; but John Lawrence, the now neglected saviour of India (he saved India for us, Earl Canning saved its inhabitants from us), put in a veto, and the sacrilege (from a native point of view) was not committed. It was decided that the wealth of Delhi should be digged out of the bowels of the by no means innocent city; and, as in Australia, the prize-agents conferred licenses on officers, in whose integrity they trusted (I, my friend, was one), to dig for treasure in their behalf. All property discovered was to be brought to the prize-office, in one of the chief streets, a place to describe which would take more time than I can spare now, and the diggers were to get a per-centage upon their "treasure-trove." The diggings promised to be profitable. Labor was cheap and abundant—the only difficulty was to scent out the spoil.

I occupied a large native house in "a central situation," which I had taken possession of shortly after our entry. I planted "touts" at the door, and gave it to be understood that I was a man of great influence with the Government, and of large resources, who was ready to pay liberally for information as to the whereabouts of buried valuables. At first I did not prosper; the inhabitants were slowly returning to their dwellings, trembling and suspicious, more anxious just then about their necks than any thing else. Our troops, white and black, particularly the latter, were busy looking for plunder. However, after many days' waiting, a change came in my fortunes. As I watched the crowd hurrying by one day, a tall gaunt Sikh, with hungry eyes and troubled air, made me a sign. I hurried out at once. He walked aside from the main stream of pedestrians, camels, and bullock-carts, and inquired whether my Highness-ship would make him a promise of secrecy. On my eagerly assenting, he told me that he had a piece of jewelry to sell, and that the price was one thousand rupees cash; he added, further, that if I wished to deal, I must bring the money that evening to a place he named without the Cashmere gate, on the cantonment road, where he promised to meet me.

I scraped together, with some difficulty, five hundred rupees, and went to the spot at the appointed hour. I found the Sikh awaiting me. He produced a frontlet, or forehead-ornament, of large emeralds and diamonds, with a great central ruby, all most clumsily and loosely fixed together. He declined to say how he came by it. "Loot be-shuk," "plunder undoubtedly," he said, with a grin. I was fascinated by the glitter of the gems, but, happily, having only the above sum, I told him I could give no more. After demur and remonstrance, he consented to let me have it, and I returned home satisfied that I had made one successful coup. I rejoiced in the possession of the Sikh's booty for many months, and proudly did I display it one day to a London jeweler, to be told, to my horror, and to the destruction of mighty air-castles, that the stones were pierced and flawed every one, and that their united value did not amount to the sum the ornament had cost me.

Shortly after my bargain I was riding one evening about sunset through the "Dureeba," a winding street, and the most picturesque in Delhi, when I saw a scantily-dressed native of the lowest class, skulking, with a bundle in his hand, in the shade of the shop-roofs, evidently trying to escape my notice. I rode over to him, demanded his business in loud tones, and drawing my sword at the same time threatened him with instant execution. He became sallow, his knees tottered, he muttered some indistinct prayer for the "Kumpanee Bahadoor ke kawa"—"Mercy from the omnipotent Company," and fled, leaving his bundle behind him. I took it to my house, and found, tied up in a singularly unclean cloth, a piece of Cashmere silk embroidery, worth at least £20 in England, a handful or two of parched pease, a ball of tobacco prepared for the "chillum," a lot of cowries or shell-money, and three annas four pie in copper. It was clear that he had stolen the only valuable article in the list, and it was equally clear that it had become mine more or less lawfully.

Next morning (it never rains but it pours) I received a confidential communication from my table servant, as he stood by my bedside, tea-cup in hand; he had met an old friend in the vegetable-market, who said he knew of an old woman who was heard to say that, in a certain house, near the Ajmere gate, there was a sum of money buried in a ghurra, or earthen water-jar, not less, at all events, than 6000 rupees, £600. Some tedious negotiation followed this straightforward statement, but I was finally led to the place, followed by my coolies with digging-tools. A closely-shut door was opened after violent threats, and I got into a small darkened room on the ground-floor, ill-smelling and filthy, with but one article of furniture, a native charpoy, or bedstead, whereon lay an old man, declared by an attendant hag, probably his betrayer, to be bedridden and very ill.

Amidst shrieks of pretended pain from its occupant, the bedstead was moved to one side, in accordance with previous instructions, and the coolies commenced to dig. The ground had evidently been disturbed not long before, and soon a clink, as of metal against pottery, was heard, and the ghurra was lifted out, with a cloth tied over the top—not without some difficulty, as it was of the largest size made. My clumsy assistants managed to break the vessel in setting it down, and amidst triumphant shouts from all the spectators except the old man, who shrieked feeble prayers for pity to the "sirkar," or Government, as represented by me on the occasion, a stream of silver gushed from the interior. Denouncing my workers as the offspring of swine, fit only for Jehennam, and not for the service of a "Protector of the Poor," and "Cherisher of the Oppressed," such as I, I ordered one of them to divest himself of his only garment (some yards of coarse cotton stuff, wound first round the waist, and then round the semi-shaven scalp). We tied our ghurra up in this, swung it on a strong bamboo, and carried it off. The value I found to be very nearly equal to the sum promised, all in rupee and eight anna pieces.

My next take was a noble one—the spolia opima of looting; it struck me that it would be a good plan to try the earth in the vicinity of the jewelers' shops, or, rather, where the jewelers had lived before the siege. I knew Delhi pretty well in former times, and the habitat of the different merchants of note. At gun-fire, one fine morning in October (delightful the early morning in the beginning of the cold weather in the northwest is), I set forth, attended by my six coolies, with the Hindoo equivalents of spades, shovels, and picks on their shoulders, taking with me the Overland Mail, a cheroot-box stuffed with very fair number twos, half a dozen of soda-water, and half a bottle of John Exshaw "Number one." I struck into a circuitous lane near the canal, leading from the "Loll Surrak," or red street, to the Begum Sumroo's garden (Dyce Sombre's Begum), and selected, for my first trial, a ruinous buffalo-dairyman's shed, which stood (or tottered) close by a dirty little hut, then deserted, where one of the chief gold-workers of the place had formerly flourished. I had excavated for a little time without success, when an acute coolie, whose intelligence I afterward rewarded with four annas, sixpence-halfpenny, over and above his lawful wages, suggested a mine under the party-wall. It was easily made, for the wall had no foundation, and was built of "kuccha" or sun-dried bricks of clay, quite friable from age. I read the English news with as much interest as I could, while my men were rooting; but I was soon interrupted by a heavy fall of rotten bricks, a shout from my coolies, and the apparition on the other side of the tumbled wall of my jolly friend Pintle, of the Royal Bengal fire-workers, mattock in hand, with his great red cheeks covered with dust and sudor, his "khakee" tunic dirt-colored indeed and wet through with perspiration, his whole appearance like a navvy's in a solah topee. The rascal was a licensed digger like myself, but he worked alone, on principle; and there were, in consequence, even uglier stories about him than about myself, and that's saying a good deal. We cried simultaneously, "Halves with you!" and struck a partnership on the spot. He knew Delhi better than I did, and worked, as I afterward found, on more scientific data; but my sources of information were better than his, and he acknowledged that solitary digging was an error. The natives began to clear away the rubbish, and while I watched them, Pintle, pulling a small chisel out of his pocket, tested knowingly every likely-looking brick in the jeweler's wall.

"I shouldn't wonder at all," he said, as he went around tapping, "if the swag were here." He had scarcely spoken when, by a neat wrist-turn, he extracted a brick which was a trifle more firmly set than its neighbors, and thrust his chisel into the cavity. "Something soft at all events," he whispered, peering in eagerly. A little skillful scooping produced a small dirty rag tied in a knot. I "lent him a knife:" the rag contained about a dozen uncut sapphires and diamonds of unquestionable value, and a splendid "cat's-eye"—one of those gorgeous dusky orange opals, with as many changes of color in different lights as a cameleon, a real "talisman stone." We looked at each other and sighed; there was at least two hundred pounds' worth of gems in that rag, and there were two of us. Pintle recovered his presence of mind first.

"They" (i. e., the prize-agents) "ought to give us one each," he said.

"Dig on, you worthless demons," I said, turning savagely on the coolies who had suspended their operations to watch ours: so they shoveled away with vehement expressions denoting zeal in the service of my High Mightiness-ship. I may have wished Pintle down the Grand Trunk Road with the "clearing" column; he possibly wished me in Jericho.

We soon got down on the mine I had commenced under the fallen wall; and though the mine led to nothing, yet we found indications on one side of recently broken soil, and finally, beneath the rude platform where the unlucky jeweler used to sit, five feet under the ground, came upon the rest of his treasure: viz., a brass betel-box such as natives use, called a Paun-dan, a quaint ebony casket with joinings of silver, a bale of goods tied carefully in gunny, a "degchee" or copper cooking utensil with a loose lid, and half a dozen brazen dishes and "lotas," or drinking vessels, which latter became our coolies' share of the spoil, and made happier dogs of them than our findings made of us, then or since.

We took our booty off to my quarters; the prize-office was close at hand to be sure, yet we could not deny ourselves the small gratification of being the first to investigate the products of the lode. But it may be asked, how was it that the owners of articles of great value such as gems, so portable and so easily concealable on the person, did not carry them away when they fled? This question is easily answered. The sepoys were really masters of the city and its inhabitants for four clear months; the old king was but nominally supreme: they levied black-mail, in money and kind, from the shroffs and bunyahs, the bankers, tradesfolk, and food-sellers, during that time without mercy. If any who were known to be possessed of means pleaded poverty, the sepoys, under no restraint, searched their houses and their persons, and even beat and tortured them to force them to disgorge. Circumstantial diaries of the events within the walls during the siege were kept by more than one native of the place, which were afterward translated and published in India, and in which were recorded instances after instances of this: the consequence was, that the jewelers and merchants had no resource from the first but to conceal their goods as artfully as they could, and the valuables the Delhi diggers exhumed were originally buried, in order that they might not fall into the hands of the mutineers.

The haul was a grand one that morning. The betel-box was full of gems in all stages of preparation for setting—rubies, onyxes, jaspers, pearls of some price, topazes, gold stones, and pebbles of minor value, such as abound in all the shops of the Delhi jewelers. The copper cooking utensil contained our poor friend's working tools (clumsy they looked, but marvelous is the work native goldsmiths turn out with them), and studs, bracelets, and brooches in gold and silver filigree, of native and English pattern, some of the former very tasteful: there were also gold and silver chains half finished, lumps of unworked precious metal, semi-moulded armlets, nose, ear, and ankle ornaments for native ladies, a few gold mohurs and other coins, in that battered-looking skillet.

The ebony casket we were rather disappointed in. We had some trouble in bursting the lock, to find only an old Koran, illuminated and richly bound to be sure, but then entirely out of proportion as to value we thought. It fetched a high price at the prize sale, for there are book maniacs even in India who are as particular about bits of Arabic scroll and the curves of the reversed caligraphy of the Eastern reed as their brethren at home are about Aldine imprimature and impossible black letter. One enthusiastic gentleman got hold of a piece of goods in the Jumma Musjid, silk or cotton, written all over with sacred sayings from the Koran: this he pronounced to be nothing less than the shirt of the Prophet, and advertised it for sale in the Delhi Gazette at the low figure of five thousand rupees. I did not hear the name of the purchaser. Our eager hands and knives made short work of the outer covering of the bale. Its contents filled us with admiration: purdahs or door-hangings of crimson velvet, four yards long and nearly half as wide, with cords and tassels of gold lace and double bullion, the whole stiffly embroidered with gold in arabesque patterns—quite new, and evidently made to order for some shrine: they had suffered somewhat from the damp of the hiding-place, but were still very gorgeous. There were shawls, and waistbands, and turbans, beautifully embroidered with the highly-dyed silk for which Delhi is famous—chogas or mantles from Cashmere, of the exquisitely fine Pushmeena fabric, with deep selvages of gold-lace work, or needle-made shawl-pattern of the brilliant colors, which, it is said, no dyes can produce save those mixed with the water of the rushing Jhelum. Then there were daggers and stilettoes of strange shapes, made of blue wave-lined steel from the country west of Cabool, the qualities of the metal, and the name and residence of its artificer cut upon the blades in beautiful Persian characters, the handles inlaid with gold and ivory, the sheaths and scabbards of soft wood covered with crimson velvet and gold lace; there were shields too, of light wood and leather, covered with green or crimson velvet and heavily bossed with gold work—all ornamental armor for noble natives on state occasions. The place we were fortunate enough to discover had, it was clear, been selected by a family of different trades to conceal their stocks in. My friend Pintle and I, after bath, breakfast, and cheroot, returned to the house for further exploration; but we found two Ghoorkas (with their khookries on) and a particularly ferocious-looking Belooch in the pit, scraping briskly, and we did not consider it advisable to claim our right of priority.

After this I made no mighty coup. I had many a hard day's work, and so had Pintle, clearing out choked-up wells, probing sewers, stripping staircases, and scraping off room-plaster; but we gained hardly any thing to recompense our toils: all that we did gain the prize-agents got, and so we said, but nobody believed us. Afterward, at the auction, Pintle and I purchased a few little things we admired; our friends said it was a clever "dodge," but that it didn't take them in.

DUGGAN AND HIS GANG.

Though it is now sixty years ago, there are travelers yet alive who, going by stage-coach from Cork to Tralee, have seen the eight skulls that were stuck on spikes on the roof of the market-house in the town of Macroom, in the barony of Muskerry.

People did not like to talk about the skulls. When questioned, the country people said "they were the murderers of Colonel Hutchinson;" but no more could be got out of them. The skulls were a source of disgust and horror to the inhabitants of Macroom, and to all the country round. They had not been subjected to any previous process, as was usually the case with the horrible remains of traitors' heads and members, ordered to be exposed. These heads had been put over the market-house at Macroom just as they were struck from the bodies to which they belonged.

Above one of the heads there was nailed a hand, severed at the wrist, and the sight of the half-bleached skulls was hideous. They cowed the people, and struck more fear of the law into their hearts than as many regiments of dragoons. That part of the country, for many years after the event that gave rise to this spectacle, was the most peaceable district in Ireland. The fate of the "murderers of Mr. Hutchinson" was a very effective terror to evil-doers. But who were they? and what was the story? Here it is: for though people would not tell it, it is on record in the criminal trials.

Mr. Hutchinson was an amiable and worthy man, who lived at a house called Codrum, about a mile out of the market-town of Macroom. It stood in its own plantation, on a rising ground, with a lawn before it, dotted with ornamental trees, and adorned with fair beds of flowers. Colonel Hutchinson was a man of property; he belonged to what was called a "new family," but he was much respected by the neighboring gentry; the poor people were fond of him, for he was an excellent and charitable man.

One morning, early in the summer of the year 1800, the neighborhood was thrown into commotion by the report that Colonel Hutchinson had been murdered in the night. Some laborers passing to their work saw the large kitchen window, in the front of the house, completely smashed. Going up to learn what had happened, they found the shutter broken in, the front door open, and the body of Colonel Hutchinson lying dead and stiff at the foot of the stairs, with a wound through his heart. Shot dead, as was supposed.

None of the inmates could give any account of the matter. Miss Hutchinson could only say that she had been awakened by the noise of the kitchen window being smashed in, and the sound of several persons rushing into the house. In her fright she left her bed and hid behind a large press, up stairs in a garret, and had not ventured out till long after all was quiet. Reen, the man-servant, stammered and looked exceedingly guilty, but could give no information. All the neighboring gentry belonged to the yeomanry corps—Catholics as well as Protestants—and they found themselves by an oath put to rest until the murderers were discovered.

A reward of three hundred pounds was offered for any information that could lead to their detection. One remarkable thing was, that although a handsome looking-glass had been broken, and some furniture pulled about, nothing had been stolen. Suspicion at last fell on a man named Malachi Duggan. He was a farmer of the better class; superior to the common peasantry in education and intelligence, as well as in circumstances, but, however, a very bad character. In appearance he was the type of a ruffian; of gigantic stature, and strong in proportion; his countenance was brutal and ferocious, with a dash of cunning which made it more repulsive; and altogether he was the most respectable in the neighborhood as a juryman! People who had a cause in court used to bribe him to be on the jury, and if he were not chosen he was insulted, he, possibly, also bribed the summoning officer. He then always either voted out, or "hung" a verdict—generally his fellow-jurors. When the officers went to his house, accompanied by several magistrates, they found him at home. He made no attempt to escape, but treated the charge lightly. One of the magistrates advised him to give orders about his horses, as he would be away a long time.

"Sure, it will not be more than a couple of days at the furthest," said he.

"It will be more than two days, or two weeks, or two years," said the magistrate.

Malachi changed his manner, ordered his nag to be saddled, and he cut a long willow switch for the purpose of urging on his horse. Then he went to attend to any thing passing round him, sent rods on in silence, with the end of this rod in his mouth. He continued to keep it there, and in his escort arrived at Macroom, a distance of only three miles, in the short space of about half-an-hour, within an inch of the end. He had been considering. He offered to turn informer if he might be assured of having bail bond found and the rod burned. His offer was accepted, and Malachi Duggan stated that on the night in question, a certain Sunday, he and others, assembled, and went in a body to attack Coltom, with the intention of plundering whatever they could carry off, but without any design to harm Colonel Hutchinson. Colonel Hutchinson was sitting or reading at window, as he hearing the noise of the window smashed and the shutter broken in, he immediately came down stairs to see what was the matter. Then the mob fell tiled with men, some of whom were armed; among them he saw his own game-keeper, named M'Carthy, and several of his tenantry.

"Are you here, M'Carthy?"

Malachi Duggan, the captain of the gang, at once called out:

"M'Carthy, do your duty!"

The game-keeper raised his gun and fired. Colonel Hutchinson fell dead. The sight of his dead body struck them with panic, and they retreated from the house, taking nothing with them. Malachi Duggan gave the names of all the men who had been with him. The magistrates and gentry immediately began a strict search, but the criminals, as soon as it was rumored that Malachi had turned informer, took to the hills and concealed themselves—all the country people, of course, assisting and aiding them. The County Cork was at that time a period under martial law, and the Cork yeomanry were a formidable body. They were determined that the murderers of Colonel Hutchinson should not escape, and they hunted down all the peasants suspected of giving them shelter. Half a day's work were on the track of some of the murderers; but the inhabitants of a mountain hamlet had aided their escape. Frequent measures were taken on the spot. The cabins were searched; every article of furniture was dragged out, and the thatch, and then set on fire—the wretched owners standing round, not daring to say a word. One of the soldiers, separated from the ranks, wandering on into a house, found a feather-bed carefully concealed. He was charging this part of the house with the rest of the rest, when the captain, a man of humanity, cried out:

"No, gentlemen, these wretched people have suffered enough; let us leave them at least this bed."

As he spoke, a ball whizzed past, grazing his ear. Turning round, a puff of white smoke was seen over the brow of a hill behind them. Immediately he and all two other gentlemen dashed to the spot, feeling sure they had come upon the criminals. They, however, found only two peasants, who had no connection with Duggan or his gang. They belonged to the village, and, exasperated at seeing the destruction of their goods, had fired the shot. They were immediately seized, and dragged to the prison of Macroom. They were charged with firing on the yeomanry, but for helping and hiding the murderers, and they were condemned to be transported. Their trial and sentence took place at great speed. When they were on board the hulks, all their relations and friends came to a place called Coolmeen, a cross-road, and offered, if there two men were restored to their families, that the whole country should join to hunt down the murderers and give them up to justice. After some consideration this offer was accepted.

The men were pardoned, sent back to their homes, and the people of the county began to keep their word. The murderers now led the life of hunted wolves, and endured fearful hardships. Winter was approaching, and they did not dare to seek concealment; every one was against them. Two contrived to escape to America; but the others wandered about among the mountains of Glenflesk, hiding under rocks, not daring to kindle a fire. At length the people pretended to become friendly to them: some villagers invited them to come to a supper in a barn, where they declared they would be safe. The men, more than half-famished, came down from the mountains, but refused to enter any building lest they should be surprised; they sat down on the ground and began to eat voraciously. The peasants fell upon them, disarmed them, and gave them up to justice. The trial came on. Malachi Duggan swore to them all, gave a circumstantial account of the murder, and several others, cautious to his own infamy. One of the men was his own cousin, named John Duggan, a stone-mason. This man was not destitute of the family cunning; he declared that Colonel Hutchinson had not been shot at all; that if his body could be seen, it would be found that the wound had been made by a sharp instrument, and that the end of his chisel would fit the wound; that Colonel Hutchinson had been shot, discharging the gun was a lie. This circumstantial account shook the jury. The gang was disentered and examined. Three bullets and a brace of slugs were found behind the heart. This of course settled the question. Malachi was all sentenced to be hanged, and their heads to be exposed on spikes over the jail-entrance gates. Strictly, the game-keeper, as the man who fired the shot, was to have his hand struck off and affixed above his head.

The prisoners were to be executed at Macroom, and they were conveyed there in a cart, an open cart: the hangman—a hideous person—clothed for the occasion in bright green, with a belt on which pistols and long knives, "Erin go bragh"—for show what Erin go Bragh principles led to.

The priests were in attendance on the criminals when they had performed about half the journey, in order that the people, seeing them die without the consolations of religion, might be roused with greater ave. One of the criminals was quite a young boy, cousin to the murderer. He was not executed, and that the worst thing he had ever done was stealing some hens' eggs from his mother's roost. He was kept in appearance that he our innocent, but that Duggan had sworn against him, in order not to leave one of the family alive, who might be witness upon him. When the cart and the wretched men arrived at a grove of trees at the entrance of Macroom, they were halted. A beam was laid between two trees, and two of the men were hanged, one at each end; their companions looking on at the people standing by in silence. When all had suffered, the hangman proceeded to cut off the heads of the men. At silence, though even his callous feelings revolted against it, and he required copious draughts of whisky to enable him to do it. The heads of the eight heads struck a great deal more terror into the people than the bodies.

As for Malachi Duggan, the captain of the gang, and treacherous informer, he received the three hundred pounds reward, and emigrated with his family. The neighboring gentry endeavored to countenance him, but he was quite beyond the pale of all acquaintance, though the first day on which he appeared in Macroom he looked up to the heads and said: "Ha! I have got you at last, my fine fellows, and in array. It is the best place for the rascals."

He survived many years, and at last died in his bed at last; but his memory is held, even yet, in the deepest execration in that part of the country.

"O! that was the most curious trouble not more than twelve or fourteen years ago. A gentleman living in the neighborhood, a magistrate, was murdered in his own house. One of them was a very nice young girl, named Duggan, a far away cousin of the hanged man, Malachi Duggan. A dispute about some trifling matter, and one of the other servants said to Duggan, 'We shall have to get rid of that girl, Miss Malachi.' The poor girl did not answer a word, but that very evening she left her place and went to live with people at a distance of five-and-twenty miles, so disgraceful was the imputation of belonging even remotely to the treacherous informer.

AN ENGLISHWOMAN'S STORY.

"My father was a merchant, and owned many ships. He sent them to the West Indies, the East Indies, and Australia, and China. He owned one and the ships. My father used to allow me to go on board with him when they were about to sail, or had arrived from a long voyage. I sometimes took such little presents on board as sailors like, and they said I would give them a kiss for a present. They did not forget me, and brought me many a nice present from beyond the seas.

"My father had a favorite ship, and found a new captain, whom I had never seen before. I thought him very handsome, and he was very kind to me. He told me afterward that he was good and honorable. He had been in the royal navy. A great misfortune had befallen him, and he resigned from it to leave the service and accept the higher pay of a merchantman. He was a long time at sea, and was very much tossed, and he came to love me better than all the world.

"One day that they did not love him so well as another person did—at least, he did not wish me to love him. I was only a child, and could not know that I saw him, and when the time for his arrival drew near, and the ship, for me so richly laden, was in sight, I was on the cliffs with my telescope to the top of our house, sweeping the line of the horizon with a long spy-glass, and when I saw the little signal flag that I adore know of, and that would tell me it was coming.

"One day that my father was at home, and he won my heart, asked my father for my hand. He could have nothing against him. He was wealthy himself; but I was my father's pet and pride, and he would not have thought of refusing him what he would then have satisfied him for a son-in-law.

"Captain Walter came and told me, with some bitterness, the result of his interview with my father. I knew that he was poor, but I knew that this was the only reasonable objection that could be made to him, and I laid my hand in his—a strong, manly hand—strong and true, and I said, 'Be patient: I am yours, and I will never be my one's but yours while this world stands.'

"He said I must expect a long voyage, and a very important one, for my father liked him as a captain of his ship, and knew well that he could trust him to the last drop of his blood to protect ship and cargo.

"When he came home next time I had reflected much, and determined upon what I ought to do. I did not wait for him to come and see me. I did not wait for him to ask me to do any thing. I knew that he could not while he was my father's captain. So I went to the ship, and said: 'Captain Walter, will you leave this all to me, to do as I think right?'

"He only held me to his big heart a moment, but he looked a thousand yeses out of his handsome, loving eyes.

"The day his ship was to sail on her next voyage I sent my trunks on board the ship. Then I found my father, and said: 'Come with me, and redeem your promise, and I will keep mine.' We went to a church, the banns were ready, and we were married. The ship was ready to sail, and I knew that my father was on board to give his last directions, and was not. I was then on board with my husband, and my father was not surprised, for I had often sailed out with him, and remained in the pilot-boat.

"When the ship was fairly out a good offing, and the pilot was ready to take us back, my father said his last words to the captain, and shook hands, wishing him a good voyage. 'Come, darling,' said he to me: 'say good-by to Captain Walter, for we must go now.'

"I fixed myself, 'said I, 'forgive your darling; I can not go with you now.'

"'What, Captain Walter!'

"He looked from one to the other to see if they were jest or earnest.

"'Yes, father,' said I, 'you could never have found me so good a husband. So I took him this morning, and I have now my one, and here is the certificate that I am his wife.'

"Poor father! He turned very pale, but he loved me more than he was his. He took me in his arms and kissed me, while his tears ran over my cheeks. He said that he could not be angry to brave captain in token of forgiveness. He went home alone in the pilot-boat.

"The ship was England faded from our sight, and we were on the open sea. We had fair winds and fool, still, and gentle breezes, and I became a sailor. We crossed the line, doubled the Cape of Good Hope, and sailed on weeks and weeks through the Indian Sea to Batavia, and then to Canton. When our cargo was completed we sailed homeward again.

"Now, as we were reaching our northern latitudes, my captain came hastily into the cabin to get his sextant, and I followed him on deck. There was a vessel in sight bearing down directly for us. She had changed her course since we first saw her, and it was evident she meant to come near us.

"My captain took a long look at her. Well?' said I, standing at his elbow, and taking the glass from his hand.

"'I don't like good eyes, darling,' said he, 'see what you can make of her.'

"I looked at her intently to my eye, and looked intently. 'I is an armed vessel,' said I. 'I see ports, and a large gun amidships.'

"'Quite correct—and usual,' said my captain.

"But she does not look like a man-of-war,' said I, 'and I do not think she is English.'

"No more is she,' said he. 'Either war has been declared, or she is a privateer, or she is a cursed pirate.'

"I never was a coward. I held the glass steadily in my hands, and watched the brig as she bore down with all sail set, and it was evident that she was a good sailor. There had been talk of war before we left England, but my father did not believe in it. I shuddered at the idea of its being a pirate.

"Whatever she may be,' said my captain, 'she has no business with us. Get you below, my love, and I will give our ship the best possible trim, the sails were wet; but it was necessary to dry them in the sun. Meanwhile, the brig was gaining on us—slowly, indeed, but certainly gaining.

"'Now, my darling, bring a long chair, Calista, darling,' said my captain, cheerily; but I could see that he was not at all satisfied with the aspect of affairs.

"'You know that I am not a coward,' said I; 'and this can not be war.'

"'I know your soul is bigger than your body, my darling,' said he. 'This reachy little brig can not be. I can not have foul weather to-night, we may change our course and lose sight of her. I see no sign of it. She is not strong enough to fight us.'

"There are muskets and pistols in the cabin,' said I, 'and we have two cannon on deck.'

"Still enough to frighten savages, or beat off the Malay pirates; but that brig is well armed, and must have a crew of forty, by the way they handle her. If she is a privateer, we must surrender. If a pirate, I will not be taken alive. You will make your own wood of us, but we must take our chance.

"I was bold on, praying for night, and storm, and darkness. The full moon rose high in the heavens, and silvered the waves through which our good ship plowed gallantly. Nearer and nearer came our pursuer. Once the wind freshened, and we seemed to gain a slight advantage, but it soon fell off again, and the brig crept nearer and nearer. Few slept. By the full morning light there lay the handsome brig, full over our taffrail, bounding along with a bone in her mouth. My brave husband walked the deck in sore trouble. He had made the best possible preparations for defence, the crew were ready to obey his orders, but the case was desperate.

"As the light increased I watched the brig closer through the glass, trying to ascertain the character of our pursuer. A flag of stars and stripes went up to her mast-head, and the smoke of a cannon curled up from her deck. It was the first signal. The commander of the brig was in the field of my glass and my worst fears were dispelled.

"'Look!' said I to my husband, giving him the glass; 'that man is not a pirate.'

"I could not be mistaken. He was a fine-looking man of thirty-five or forty, in an undress naval uniform. His bearing was manly, and his face was that of a look at it, was clear and open. My captain took the glass and gave an anxious look.

"'I believe you are right, my darling,' said he. 'The man is no pirate. Then it is war, and we shall soon be his prisoners. It is a hard case, but there is no help for it.'

"'I do not be cast down my brave captain,' said I; 'father knows him ship's, and has dealed this one from my portion.'

"Just then another shot from the long gun came alongside, and showed that we were within point blank range. The order was given to take in sail, and we waited for the brig to come up. As she came on, dashing gallantly through the waves, my captain took his trumpet and hailed her. The hail was courteously responded to. It was a United privateer demanding our surrender.

"On the part of grim, and half a chance at him!' exclaimed my captain; but the disparity of force was too overwhelming. In answer to the question, he gave the name of his vessel and ship and his own.

"Then I, who was watching the deck of the enemy still through the glass, though we were now so near, saw a strange movement. The captain of the brig suddenly put up his glass, and then turned on my husband. Then he appeared to give some order to the lieutenant who commanded on board us, and soon sprang into the boat himself, and came on board of us.

"He was received with a not very cheerful politeness, but his manner, as he stepped upon our deck, was courteous and kind. I could see that my husband was not to be won with a graceful bow, and my husband invited him to enter our cabin, which the light was extinguished, and where fresher refreshments were brought out in plenty, and the stranger told us of the outbreak of war in the West Indies, and also of other events which were news to us at that time.

"'We are prisoners? Was this our captor, quietly conversing with us, and courteously drinking to our success? I knew that we were prisoners of war, but I felt that we were safe from insult, and that, by and by, when my eyes were turned away, and I thought I saw a strange smile upon his face.

"My husband opened a locker, and taking out the ship's papers, laid them on the table with a sigh. He knew that he would show it, and said with an air of assumed cheerfulness—

"'It is the fortune of war. My ship is your prize, captain, and since I am surrendered to, I am glad it is to a gentleman. Where do you propose to send us?'

"The stranger moved into the light, brushed back the curls of his dark hair, and turning to my husband, said:

"'Is it possible, Captain Walter, that you do not know me? Have you forgotten the wars whose life you saved, and who owes you so much?'

"My husband looked earnestly at him a moment, then grasped his hand with both his own.

"'Hardy! Frank Hardy! is it really you?'

"'It is my self, my old friend,' said he, 'it is really me, with a better memory than you have, who saved my life at the risk of your own. And this is your wife? I congratulate you—I congratulate you both with all my heart. Madam, he took me off the wreck when every one else was overboard. Thank God! I can show that I am not ungrateful. I shall appoint you prize-master, and you shall be your ship, please God, in safety to your haven.'

"But can you do this safely, Frank?' asked my captain.

"'Safely!' His lip curled. 'I would like to see the danger I would not confront for you, old friend. But I will tell you what I will do—I will be a different matter, but a privateer has some discretion. My pretty brig is not to be lost in a calm. The wind is an ugly business, but you know me of old—we are seamies in war, in peace friends,' all but you, and you will keep your friend's word, I am sure.'

"And how will your crew stand the loss of their share of prize-money if we are retaken?'

"They are pretty likely to stand what I require them to,' said the Yankee, proudly. 'I am sure that I am right for them. Captain, men are not very scarce articles. Here, give me the papers! Have you your own?'

"My father,' said I.

"All right, Madam,' said he, bowing. 'I wish to make you as well pleased as I can.'

"If you wish to do me a favor,' said I, 'make your prize-master my husband.'

"He smiled, as he looked from one to the other, and seemed to understand the state of the case in an instant.

"You are quite right, Madam,' said he; 'it shall be as you desire.'

"Then he indorsed the ship's manifest with the fact of her capture, and he made over ship and cargo to my husband as prize. It was a gala vessel, of course, but it had its weight with my father.

"Our captor, with the exception of a few men, we could get him to accept. His boat's crew looked at them wonderingly as they were passed over the side to these, and even still more wonderingly at the manner in which their captain took his leave of us.

"In a week more we were safe in an English harbor and on English ground. We had eaten two or three years, and many prizes were taken on both sides, and some hard battles fought by land and sea, but I never heard that any ship ever escaped as we did."

ON THE UPPER POTOMAC.

MR. DAVIS sends us the Hagerstown pictures given below. One of these represents the Confederate troops helping themselves to flour at Mr. Hager's mills. Mr. Hager advised them to be quick and eat it, or it might not benefit them much. The event proved his wisdom, for our cavalry recaptured a part of the wagon train containing this identical flour.

The dépôt at Hagerstown is a scene of wild activity. Immense stores of all kinds are pouring in for the sustenance of the army; every available foot of space is covered with barrels, bales, and boxes.

Another picture by Mr. Davis, which we reproduce on page 662, introduces us to WILLIAMSPORT, on the Upper Potomac. Some of our troops are represented as fording the river, which, at the time Mr. Davis made his sketch, was barely knee-deep.

CHAPTER XIII.

The morning of her husband's return to North Shingles was a morning memorable forever in the domestic calendar of Mrs. Wragge. She dated from that occasion the first announcement which reached her of Magdalen's marriage.

It had been Mrs. Wragge's earthly lot to pass her life in a state of perpetual surprise. Never yet, however, had she wandered in such a maze of astonishment as the maze in which she lost herself when the captain coolly told her the truth. She had been sharp enough to suspect Mr. Noel Vanstone of coming to the house in the character of a sweet-heart on approval; and she had dimly interpreted certain expressions of impatience which had fallen from Magdalen's lips as boding ill for the success of his suit—but her utmost penetration had never reached as far as a suspicion of the impending marriage. She rose from one climax of amazement to another as her husband proceeded with his disclosure. A wedding in the family at a day's notice! and that wedding Magdalen's! and not a single new dress ordered for any body, the bride included! and the Oriental Cashmere Robe totally unavailable, on the occasion of all others when she might have worn it to the greatest advantage! Mrs. Wragge dropped crookedly into a chair, and beat her disorderly hands on her unsymmetrical knees, in utter forgetfulness of the captain's presence and the captain's terrible eye. It would not have surprised her to hear next that the world had come to an end, and that the only mortal whom Destiny had overlooked in winding up the affairs of this earthly planet was herself!

Leaving his wife to recover her composure by her own unaided efforts, Captain Wragge withdrew to wait for Magdalen's appearance in the lower regions of the house. It was close on one o'clock before the sound of footsteps in the room above warned him that she was awake and stirring. He called at once for the maid (whose name he had ascertained to be Louisa), and sent her up stairs to her mistress for the second time.

Magdalen was standing by her dressing-table when a faint tap at the door suddenly roused her. The tap was followed by the sound of a meek voice, which announced itself as the voice of "her maid," and inquired if Miss Bygrave needed any assistance that morning.

"Not at present," said Magdalen, as soon as she recovered the surprise of finding herself unexpectedly provided with an attendant. "I will ring when I want you."

After dismissing the woman with that answer, she accidentally looked from the door to the window. Any speculations on the subject of the new servant in which she might otherwise have engaged were instantly suspended by the sight of the bottle of laudanum, still standing on the ledge of the window, where she had left it at sunrise. She took it once more in her hand, with a strange confusion of feeling—with a vague doubt even yet, whether the sight of it reminded her of a terrible reality or a terrible dream. Her first impulse was to rid herself of it on the spot. She raised the bottle to throw the contents out of the window—and paused, in sudden distrust of the impulse that had come to her. "I have accepted my new life," she thought. "How do I know what that life may have in store for me?" She turned from the window and went back to the table. "I may be forced to drink it yet," she said, and put the laudanum into her dressing-case.

Her mind was not at ease when she had done this: there seemed to be some indefinable ingratitude in the act. Still she made no attempt to remove the bottle from its hiding-place. She hurried on her toilet; she hastened the time when she could ring for the maid, and forget herself and her waking thoughts in a new subject. After touching the bell she took from the table her letter to Norah and her letter to the captain; put them both into her dressing-case with the laudanum, and locked it securely with the key which she kept attached to her watch-chain.

Magdalen's first impression of her attendant was not an agreeable one. She could not investigate the girl with the experienced eye of the landlady at the London hotel, who had characterized the stranger as a young person conversant with misfortune; and who had shown plainly, by her look and manner, of what nature she suspected that misfortune to be. But, with this drawback, Magdalen was perfectly competent to detect the tokens of sickness and sorrow lurking under the surface of the new maid's activity and politeness. She suspected the girl was ill-tempered; she disliked her name; and she was indisposed to welcome any servant who had been engaged by Mr. Noel Vanstone. But after the first few minutes "Louisa" grew on her liking. She answered all the questions put to her with perfect directness; she appeared to understand her duties thoroughly; and she never spoke until she was spoken to first. After making all the inquiries that occurred to her at the time, and after determining to give the maid a fair trial, Magdalen rose to leave the room. The very air in it was still heavy to her with the oppression of the past night.

"Have you any thing more to say to me?" she asked, turning to the servant, with her hand on the door.

"I beg your pardon, Miss," said Louisa, very respectfully and very quietly. "I think my master told me that the marriage was to be to-morrow?"

Magdalen repressed the shudder that stole over her at that reference to the marriage on the lips of a stranger, and answered in the affirmative.

"It's a very short time, Miss, to prepare in. If you would be so kind as to give me my orders about the packing before you go down stairs—?"

"There are no such preparations to make as you suppose," said Magdalen, hastily. "The few things I have here can be all packed at once, if you like. I shall wear the same dress to-morrow which I have on to-day. Leave out the straw bonnet and the light shawl, and put every thing else into my boxes. I have no new dresses to pack—I have nothing ordered for the occasion, of any sort." She tried to add some commonplace phrases of explanation, accounting as probably as might be for the absence of the usual wedding outfit and wedding-dress. But no further reference to the marriage would pass her lips, and without another word she abruptly left the room.

The meek and melancholy Louisa stood lost in astonishment. "Something wrong here," she thought. "I'm half afraid of my new place already." She sighed resignedly, shook her head, and went to the wardrobe. She first examined the drawers underneath; took out the various articles of linen laid inside, and placed them on chairs. Opening the upper part of the wardrobe next, she ranged the dresses in it side by side on the bed. Her last proceeding was to push the empty boxes into the middle of the room, and to compare the space at her disposal with the articles of dress which she had to pack. She completed her preliminary calculations with the ready self-reliance of a woman who thoroughly understood her business, and began the packing forthwith. Just as she had placed the first article of linen in the smaller box the door of the room opened, and the house-servant, eager for gossip, came in.

"What do you want?" asked Louisa, quietly.

"Did you ever hear of any thing like this!" said the house-servant, entering on her subject immediately.

"Like what?"

"Like this marriage, to be sure! You're London bred, they tell me. Did you ever hear of a young lady being married without a single new thing to her back? No wedding-veil, and no wedding-breakfast, and no wedding-favors for the servants! It's flying in the face of Providence—that's what I say. I'm only a poor servant, I know. But it's wicked—downright wicked—and I don't care who hears me!"

Louisa went on with the packing.

"Look at her dresses!" persisted the house-servant, waving her hand indignantly at the bed. "I'm only a poor girl, but I wouldn't marry the best man alive without a new gown to my back. Look here! look at this dowdy brown thing here. Alpaca! You're not going to pack this Alpaca thing, are you? Why it's hardly fit for a servant! I don't know that I'd take a gift of it if it was offered me. It would do for me if I took it up in the skirt and let it out in the waist; and it wouldn't look so bad with a bit of bright trimming, would it?"

"Let that dress alone, if you please," said Louisa, as quietly as ever.

"What did you say?" inquired the other, doubting whether her ears had not deceived her.

"I said, let that dress alone. It belongs to my mistress; and I have my mistress's orders to pack up every thing in the room. You are not helping me by coming here—you are very much in my way."

"Well!" said the house-servant, "you may be London bred, as they say. But if these are your London manners, give me Suffolk!" She opened the door, with an angry snatch at the handle, shut it violently, opened it again, and looked in. "Give me Suffolk!" said the house-servant, with a parting nod of her head to point the edge of her sarcasm.

Louisa proceeded impenetrably with her packing up.

Having neatly disposed of the linen in the smaller box, she turned her attention to the dresses next. After passing them carefully in review, to ascertain which was the least valuable of the collection, and to place that one in the bottom of the trunk for the rest to lie on, she made her choice with very little difficulty. The first gown which she put into the box was the brown Alpaca dress.

Meanwhile Magdalen had joined the captain down stairs. Although he could not fail to notice the languor in her face, and the listlessness of all her movements, he was relieved to find that she met him with perfect composure. She was even self-possessed enough to ask him for news of his journey, with no other signs of agitation than a passing change of color and a little trembling of the lips.

"So much for the past," said Captain Wragge, when his narrative of the expedition to London by way of St. Crux had come to an end. "Now for the present. The bridegroom—"

"If it makes no difference," she interposed, "call him Mr. Noel Vanstone."

"With all my heart. Mr. Noel Vanstone is coming here this afternoon to dine and spend the evening. He will be tiresome in the last degree; but, like all tiresome people, he is not to be got rid of on any terms. Before he comes I have a last word or two of caution for your private ear. By this time to-morrow we shall have parted, without any certain knowledge on either side of our ever meeting again. I am anxious to serve your interests faithfully to the last; I am anxious you should feel that I have done all I could for your future security when we say good-by."

Magdalen looked at him in surprise. He spoke in altered tones. He was agitated; he was strangely in earnest. Something in his look and manner took her memory back to the first night at Aldborough, when she had opened her mind to him in the darkening solitude—when they two had sat together alone on the slope of the martello tower.

"I have no reason to think otherwise than kindly of you," she said.

Captain Wragge suddenly left his chair, and took a turn backward and forward in the room. Magdalen's last words seemed to have produced some extraordinary disturbance in him.

"Damn it!" he broke out; "I can't let you say that. You have reason to think ill of me. I have cheated you. You never got your fair share of profit from the Entertainment, from first to last. There! now the murder's out!"

Magdalen smiled, and signed to him to come back to his chair.

"I know you cheated me," she said, quietly. "You were in the exercise of your profession, Captain Wragge. I expected it when I joined you. I made no complaint at the time, and I make none now. If the money you took is any recompense for all the trouble I have given you, you are heartily welcome to it."

"Will you shake hands on that?" asked the captain, with an awkwardness and hesitation strongly at variance with his customary ease of manner.

Magdalen gave him her hand. He wrung it hard. "You are a strange girl," he said, trying to speak lightly. "You have laid a hold on me that I don't quite understand. I'm half uncomfortable at taking the money from you now, and yet you don't want it, do you?" He hesitated. "I almost wish," he said, "I had never met you on the walls of York."

"It is too late to wish that, Captain Wragge. Say no more—you only distress me; say no more. We have other subjects to talk about. What were those words of caution which you had for my private ear?"

The captain took another turn in the room, and struggled back again into his everyday character. He produced from his pocket-book Mrs. Lecount's letter to her master, and handed it to Magdalen.

"There is the letter that might have ruined us if it had ever reached its address," he said. "Read it carefully. I have a question to ask you when you have done."

Magdalen read the letter. "What is this proof," she inquired, "which Mrs. Lecount relies on so confidently?"

"The very question I was going to ask you," said Captain Wragge. "Consult your memory of what happened when you tried that experiment in Vauxhall Walk. Did Mrs. Lecount get no other chance against you than the chances you have told me of already?"

"She discovered that my face was disguised, and she heard me speak in my own voice."

"And nothing more?"

"Nothing more."

"Very good. Then my interpretation of the letter is clearly the right one. The proof Mrs. Lecount relies on is my wife's infernal ghost story—which is, in plain English, the story of Miss Bygrave having been seen in Miss Vanstone's disguise, the witness being the very person who is afterward presented at Aldborough in the character of Miss Bygrave's aunt. An excellent chance for Mrs. Lecount, if she can only lay her hand at the right time on Mrs. Wragge, and no chance at all if she can't. Make your mind easy on that point. Mrs. Lecount and my wife have seen the last of each other. In the mean time, don't neglect the warning I give you in giving you this letter. Tear it up for fear of accidents, but don't forget it."

"Trust me to remember it," replied Magdalen, destroying the letter while she spoke. "Have you any thing more to tell me?"

"I have some information to give you," said Captain Wragge, "which may be useful, because it relates to your future security. Mind, I want to know nothing about your proceedings when to-morrow is over—we settled that when we first discussed this matter. I ask no questions, and I make no guesses. All I want to do now is to warn you of your legal position after your marriage, and to leave you to make what use you please of your knowledge at your own sole discretion. I took a lawyer's opinion on the point when I was in London, thinking it might be useful to you."

"It is sure to be useful. What did the lawyer say?"

"To put it plainly, this is what he said: If Mr. Noel Vanstone ever discovers that you have knowingly married him under a false name, he can apply to the Ecclesiastical Court to have his marriage declared null and void. The issue of the application would rest with the Judges. But if he could prove that he had been intentionally deceived, the legal opinion is that his case would be a strong one."

"Suppose I chose to apply on my side?" said Magdalen, eagerly. "What then?"

"You might make the application," replied the captain. "But remember one thing—you would come into Court with the acknowledgment of your own deception. I leave you to imagine what the Judges would think of that."

"Did the lawyer tell you any thing else?"

"One thing besides," said Captain Wragge. "Whatever the law might do with the marriage in the lifetime of both the parties to it, on the death of either one of them no application made by the survivor would avail; and, as to the case of that survivor, the marriage would remain valid. You understand? If he dies, or if you die—and if no application has been made to the Court—he the survivor, or you the survivor, would have no power of disputing the marriage. But in the lifetime of both of you, if he claimed to have the marriage dissolved, the chances are all in favor of his carrying his point."

He looked at Magdalen with a furtive curiosity as he said those words. She turned her head aside, absently tying her watch-chain into a loop and untying it again, evidently thinking with the closest attention over what he had last said to her. Captain Wragge walked uneasily to the window and looked out. The first object that caught his eye was Mr. Noel Vanstone approaching from Sea View. He returned instantly to his former place in the room, and addressed himself to Magdalen once more.

"Here is Mr. Noel Vanstone," he said. "One last caution before he comes in. Be on your guard with him about your age. He put the question to me before he got the License. I took the shortest way out of the difficulty, and told him you were twenty-one, and he made the declaration accordingly. Never mind about me; after to-morrow I am invisible. But in your own interests don't forget, if the subject ever turns up, that you are of age. There is nothing more. You are provided with every necessary warning that I can give you. Whatever happens in the future, remember I have done my best."

He hurried to the door without waiting for an answer, and went out into the garden to receive his guest.

Mr. Noel Vanstone made his appearance at the gate, solemnly carrying his bridal offering to North Shingles with both hands. The object in question was an ancient casket (one of his father's bargains); inside the casket reposed an old-fashioned carbuncle brooch set in silver (another of his father's bargains)—bridal presents both, possessing the inestimable merit of leaving his money undisturbed in his pocket. He shook his head portentously when the captain inquired after his health and spirits. He had passed a wakeful night; ungovernable apprehensions of Lecount's sudden reappearance had beset him as soon as he found himself alone at Sea View. Sea View was redolent of Lecount: Sea View (though built on piles, and the strongest house in England) was henceforth odious to him. He had felt this all night; he had also felt his responsibilities. There was the lady's-maid, to begin with. Now he had hired her he began to think she wouldn't do. She might fall sick on his hands; she might have deceived him by a false character; she and the landlady of the hotel might have been in league together. Horrible! Really horrible to think of! Then there was the other responsibility—perhaps the heaviest of the two—the responsibility of deciding where he was to go and spend his honey-moon to-morrow. He would have preferred one of his father's empty houses. But except at Vauxhall Walk (which he supposed would be objected to) and at Aldborough (which was, of course, out of the question), all the houses were let. He would put himself in Mr. Bygrave's hands. Where had Mr. Bygrave spent his own honey-moon. Given the British Islands to choose from, where would Mr. Bygrave pitch his tent, on a careful review of all the circumstances?

At this point the bridegroom's questions suddenly came to an end, and the bridegroom's face exhibited an expression of ungovernable astonishment. His judicious friend, whose advice had been at his disposal in every other emergency, suddenly turned round on him, in the emergency of the honey-moon, and flatly declined discussing the subject.

"No!" said the captain, as Mr. Noel Vanstone opened his lips to plead for a hearing, "you must really excuse me. My point of view in this matter is, as usual, a peculiar one. For some time past I have been living in an atmosphere of deception to suit your convenience. That atmosphere, my good Sir, is getting close—my Moral Being requires ventilation. Settle the choice of a locality with my niece, and leave me, at my particular request, in total ignorance on the subject. Mrs. Lecount is certain to come here on her return from Zurich, and is certain to ask me where you are gone. You may think it strange, Mr. Vanstone; but when I say I don't know, I wish to enjoy the unaccustomed luxury of feeling for once in a way that I am telling the truth!"

With those words he opened the sitting-room door, introduced Mr. Noel Vanstone to Magdalen's presence, bowed himself out of the room again, and set forth alone to while away the rest of the afternoon by taking a walk. His face showed plain tokens of anxiety, and his particolored eyes looked hither and thither distrustfully as he sauntered along the shore. "The time hangs heavy on our hands," thought the captain. "I wish to-morrow was come and gone."

The day passed and nothing happened; the evening and the night followed placidly and uneventfully. Monday came—a cloudless, lovely day; Monday confirmed the captain's assertion that the marriage was a certainty. Toward ten o'clock the clerk, ascending the church steps, quoted the old proverb to the pew-opener, meeting him under the porch: "Happy the bride on whom the sun shines!"

In a quarter of an hour more the wedding-party was in the vestry, and the clergyman led the way to the altar. Carefully as the secret of the marriage had been kept, the opening of the church in the morning had been enough to betray it. A small congregation, almost entirely composed of women, was scattered here and there among the pews. Kirke's sister and her children were staying with a friend at Aldborough, and Kirke's sister was one of the congregation.

As the wedding-party entered the church the haunting terror of Mrs. Lecount spread from Noel Vanstone to the captain. For the first few minutes the eyes of both of them looked among the women in the pews with the same searching scrutiny, and looked away again with the same sense of relief. The clergyman noticed that look, and investigated the License more closely than usual. The clerk began to doubt privately whether the old proverb about the bride was a proverb to be always depended on. The female members of the congregation murmured among themselves at the inexcusable disregard of appearances implied in the bride's dress. Kirke's sister whispered venomously in her friend's ear, "Thank God for to-day, for Robert's sake!" Mrs. Wragge cried silently with the dread of some threatening calamity, she knew not what. The one person present who remained outwardly undisturbed was Magdalen herself. She stood with tearless resignation in her place before the altar—stood, as if all the sources of human emotion were frozen up within her. What she suffered that morning she suffered in the secrecy which no mortal insight can divine.

The clergyman opened the Book.

* * * * * * * *

It was done. The awful words which speak from earth to Heaven were pronounced. The children of the two dead brothers—inheritors of the implacable enmity which had parted their parents—were Man and Wife.

From that moment events hurried with a headlong rapidity to the parting scene. They were back at the house, while the words of the Marriage Service seemed still ringing in their ears. Before they had been five minutes indoors the carriage drew up at the garden-gate. In a minute more the opportunity came for which Magdalen and the captain had been on the watch—the opportunity of speaking together in private for the last time. She still preserved her icy resignation—she seemed beyond all reach now of the fear that had once mastered her, of the remorse that had once tortured her to the soul. With a firm hand she gave him the promised money. With a firm face she looked her last at him. "I'm not to blame," he whispered, eagerly; "I have only done what you asked me." She bowed her head—she bent it toward him kindly, and let him touch her forehead with his lips. "Take care!" he said. "My last words are, for God's sake take care when I'm gone!" She turned from him with a smile, and spoke her farewell words to his wife. Mrs. Wragge tried hard to face her loss bravely—the loss of the friend whose presence had fallen like light from Heaven over the dim pathway of her life. "You have been very good to me, my dear; I thank you kindly, I thank you with all my heart." She could say no more; she clung to Magdalen in a passion of tears, as her mother might have clung to her if her mother had lived to see that horrible day. "I'm frightened for you!" cried the poor creature, in a wild, wailing voice. "Oh, my darling, I'm frightened for you!" Magdalen desperately drew herself free, kissed her, and hurried out to the door. The expression of that artless gratitude, the cry of that guileless love, shook her as nothing else had shaken her that day. It was a refuge to get to the carriage—a refuge, though the man she had married stood there waiting for her at the door.

Mrs. Wragge tried to follow her into the garden. But the captain had seen Magdalen's face as she ran out, and he steadily held his wife back in the passage. From that distance the last farewells were exchanged. As long as the carriage was in sight Magdalen's face looked back at them; she waved her handkerchief as she turned the corner. In a moment more the last thread which bound her to them was broken; the familiar companionship of many months was a thing of the past already.

Captain Wragge closed the house-door on the idlers who were looking in from the parade. He led his wife back into the sitting-room and spoke to her with a forbearance which she had never yet experienced from him.

"She has gone her way," he said, "and in another hour we shall have gone ours. Cry your cry out; I don't deny she's worth crying for."

Even then—even when the dread of Magdalen's future was at its darkest in his mind—the ruling habit of the man's life clung to him. Mechanically he unlocked his dispatch-box. Mechanically he opened his Book of Accounts, and made the closing entry—the entry of his last transaction with Magdalen—in black and white. "By Rec[d] from Miss Vanstone," wrote the captain, with a gloomy brow, "Two hundred pounds."

"You won't be angry with me?" said Mrs. Wragge, looking timidly at her husband through her tears. "I want a word of comfort, captain. Oh, do tell me, when shall I see her again?"

The captain closed the book and answered in one inexorable word:

"Never!"

Between eleven and twelve o'clock that night Mrs. Lecount drove into Zurich.

Her brother's house, when she stopped before it, was shut up. With some difficulty and delay the servant was aroused. She held up her hands in speechless amazement when she opened the door and saw who her visitor was.

"Is my brother alive?" asked Mrs. Lecount, entering the house.

"Alive!" echoed the servant. "He has gone holiday-making into the country to finish his recovery in the fine fresh air."

The housekeeper staggered back against the wall of the passage. The coachman and the servant put her into a chair. Her face was livid, and her teeth chattered in her head.

"Send for my brother's doctor," she said, as soon as she could speak.

The doctor came in. She handed him a letter before he could say a word.

"Did you write that letter?"

He looked it over rapidly, and answered her without hesitation,

"Certainly not!"

"It is your handwriting."

"It is a forgery of my handwriting."

She rose from the chair with a new strength in her.

"When does the return mail start for Paris?" she asked.

"In half an hour."

"Send instantly and take me a place in it?"

The servant hesitated; the doctor protested. She turned a deaf ear to them both.

"Send!" she reiterated, "or I will go myself."

They obeyed. The servant went to take the place: the doctor remained and held a conversation with Mrs. Lecount. When the half hour had passed he helped her into her place in the mail, and charged the conductor privately to take care of his passenger.

"She has traveled from England without stopping," said the doctor; "and she is traveling back again without rest. Be careful of her, or she will break down under the double journey."

The mail started. Before the first hour of the new day was at an end Mrs. Lecount was on her way back to England.

THE END OF THE FOURTH SCENE.

THE MURDER OF GEN. NELSON.

On page 669 we publish an illustration of the ASSASSINATION OF GENERAL NELSON BY GENERAL J. C. DAVIS, which took place ten days since at Louisville. Our picture is from a sketch by our artist, Mr. Mosler, who visited the spot immediately after the affair. The Cincinnati Inquirer gives the following particulars:

When the alarm was raised in Louisville that the enemy were marching on that city, General Davis, who could not reach his command under General Buell, then at Bowling Green, went to General Nelson and tendered his services. General Nelson gave him the command of the city militia so soon as they were organized. General Davis opened an office and went to work in assisting the organization. On Wednesday last General Davis called upon General Nelson in his room at the Galt House, in Louisville, when the following took place:

GEN. DAVIS. "I have the brigade, General, you assigned me ready for service, and have called to inquire if I can obtain arms for them."

GEN. NELSON. "How many men have you?"

DAVIS. "About twenty-five hundred men, General."

NELSON (roughly and angrily). "About twenty-five hundred! About twenty-five hundred! By G—d! you a regular officer, and come here to me and report about the number of men in your command? G—d d—n you, don't you know, Sir, you should furnish me the exact number?"

DAVIS. "General, I didn't expect to get the guns now, and only wanted to learn if I could get them, and where; and, having learned the exact number needed, would then draw them."

NELSON (pacing the room in a rage). "About twenty-five hundred! By G—d I suspend you from your command, and order you to report to General Wright; and I've a d—d mind to put you under arrest. Leave my room, Sir!"

DAVIS. "I will not leave, General, until you give me an order."

NELSON. "The h—l you won't! By G—d I'll put you under arrest, and send you out of the city under a provost guard! Leave my room, Sir!"

General Davis left the room, and, in order to avoid an arrest, crossed over the river to Jeffersonville, where he remained until the next day, when he was joined by General Burbridge, who had also been relieved by Nelson for a trivial cause. General Davis came to Cincinnati with General Burbridge, and reported to General Wright, who ordered General Davis to return to Louisville and report to General Buell, and General Burbridge to remain in Cincinnati. General Davis returned on Friday evening and reported to General Buell. Nothing further occurred until yesterday morning, when General Davis, seeing General Nelson in the main hall of the Galt House, fronting the office, went up to Governor Morton and requested him to step up with him to General Nelson and witness the conversation that might pass between Nelson and him. The Governor consented, and the two walked up to General Nelson, when the following took place:

GEN. DAVIS. "Sir, you seemed to take advantage of your authority the other day."

GEN. NELSON (sneeringly, and placing his hand to his ear). "Speak louder, I don't hear very well."

DAVIS (in a louder tone). "You seemed to take advantage of your authority the other day."

NELSON (indignantly). "I don't know that I did, Sir."

DAVIS. "You threatened to arrest and send me out of the State under a provost guard."

NELSON (striking Davis with the back of his hand twice in the face). "There, d—n you, take that!"

DAVIS (retreating). "This is not the last of it; you will hear from me again."

General Nelson then turned to Governor Morton, and said: "By G—d, did you come here also to insult me?"

GOV. MORTON. "No, Sir; but I was requested to be present and listen to the conversation between you and General Davis."

GEN. NELSON (violently to the by-standers). "Did you hear the d—d rascal insult me?" and then walked into the ladies' parlor.

In three minutes General Davis returned, with a pistol he had borrowed of Captain Gibson, of Louisville, and walking toward the door that Nelson had passed through, he saw Nelson walking out of the parlor into the hall separating the main hall from the parlor. The two were face to face, and about ten yards apart, when General Davis drew his pistol and fired, the ball entering Nelson's heart, or in the immediate vicinity.

General Nelson threw up both hands and caught a gentleman near by around the neck, and exclaimed, "I am shot!" He then walked up the flight of stairs toward General Buell's room, but sank at the top of the stairs, and was unable to proceed further. He was then conveyed to his room, and when laid on his bed requested that the Rev. Mr. Talbott, an Episcopal clergyman stopping in the house, might be sent to him at once. The reverend gentleman arrived in about five minutes.

Mr. Talbott found General Nelson extremely anxious as to his future welfare, and deeply penitent about the many sins he had committed. He knew that he must die immediately, and requested the ordinance of baptism might be administered, which was done. The General then whispered, "It's all over," and died in fifteen minutes after he was conveyed to his room. His death was easy, the passing away of his spirit as though the General had fallen into a quiet sleep.

Highly Important
TO THE SOLDIERS OF THE UNION ARMY!
"An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure."
SOLDIERS, you will soon be in active service, on a Southern soil, and will be obliged to perform long and fatiguing marches, to sleep on the ground, and to submit to frequent changes of water, air, and climate, to the being exposed to the inclemency of the weather. A history of the diseases incident to camp life originate in part from the first symptoms of which are derangement and irregularity of the bowels, they being the weakest and most susceptible part of the human system, first feel the effects of the exposures which all soldiers have to submit to.
The best weapon of defense you can have against all such diseases is
DR. D. EVANS'
Abdominal Supporter and Medical Safeguard Combined.
Thousands of lives were saved in the French Army during the Crimean War by the use of the "Medicated Safeguard." The superior condition of the French soldier in comparison with the English was attributed to the extensive use of this article.
THE SURGEON GENERAL, also the principal Physicians in the Union Army, have recommended their use by the Union soldiers.
Messrs. G. G. Evans & Co. have secured the right to sell the "SAFEGUARD" in the United States, and are now having them manufactured under the superintendence of an able Physician, and are making arrangements to place them within reach of every Union soldier. An Agency has been established in Philadelphia and Boston, where soldiers in this vicinity about to depart for the war can be supplied.
No more appropriate present can be made to a Soldier than a Medicated Safeguard. Every man should have one.
The attention of Soldiers and the friends of soldiers is respectfully solicited.
Thousands of lives may be saved by their timely use.
PRICE ACCORDING TO SIZE.
No. 1, 50 cts.; No. 2, $1 00; No. 3, $1 50.
Sent by mail or express to any address on the receipt of the price, money or currency, by mail. Postage on No. 1, 10 cts.; No. 2, 25 cts.; No. 3, 29 cts.

GARIBALDI, WOUNDED AND A PRISONER.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

AT SOUTH MOUNTAIN.

Like plates of brassy armor
The yellow plowed lands lay
Upon the valley's bosom
For leagues and leagues away.
Along them shines and shimmers
The lazy moving stream,
As o'er a child's soft bosom
The idle ribbons gleam.

The mountain's velvet helmet
Nods darkly on her crest,
As though some untold passion
Were trembling in her breast.
The green leaves chant together
A weird and mystic strain,
And the feathery mantle mingle
Their notes in the wild refrain.

The shadows sweep o'er the valley
Like an evanescent blot,
That seems like a holy footing
Imprinted with an impress thought.
O'er listening hills and dells.
The soldiers march in the cadence
Borne out on the distant air,
And it comes to their weary spirits
Like the thought of an angel's prayer.

But vain the holy summon—
The prayer remains unsaid,
The singer's lips are silent,
The sermon lies unread;
While long and dusty columns
Of sun-burned troops file by,
Nerved by the rigid purpose
To win the day—or die!

Along the paths of the mountain
Moves up the dark-blue line,
The gun-wheels grind over the boulders,
The burnished bayonets shine.
Way up in the leafy covert
The curling smoke betrays
Where the foe lurks down the gauntlet,
And the answering cannons blaze.

The crack of the Minié rifle,
The shriek of the crushing shell,
The ring of the flashing sabre,
With the din of the conflict tell.
They tell of the dear lives lying,
War's food in Nature's lap,
Ere the Starry Flag in triumph
Waves through its Mountain Gap.

Night drops her pitying mantle
To hide the bloody scene—
Next morn a thousand dead men
Mark where the foe had been.
And where the fight was hottest
Two mangled corpses lay,
One clad in bright blue jacket,
And one in homespun gray.

Their hands are clasped together,
Their heads upon one shoe
Each fought with a dauntless purpose,
And fell 'neath each other's blow!
They fell, and the crimson mingled,
And before the paling eye
Rack rolled the storm of the conflict
To the peaceful days gone by.

Each thought of the mystic token—
The talismanic sign;
Each recognized it. Brother!
Two firm right hands entwine!
The fire of the noble order
Touched not their hearts in vain.
All hate tades out, uniting
Two hearts with the triple chain!

CAMP OF EIGHTH MASSACHUSETTS BATTERY,
ANTIETAM CREEK, October, 1862.

GARIBALDI.

We reproduce on the preceding page a picture by M. Benard, which represents GARIBALDI WOUNDED AND A PRISONER. Every one remembers that Garibaldi, who was at the head of a small band of followers, was attacked at Aspromonte by the Neapolitan forces and made prisoner. He was conveyed to Spezia by his captors, and placed in the hands of surgeons for his wounds, which are severe. It is not yet known what disposition will be made of him. When he arrived at Spezia one of our friends addressed him a letter inquiring whether he would accept a command in our army in case it should be tendered him. He immediately replied that, being wounded and a prisoner, he could not yet dispose of his future movements; but that if he regained his strength and his liberty he would at once offer his sword to the United States, which was fighting its freedom throughout the world.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1862.

WHY WADSWORTH WILL BE DEFEATED.

HORATIO SEYMOUR, the Democratic candidate for Governor of this State, has arrayed himself fairly and squarely in opposition to the Government in its protection of freedom, and claims the votes of the people of this State in virtue of that opposition. Citizens who now support him simply by their suffrages that they are opposed to the United States Government, on the most vital question of its policy, at the most imminent crisis in the history of the nation. To use the words of Mr. John Van Buren, at the meeting on 13th, supporters of Horatio Seymour consider "the Government of the United States the most contemptible failure in the shape of a Government in the world;" and pronounce that, in their judgment, "the Southern people ought not to live under an abolition sway." In other words, men who vote for Seymour mean by that vote that they hate and despise their own Government, the Government of Abraham Lincoln; that they are opposed, in the crisis of a desperate war, to the most vital measures of policy adopted by that Government; and that they find much more justification for the rebellion of the Southern people than for the North's resolute and constitutional exercise and defense of its political rights. The issue is fairly and squarely made.

Men who are in favor of supporting the Government honestly and manfully: of maintaining the policies system handed down to us by our fathers, and of preserving intact in its integrity the Union which a band of desperadoes at the South seeks to destroy, will give no support or sympathy to their views by voting for WADSWORTH.

Men who are opposed to the Government of the United States; who can find excuses for the rebels, who think the chosen rulers of the country; who have a hundred schemes for destroying and remodeling, but not one for simply maintaining the policy of our Union; these whose secret sympathies are at this dreadful hour with the enemies of their country and the perjured traitors at Richmond: these men will vote for SEYMOUR.

It has been suggested that, in view of the unequivocal declaration of the election of Mr. Seymour, Mr. Seymour should resign, and leave the course clear to his opponent. The Democratic leaders on the contrary, think the very glad they do. We should like to see precisely how many people in this State agree with Mr. Alex. Van Buren. Each supporter of "the Southern people ought not to live under an abolition sway." We want to ascertain how many citizens of the State of New York deem this a fit moment for dividing the North, opposing the Government, and holding out to the rebels hopes of support in their rebellion. We want to separate the sheep from the goats, and to see where we stand. By no means let Mr. Seymour resign. By remaining he will render the country a signal service.

The eyes of the rebel leaders at Richmond are fixed upon the contest in this State. They attach even more intensity than upon the contest in Kentucky or on the banks of the Potomac. They know that the disheartening defeats and successes which accident has enabled them to achieve this summer, the result of the contest is so certain as fate, if it is left simply to be decided by to the sword. It may take more time than the sanguine people of the North once hoped. But it is none the less certain, and the leaders know it. Their only hope now is that the Government of the United States may be paralyzed by divisions at home. A party can be elected to power in the great State of New York whose leaders unanimously avow greater aversion for the United States Government than for the armed rebels who wholly or partially justify the rebellion, and denounce the Government of the United States as an intolerable despotism: that party of Jeff Davis and his colleagues will be revived, their despising spirits cheered, their armies encouraged to press the flagging contest. Such a party as the election of Seymour and his crew would signify to the foreign world that the temper of the North was undergoing a change, and that the rebels' prediction—that the would tire of the enterprise of subduing the South—was becoming verified. In any thing would justify foreign powers in the would do it. Europe could say to us, "Not yet. The South desire us to interfere, but the greatest and most populous State of the North practically calls upon us likewise, by electing to office a man who is opposed to your Government; opposed to the policy which you are about to initiate, and whose leading supporters justify the rebellion." What could we say in reply?

In what manner the vote cast in this country next January if Seymour should be elected? Whatever Mr. Seymour may say, how could he possibly give a hearty or even any kind of support to a Government which he and his supporters denounce as an "atrocious despotism," "the most contemptible failure in the world," "a band of thieves and robbers?" etc., etc. And how could the war be prosecuted if the chief State of the North refused to support the Government: declined to forward troops, and placed itself in the attitude which Kentucky occupied eighteen months ago. Does Horatio Seymour expect to be able to play the part of Beriah Magoffin in the heart of the loyal North?

THE LOUNGER.

"AND TO PARTY GAVE UP WHAT WAS MEANT FOR MANKIND."

THE speech of Mr. Richard O'Gorman, some ten days ago, will bring a pang to many a breast he did not mean to wound. For some twelve years he has lived in this country, but has been publicly known only as a most polished and charming orator upon occasions which were not political. At last he breaks this public political silence of twelve years by a fiery denunciation of the Government and its policy, and an eloquent lament over the happy days when the freedom of speech, of the press, and of the person was absolutely respected. He eulogizes the "high and progressive civilization" we enjoyed ten years ago; and decries the degradation which, in a time of tremendous civil war, exercises the solemn Constitutional right of suspending the habeas corpus.

Mr. O'Gorman's speech itself refutes its assertions. It is the most brilliant indictment and vile picture of the condition of this city, as it appears to him at this moment, in the very crisis of this terrible national war for its existence, was the permanent condition in peace of the whole region now in open revolt. Under the "high and progressive civilization" of ten years ago the present rebels nullified the Constitution. Now they are trying to destroy it. Does the orator mean that he praises the Constitutional reverence of a time when an innocent free citizen of one State could be hunted forever with the posterity by the law of another?—a time when no State or national authority protected the free discussion of rights under the Constitution?—a time when the Constitution of the United States was openly and shamelessly violated in time of profound peace?

Of course crime does not excuse crime. Violence then would not excuse violation now; but that is the time of constitutional felicity which the orator selects for his praises. During all those years the country was told that there was no danger. Not only was the outrage itself flagrant, but its cause was concealed. The Constitution was violated to sustain slavery. Even at the North the sacred right of speech was threatened by violence; but still this voice was silent. The tragedy of Kansas not only revealed the most wicked and inhuman conspiracy that ever disgraced a people, but showed the imminence of the loss of all constitutional securities. But this voice had not a word of reproach, or complaint, or grief. Exiled from his native land for loving liberty, the orator saw the fundamental safeguard of all liberty in his adopted country scorned and destroyed by the force will of a most cruel despotism; but he saw unmoved. Good men, priests, the bravest of the land, every where looked on in alarm, and feared for the hope of humanity. The Despotism openly threatened to destroy the Constitution which it already nullified: and the voice was silent, and the hand doubtless gave its blessing to the vote. At last the sway of despotism sprang at the nation's throat, to complete its victory and subjugate the Constitution in every State. Then it had already done its work. The nation, desperately struggling, declares that it will take all necessary steps to save, since war has been forced upon it; that it will, in this great stress, suspend temporarily some rights that it may secure the permanent enjoyment of all rights; and then, at last, this voice breaks silence—storms out into passionate utterance, declares that there is no consent the Constitution was shamelessly outraged: are alone fit to save it from destruction! Gentlemen! rights might be lost, but not gone—liberty lost—the laws defied—the Constitution nullified—the basest method of treason and rebellion in a desperate struggle—and the eye was cold and the tongue silent. But from the wild turmoil let some illusive dream of liberty but last for an hour, and the voice is over power, and the orator lends his fervid tongue to the lamentation.

Who can mark length if such a man there be?
Who would not weep if Atticus were he?

A LOOK ABROAD.

THE question of foreign intervention is one that will properly continue to interest the public mind until the end of the war. It is beyond dispute that France wishes to intervene, but can not persuade England. She has the argument now presented before it is successful is a matter of speculation. But the two points of the argument are well understood.

The first is the conviction that, in case of our success, coming from victory flushed and furious with a huge military organization in good working order, we will instantly demand of Europe, which has an explanation of her passive hostility toward us in our intolerance. In other words, that upon the subsidence of our war with England will be inevitable; and that it is wise for her to prevent it, by stopping in and forcing a settlement which will be founded upon reparation.

The second point of the argument for intervention is, that we are both heartily tired of the war, at the North and South, and that we shall secretly hail a suggestion and invitation for ending it. We ask for foreign observers to be in the condition of duellists, who have exchanged a round of shots and are still unwounded and resolute. They, the belligerents, of course, will not listen. Not they. They can each be satisfied only with the heart's-blood of the other. But after all, they are very well content when the spectators insist and actually separate them.

These are views seriously entertained by foreign statesmen, and by foreigners among us, and it is to the influence of such convictions that we must look for the chances of intervention. The foreign horoscope of the inevitable result of the war involves only separation or anarchy. Peace, order, and law can be secured, in the opinion of Europe, only by speedy separation. In the interest of civilization, of society, and of government, therefore, the foreign mind believes intervention to be essential.

It seems impossible to show Europe that the only two possible results of this war are, either the unconditional victory of the rebellion, which is dissolution of the Union, destruction of the Government, and universal anarchy—or else the unconditional victory of the Government, whereby the rebels lay down their arms and submit, and return, accordingly, to the laws, and seek their ends, if they still desire them, according to the Constitution.

There is no middle ground. Separation of the States is National death, and is as much the triumph of the rebellion as if Jeff Davis installed in the White House as President of the Union. The aim of the rebellion is to change the Government by force of arms. That of the Government is its maintain itself intact. But if it concedes any part to the armed demand, it surrenders the whole principle. For when another rebellion demands another concession there is no reason why it should not be made; until at last the very form of the Government would have perished with its spirit.

No one should object that this does not follow, any more than the destruction of the British Government followed the conceded independence of the American colonies, the right to which in relation of Britain to her colonies does not resemble that of the National Government to the United States citizens. If you wish to have the exact parallel, consider what would be the position of the government of Great Britain if, after the most tremendous struggle to maintain its authority over Kent or Yorkshire, conceded the separation and independence of those counties. Would the British Government, in any candid sense, longer exist? Would it retain any respect, or any hope of success, refuse the claim of any other county to retire? Intervention, by the confession of foreigners who frankly discuss it, means separation. That is to say, it is the armed alliance of whatever powers undertake it with the rebels. The object of the alliance is, that they shall fight for the cause of the rebels. That cause is the establishment of a new political power in the world founded on slavery and that power takes its origin in the conviction of its subjects that their only hope of safety was from their old political community, not because of injuries suffered without hope of legal redress, which is the only plea of forcible revolution, but simply because they feared that the normal development of that community would peacefully eliminate slavery.

Nations are governed by their interest; but mechanical and individual interest is never removed from certain moral principles in human nature. If Great Britain thinks her interest will be served by drawing the sword in the cause of rebels a power she will do it. But she will never sheathe it again as the nation she now is.

OVER THE SEA.

THE response of Europe to the President's Proclamation is near at hand, if it be not already audible when these lines are printed. It will be a yell of affected horror and fiery indignation. All nothing will please that unhappy Europe. It is so determined that we shall go to pieces that it is impatient of our relucrance. "Why don't you die! Why, in the naughty name, don't you disappear! Can't you vote. You've been a month, and now you are a ridiculous warning. Just be buried as soon as possible." This is the tone in which Europe communicates with America.

A few weeks since we were languid, in the high European estimation, and ready to give up our arms. Our war was a melodrama. We did not mean to do any thing. We had no earnestness, no purpose, no life. Our Proclamation, therefore, however, really meant something. They were fatal and vigorous and unjust.

Now we shall hear that we are ferocious, bloodthirsty, and barbarous; that the interests of civilization and humanity require the abandonment of a system which denies every right and practices every enormity in the name of human beasts. We shall hear that we confess we could not fairly conquer in honorable warfare, and have therefore appealed to the most horrible of all the means. Forget that we have made forcibly take the place of heroism, and massacre that of honorable battle, and that we have merely supplied with the most stringent reason for the desperate and unconquerable unity of the enemy. We shall hear that we have done dreadful before, and is hopeless now, etc., etc.

Meanwhile, in the midst of the tumult, the Government of the United States has, at last had, but one duty, to suppress this rebellion in the most speedy, swift, and overwhelming manner. It can not use too many means, nor kill it too dead.

NO HANGING MATTER.

MR. CASSIUS M. CLAY was born in a slave State, and early convinced that slavery was wrong, he took manfully to the task of emancipation in Kentucky; and has been universally known as one of the most valiant of the anti-slavery orators. He is a man of indomitable courage, and his quarrelsome career has compelled the admiration of many who differ from his views. But like all ardent and sincere men, whose moral convictions are not tempered with the worldly wisdom, he very frequently puts the cause he adopts in a ludicrous or repulsive light.

When upon his journey to Russia, as our minister, he wrote a letter to the London Times and made a speech at a Paris breakfast, he made our cause a little ridiculous. But when, in his speech at Brooklyn, he said that he wished the President had suppressed the writ of habeas corpus by hanging traitors, and that the lives of thousands of good men would have been saved if Mr. Seymour and Governor Wood had been hung in crowns, of course, only a rhetorical period, and the rhetoric was not half the cause.

That traitors duly convicted shall be executed, by law provides: but the law also provides that they shall be tried. That men of treasonable sympathies or patriotic indifference should be hung, no law provides, and common sense and the usage forbid.

If Mr. Seymour still believes what he has constantly said, he is guilty of opinions which are justly loathed and the Government is imbecile and criminal. He would gladly effect a surrender of the Government by means of settlement. But he is not known to have helped the nation with money any more than with men. Such an objection would be the moral defeat of the Union and the Government. It would be the first step not to a vigorous or any other prosecution of the war, but to peace upon dishonorable terms to the country.

But while all this is true, it does not follow that he ought to be hung; because hostile opinions and indifference or coldness of heart are common, and some opinions in time of war to be so vehement and influential as to be clearly injurious to the Government, it is constitutionally competent to the Government to suppress that expression; and when Mr. Seymour declares that, of course, he will not be silenced, but certainly not hung. When the Government is engaged in a struggle to maintain by fundamental principles the guarantees of Life, Liberty, and Property, it must, by the very necessity of the case, practically suspend all three of the rights of Liberty and Property of its enemies as it thinks necessary. It is making war, and that is the condition of war. It takes life to preserve life, and destroys injure liberty; and property to secure property. So national and seriously conducted war will never be over to do all this. For if it may make war it may do all that is necessary to make war effective.

BLIND FURY.

"LINCOLN the fiend.—let history take hold of him, and let the civilized world ding its scorpion lash upon that fiend's crime-blackened shoulders."

Who is it that says this? Who cold aloud for the sympathy of mankind? People who say they declare every hour in the day, and deem them and their posterity forever to the condition of brute beasts. The steal, burn, pillage, starve, whip, rout, and make perfectly innocent men and women, if they refuse to work for nothing, and to be degraded below human—the outrages are so numerous that human honor and decent social relation, profiting by their own law, are ashamed to be named. Cowardly of marriage among those whom they hold in hopeless and helpless submission—who degrade manhood, dishonor womanhood, and, by law of their own debts, sell other people and their children into eternal separation and misery, pursued by the contempt of Christendom, and stung to madness by fierce hatred of human liberty and the equal rights of all men, are now seeking to smother in blood a great nation of which they are a sworn part, and without any other pretext than that their system of barbarism and infamy can not be infinitely extended.

And who is "Lincoln the fiend?" He is the man who, speaking for his country, is putting an end to all this lamb-like barbarism.

Upon the heads of "fiends" the civilized world is not likely to have two epithets at hand, whatever its lips may say.

A SOUTHSIDE VIEW.

THE Richmond Dispatch of September 27 had two most important articles. One was the full and great deal of truth. One says, "If the North ultimately fails in this war, we will fall with it." The other is a confession of the same truth. The "fiend" or as Lucifer in his descent from heaven." The North, it says, clings to the Union as the manner "to the last plank that has been saved from the unfathomless depths of eternity." The rhetoric is bad, but the truth is solid and sound. It is the reason why the North has the full victory, for she sinks into the slough of a slave-despotism.

The same article says that there is scarcely an abolitionist to be found" in the Union armies; but the next one asserts that "the Northern people" not that the Union Army are rent on a grand scale. Wherever the Federal armies have advanced the negroes have been set off as free, and the Southeastern locusts swept a field of grain."

But if this be the result with, the Dispatch declares, the war is carried on "by the conservative classes," what would happen if these frightful fellows the abolitionists were to get the reins of office? If the only "friends of the South" at the North were the "Conservatives," and they were wrong the abolitionists were, and the war is the nature of things, a war of desperation upon the part of the North, what is the prospect for the South?

But there is still further improvement to be derived from the Dispatch. We have been favored told of the extreme fitness of the Africans for slavery; they are better off as slaves; they are happy as slaves; and the whole system of slavery is truly touching and patriarchal; the master is all anxiety for the welfare of his "servant;" and the slave is all tenderness and fidelity toward the generous being to whom Providence has committed him, etc., etc., etc. Now steps in the Dispatch, and says, oh! disillusion, disenchantment! "The neighborhood of a Yankee army creates no complete a stampede among negroes as the approach of a locomotive among cattle. There are thousands of masters who continue to believe that their servants will not run under similar temptations, and foolishly to expose them to temptation. It is clear, therefore, that there is no security for the negro property of the State, unless the Legislature makes the removal of the negroes from districts exposed to invasion compulsory."

If the faithful and affectionate chattels behaved in this way before the President's Proclamation called universal attention to the law freeing all slaves who reached our lines, what will be their feelings when the hope which, despite our cruel usage of them, the advance of our armies has always been, is finally confirmed by the promise and guarantee of the Government? To suppose the Proclamation will not have FIRE is to disregard the most essential qualities of human nature.

A boy who had stolen some apples was fondling for the rather ingenious manner in which he excused himself. The schoolmaster asking him what he had to say for himself, the urchin replied, "Please sir, apples were THERE; I don't know how he got them; and now they're mine, and he don't know how I got them."

"Well, Matt, are you going to the new place?" "Sure, no, ma'am! the lady couldn't give a satisfactory reference from her last place."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE

THE BATTLE OF PERRYVILLE.

The following is official.

HEADQUARTERS, ARMY OF THE OHIO,
VAN HARRISBURG, OCT. 10, 1862.

To Major-General Halleck, General-in-Chief:

I have already advised you of the movements of the army under my command from Louisville. More or less skirmishing has occurred daily with the enemy's cavalry. Since it is was supposed that the enemy would give battle in Kentucky. My troops reached that point on the 4th inst. driving out the enemy's cavalry and artillery. The main body retired toward Springfield, whither the pursuit was continued. The centre corps, under General Gilbert, moved on the direct road from Springfield to Perryville, which road on the 7th inst. was found to be in possession of the enemy. The left corps, under General McCook, was ordered into position to attack, and a strong reconnoissance directed, with the centre corps in support. General McCook for reinforcements, and learned that the left had been attacked in force by the enemy, and driven back in disorder. The centre corps was being turned and severely pressed. Two divisions of the reserve corps were forward from the centre. Orders were also sent to the right column, under General Crittenden, which was advancing by the Lebanon road, to push forward and attack the enemy's left; but it was impossible for it to get in position in time to produce any decisive result. The action commenced at 11 A.M. and continued with great fury until night, when the enemy were driven repulsed, but without some momentary advantage on the left. The second corps were put in position on the left, and was moved to the attack at six o'clock this morning. Some heavy skirmishing ensued, the enemy's rear-guard. The main body had fallen back in the direction of Harrodsburg. I have no reports of the number of killed in the recent battle, including valuable officers. Generals Jackson and Terrill, I regret to say, are among the killed.

D. C. BUELL,
Major-General Commanding.

ANOTHER VICTORY.

Another brilliant victory in Kentucky was reported on 4th. Dispatches received from Lebanon state that there was a great battle fought on Friday last, between the forces of Bishop and Danville, heavier and more severe than that by all previous fighting in Kentucky. On Friday night Gen. Dumin cavalry, captured one hundred and sixty wagons and a thousand prisoners. The rebels, it is said, were retreating to Camp Dick Robinson.

GENERAL CLAY AND GEN. JACKSON.

GENERAL ORDERS—No. 163.

CAMP NEAR HARRISBURG, HARRISON, CO., 1 MILE FROM PERRYVILLE, KENTUCKY, OCT. 9, 1862.

The attention of officers and soldiers of the 1st division of the Potomac is called to General Orders No. 139, War Department, dated Washington, July 31, 1862, relative to the President's proclamation of September 22.

A proclamation has been given moment to be nation, officially communicated to the army, affords to the general officers and soldiers of the army of the Potomac, and to the officers and soldiers under its command the relation here by all persons found within the lines of the army, or taken beyond the civil authority of the Government. The Government of the United States, its legislature, judicial tribunals, and executive officers, all exist and are operating, and extending the Federal laws. Armed force is employed only to repress combinations too powerful for the civil authorities, and are to be held in strict subordination thereto and responsible to them for any unnecessary force they may use in the performance of their duties. The object of the war is declared, as defined by the Congress of the United States, to be to suppress the rebellion, must be determined and declared by the civil authorities of the United Executive, who is charged with the administration of the national affairs, is the proper and only judge when military force is necessary to be used, and when it is no longer necessary. The military power of the Government can be made known to the armies of the nation only by its chief.

The duties of officers and soldiers commanding armies determined upon and declared by the Government when exercising military power are to obey promptly and respectful expression of opinion, and gravity to impose upon them the responsibility of making known to the army the orders of the people at the polls.

The duty of the soldier is to fight battles, and not to interfere between the soldiers and the Government, to which he owes implicit obedience in all lawful orders. Upon which it has been thought proper to publish during our whole history to the officers of the republic, and in so doing we will not be considered as intending to impose upon them any new rules upon that loyalty and good conduct which have always characterized upon so many battle fields. In carrying out all measures of public policy this army will, of course, be guided by the same rules of mercy and Christianity that have ever controlled in conduct toward the enemies.

By command of MAJOR-GENERAL MCCLELLAN.
JAMES A. HARDIE, Assistant-General, Aid-de-Camp and Acting Assistant Adjutant-General.

THE BATTLES OF IUKA AND SOUTH MOUNTAIN.

GENERAL ORDERS—No. 169.

CAMP NEAR SHARPSBURG, MARYLAND, OCT. 8, 1862.

The Commander-in-Chief takes occasion to congratulate the army under his command for the victories achieved by the gallantry and good conduct of officers and soldiers of the Antietam Creek.

The defeat and retreat of Bragg's and Hooker's corps, under Burnside, at Turner's Gap, and of Franklin's corps at Crampton's Gap, on the 14th inst., after a severe struggle in position and resisting with obstinacy, they carried the passes of South Mountain, were the way for the advance of the army, was for them the admiration of their brethren in arms.

Then, from the heights of Antietam, on the 15th, the enemy was driven in force and with great slaughter, and the success of the army was crowned by the repulse of the enemy's attack on the right wing, and the total defeat of his left, which was driven back in confusion, and the destruction of his whole attempted it. The obstinate conflict which raged during the 16th, mainly on our left, the dashing gallantry of those of Franklin on the right; the steady valor of the troops of Burnside on the left, the vigorous support of Porter and Pleasanton, present a brilliant spectacle of courageous devotion to the country, that meets with pride and exultation.

The losses of the enemy, in vast colors, fifteen thousand five hundred stand of arms, and nearly six thousand prisoners, taken from the enemy, are evidences of his complete defeat of our triumph.

The Commander will thank the noble army for achievements which have driven the invaders from our soil, and the ravages of the invader, and have driven him from their

While rejoicing at the victories which, under God's blessing, have crowned the operations of the army, the memory of our brave comrades who have laid down their lives upon the battle-field will be fondly cherished by us. Their names will be enshrined in the hearts of the people.

By command of MAJOR-GENERAL MCCLELLAN.
S. WILLIAMS, Assistant Adjutant-General.

A REBEL VERSION.

GENERAL ORDERS—NO. 113.

HEAD-QUARTERS, ARMY OF NORTHERN VIRGINIA,
OCTOBER 9, 1862.

In reviewing the achievements of the army during the present campaign, the Commanding General can not withhold the expression of his admiration of the indomitable courage it has displayed in battle, and its cheerful endurance of privation and hardship on the march.

Since the commencement of the campaign it has defeated the enemy at Manassas, Richmond, expelled him from the valley of Virginia after a conflict of three days, utterly repulsed him from Maryland, and driven him back behind the fortifications around his capital.

Without halting for repose, you crossed the Potomac, stormed the heights of Harper's Ferry, made prisoners of more than ten thousand men, and captured upward of seventy pieces of artillery, all their small-arms and other munitions of war.

While one corps of the army was thus engaged, the other hastened its success by arresting at Boonsborough the combined armies of the enemy, advancing under their Executive General to the relief of their beleaguered comrades.

On the field of Sharpsburg, with but three-quarters of a number, you resisted from daylight until dark the whole army of the enemy, repulsed every attack, and gained the entire front of more than four miles in extent.

The events of the day following that you advanced to renew the conflict on the same ground, and retired next morning without molestation to the Virginia shore.

Two attempts subsequently made by the enemy to follow you were promptly repulsed, and he has since not ventured to cross the river in force.

Achievements such as these demanded much valor and constitution. Marching and fighting almost daily, the blacks and endurance than this army has exhibited; and no troops ever displayed more gallantry in action.

The Commanding General has watched with pride and admiration the manner in which the men have responded to the demands made upon their energies, and has observed with pleasure the confidence they have manifested in their officers.

Much as you have done, much more remains to be accomplished. Your country expects every man to do his duty, and to your tried valor and patriotism the country looks with confidence for the achievement of that great object for which you have so often periled your lives.

R. E. LEE, General Commanding.

A REBEL RAID INTO PENNSYLVANIA.

A force of two thousand rebel cavalry, under the renowned Stuart, crossed the Potomac at a point far above the right wing of General McClellan's army, and pushed rapidly on through Mercersburg to Chambersburg, Pennsylvania, reaching there at 4 o'clock, Friday evening, 10th. About eight hundred entered the town, the remainder remaining a mile away. They immediately proceeded to boots, shoes, and clothing, giving Confederate paper in exchange for the same. They also destroyed the depot and the Cumberland Valley Railroad bridge, and tore up the railroad track. They then left the town, taking with them a long line of wagons loaded with boots and shoes and forced Gettysburg. They borrowed or exchanged horses wherever they could, but have been entirely unsuccessful in getting such articles as they most needed. No violence was done to individuals, and the property was made by the people, at least not until they had gone from Chambersburg. Before they left, they burned a large number of the machine-shops, and that was a'2 the violence experienced. There is a rumor that a force of 5,000 when they crossed the Potomac, on Tuesday morning, but it is doubtful; indeed the number of the rebels in the whole scene accounts say at Hancock, and others at Dan No. 8 Bridge, on the Potomac, and that they had not crossed the river. The Hagerstown and Ohio railroad for four miles south of Frederick City says that the rebel cavalry passed along that road. Hagerstown has been entirely deserted, and took breakfast at Urbana, four miles from Monocacy, on Sunday morning last. Harrey Urbana is on the road in the direction of Stuart's Ferry on the Potomac. Seven prisoners, captured by the rebels, were paroled. All this indicates that the rebels were pretty surely are over the Potomac, and are probably in or near Leesburg, before night on Sunday, 12th.

THE VICTORY AT CORINTH.

HEAD-QUARTERS OF GENERAL CURTIS,
CORINTH, MISS., OCT. 5, 1862.

To Major-General Halleck, General-in-Chief:

Generals Rosecrans and Hurlbut, with their army yesterday, and General Hurlbut having driven in small rebel forces on the Purdy road before, after every effort fought. Gray drove the enemy five miles back across the Hatchie bridge, and Carroll, capturing two battle-flags, and many dead prisoners, and many small-arms.

I immediately ordered General Ord to cross of these forts, and directed him to urge on the good work. The following despatch has just been received from him:

To Major-General Grant:

The enemy are totally routed, leaving their dead and wounded. We are following sharply.

E. O. C. ORD, Major-General.

Under perilous instructions General Ord has since pursued the enemy to the Tennessee River, and General Rosecrans's column.

THE ENEMY DISPERSED.

Later news from the West does not confirm the report of a splendid victory. We captured two thousand prisoners, including three hundred officers, but the loss one thousand killed and a large number wounded. Our loss was about two thousand killed and wounded, and three hundred wounded. The rebels abandoned and many slaves joined our army. Rosecrans and Ord, and last most of their ammunition and trains. General Rosecrans, after pursuing the enemy until the 5th inst., returned to Corinth at the command of General Grant. He reports the rebels utterly dispersed, abandoning all hopes of further mischief. We would gladly have followed them up, but the enemy have thus had time to reorganize, time to destroy them utterly, but for the orders of his superior officers.

A BATTLE NEAR BEDFORD.

A battle took place on St. Inst. in the vicinity of Suffolk, at Franklin, on the Blackwater River, which appears to be of considerable importance. The rebels had a force there thousand strong at that point, and were commanded by General Holmes, of North Carolina, who was reinforced by General Hill's division, from Richmond.

The rebels were pretty badly used up by troops, who were commanded by General Peck, and Gen. Wessells, and artillery commanded by Col. Spear. The fight lasted all day, and the rebels, while our line was only three in all. The attack was planned by General Peck, and the rebels were driven pickets of the enemy, and it was intended that the gunboats should co-operate with the land forces by way of Chowan Creek, from Albemarle Sound; but owing to some mistake they did not arrive in time. Our force was somewhat about two thousand. The object of the attack was fully attained.

THE REBELS WINCING AT NEW ORLEANS.

Our new Provost Marshal-General, by the effect of General Butler's Order No. 76 is very interesting. The facts are developed there that all persons taking the oath of allegiance and given a return of their property has been restored to them, and that many are coming forward, and thousands were flocking to the places appointed to take the oath, some in terror and many with entire unwillingness.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

ANOTHER PRIZE AT WORK.

We have important news of the operations of the rebel steamer Alabama. Captain Semmes, the commander, an English vessel, lately arrived at Greenock, from Jamaica, and reports that on the 3d inst. he fell in with a large three-masted vessel, from which a pilot came alongside. Semmes ordered that their ship, the Gemsbok, of Liverpool, Captain Manwell, had been captured by the Alabama, under the command of Captain Semmes, late of the Sumter. The Gemsbok had one hundred and fifty tons of oil, and her crew (thirty-four men) were made prisoners. The Alabama had already burned four whalers. She also captured an American schooner gonne unknown in sight of the Cairngorms. The United States sailing sloop of war St. Louis left Lisbon to search, as we supposed, for the rebel privateer "No. 290" off the Azores, to capture her of her old an American whalers.

MARTIAL LAW.

TUNE drum, the fife, the bugle!
My life was a tranquil flood,
But the waters are suddenly shaken,
And the billows imbued with blood.

I thought we were Freedom's children—
What right have they thus to come,
Disturbing my dreams of beauty
With their fife, and drum?

The drum, the fife, the bugle!
Why ships the pen from my hand?
What voices are crying within me?
Why menaces this fair land?

The drum, the fife, the bugle!
The foe to our gates is hurled,
And the People are marching to meet him,
With a tread that shakes the world.

The quail in the stubble are merry,
The deer skip lustless and free;
The plow-share sleeps in the furrow,
The axe sticks fast in the tree:

And men stream down like a torrent—
Is the Valley of Death destroyed?
And a feeling of shame comes o'er me—
Why linger you here, my boys?

I.

FROM GEORGE BARTRAM TO NORA VANSTONE.

"DEAR NORA—Where are you?

"MY DEAR NOEL.—Here are two plain questions at starting. In the name of all that is mysterious, what are you doing in London? And why is every thing relating to your marriage kept an impenetrable secret from your oldest friends?

"I have been to Aldborough to try if I could trace you from that place, and have come back as wise as I went. I have applied to your father in London, and have been told in reply that you have forbidden him to disclose the place of your retreat to any one without first receiving your permission to do so. All I could prevail on him to say was that he had received a short letter which might be sent to his care. I write accordingly, and, mind this, I expect an answer.

"You dear oaks, in your old-fashioned way, what business I have to meddle with affairs of yours which it is your pleasure to keep private. My dear Noel, there is a serious reason for our opening communications with you from this house. You and don't know me; and when I take my place at St. Crux since you ran away to get married (and though I detest clergymen as a rule, must lose an hour's shooting to-day in trying to enlighten you.

"On the twenty-third of last month the admiral and I were disturbed over our wine after dinner by the announcement that a lodger had unexpectedly arrived at St. Crux. Who do you think the visitor was? Mrs. Lecount!

"Mrs. Lecount, with that old-fashioned bachelor gallantry of his, which pays equal respect to all wearers of petticoats, left the table directly to welcome Mrs. Lecount. While I was debating whether I should follow him or not, my meditations were suddenly broken in upon by a loud call from the admiral. I ran into the morningroom, and there was your unfortunate housekeeper on the sofa, with all the symptoms about her, more dead than alive. She had travelled from England to Calais, from Calais back again to England, without stopping, and she looked accordingly. I was the only doctor to be had, so I immediately agreed with my uncle that the first thing to be done was to send for medical help. We dispatched a groom on the spot, and at Mrs. Lecount's own request sent all the servants in a body out of the room.

"As soon as we were alone Mrs. Lecount surprised us by a singular question. She asked if you had received a letter which she had addressed to you, before leaving England, at this house. When we told her that the letter had been forwarded, under cover to your friend Mr. Bygrave, by your own particular request, she turned as pale as ashes; and when we added that you had left us in company with this same Mr. Bygrave, she clasped her hands and stared at us as if she had taken leave of her senses. Her next question was, Where is Mr. Noel now?' We could only give her one reply: Mr. Noel had not informed us. She looked perfectly thunder-struck at that answer. 'He has gone to his ruin!' she said. 'He has gone away in company with the greatest villain in England—and we shall find him at once if we send Mr. Noel!' If I don't find him at once it will be too late. He will be married!' she burst out quite frantically—'on my honor and my oath he will be married!' The admiral, incautiously perhaps, but with the best intentions, told her you were married already. She gave a scream that made the windows ring again, and dropped back on the sofa in a fainting fit. The doctor came in the nick of time, and soon brought her to. This was ten days ago, and the same state she has grown worse and worse ever since, and the last medical report is that the lower portion of her body is paralyzed, and in a fair way to settle on her brain.

"Now, my dear Noel, neither my uncle nor I have any right to intrude ourselves on your confidence. We are naturally astonished at the extraordinary circumstances which have attended your marriage, and we can not be blind to the fact that your housekeeper has apparently some strong reason for her ery for vengeance. Mrs. Noel Vanstone with an enmity and distrust which we are quite unable to believe that lady had any thing to deserve. Whatever strange misunderstanding there may have been in your household is your business and not mine (keep it to yourself), and not ours. All we have any right to do is to tell you what has occurred. His uncle is not in the least delirious; he declines to answer for her life if she goes on as she is going on now; and he begs—thinking that she is personally talking of her master—that your presence would be useful in quieting her, if you chose to come here at once and exert your influence before it is too late.

"What do you say? Will you emerge from the darkness that surrounds you, and come to St. Crux? If this was the case of an ordinary servant, I should understand your hesitating to leave the delights of your honey-moon for any such object as that proposed to you. But this, my dear fellow, Mrs. Lecount is not an ordinary servant. You are under obligations to her fidelity and devotion as your father's friend as well as in your own; and if you can quiet the anxieties which torment her, and which appear to me, personally, as real, I really think you ought to come here and do so. Your leaving Mrs. Noel Vanstone in the society of this person for a while is no necessity for any such hand-hearted proceeding. The admiral desires me to say that he can be your quiet friend living, and that his house is at your wife's disposal, as it has always been, from the day of her birth. Strangers are the need dread no near association with the sickroom; and, with all my uncle's oddities, I am sure he will not think an offer of his friendship an offer to be despised.

"Here I told you already that I went to Aldborough to try and find a clew to your whereabouts? I can't be at the trouble of looking back to see if I have told you or not, so I go again. The truth is, I made an acquaintance at Aldborough of whom you know something, at least by report.

"After applying vainly at Sea View, I went to the house next door to inquire whether the lady could give me no information; but the moment I mentioned your name the door was shut behind my face; and when I told her I was your cousin, she said there was a young lady then at Aldborough of your name who was not to be seen. She was in great distress about a missing relative, and who might prove of some use to me, or I to her. I left my card, and came away from Aldborough. I had not the least idea who she was, but I found out and came back (within a few minutes afterward I found myself in the presence of one of the most charming women these eyes ever looked on).

"Our first words of explanation informed me that your Aldborough friend was not to be put. Who do you think she was? The eldest daughter of my uncle and yours—Andrew Vanstone's child by his first wife. She had come to the past years speak of her brother Andrew, and I knew of what and every thing. Andrew, by his poor families, as you are aware, had always been estranged; and I had never seen my charming cousin before. She has all the Vanstone beauty and the gentle, retiring manners that I always admire in women. I was in a position to answer all disagreement about your father's conduct to those two sisters, or to deny that his brother Andrew had behaved badly to him. So I was willing to admit that the high moral position he took in the matter is quite unassailable by such poor creatures as I am. And I was able to impute that my own spendthrift habits inexpicable to me from different causes, and not to those of my father people's pecuniary affairs. But, with all these allowances and drawbacks, I can tell you that Miss Bygrave is, if you mean to do justice to Vanstone, I venture to prophesy that for the first time in your life you will have the propriety of following your father's example.

"She told me her little story, poor thing, most touchingly and simply. She is now occupying her second situation as a governess, and, as usual, all who know her, love her. She is very rich. They are friends of my uncle's, whom he has lost sight of latterly—the Tyrrels of Portland Place—and they trust Miss Bygrave with as much kindness and consideration as if she was a member of their family. Her last letter to them, sents accompanied her to Aldborough, her object in traveling to that place being what the landlady of the hotel had stated it to be. The family reverses have, it seems, had a serious effect on Miss Vanstone's younger sister, who has left her friends, and who has been missing from home for some time. She had been last heard of at Aldborough; and her elder sister, on her return from the Continent with the Tyrrels, had instantly set out to search for the girl on the spot.

"This was all Miss Vanstone told me. She asked whether you had seen any thing of her sister, or whether Mrs. Lecount knew any thing of her sister—I suppose because she was aware you had been at Aldborough. Of course I could tell her nothing. She entreated me to speak out on the subject, and I could not presume to ask her for any. All I did was to set to work with might and main to assist her inquiries. The attempt was an utter failure—nobody could give us any information. We tried personal description, of course; and, strange to say, the only young lady formerly staying at Aldborough who answered to the description was the only person in the world, the lady you have married! If she had not had an uncle and aunt (both of whom I have seen), I should have begun to suspect that you had married your cousin Miss Vanstone! But—I, is this the clew to the mystery? Don't be angry; I must have my little joke, and I can't help writing as carelessly as I all baffled, and I traveled back with Miss Vanstone and her friends as far as the station at here. I think I shall call on the Tyrrels when I am next in London. I have certainly treated that family with the most inconceivable neglect.

"Here I am at the end of my third sheet of note-paper. I don't often take the pen in hand, but this time I do very well agree with me that I am in no hurry to lay it aside again. Treat the rest of my letter as the first, and consider what I have told you about Mrs. Lecount, and remember that time is of consequence.

"Ever yours,

GEORGE BARTRAM."

II.

FROM NORAH VANSTONE TO MISS GARTH.

"PORTLAND PLACE.

"MY DEAR MISS GARTH,—More sorrow, more disappointment! I have just returned from Aldborough without making any discovery. Magdalen is still lost to us.

"I can not attribute this new overthrow of my hopes to any want of perseverance or patience in making the necessary inquiries. My inexperience in such matters was kindly assisted by the experience exercised by Mr. George Bartram. By a strange coincidence he happened to be at Aldborough at the time of Miss Vanstone at the very time when I was there inquiring after Magdalen. He sent in his card; I received him; he looked at the name, that he was my cousin—if I may call him so—I had not mentioned it to him previously in my seeing him and asking his advice. I abstained from entering into particulars for Magdalen's sake, but I made no allusion to that letter of Mrs. Lecount's which you answered for me. I only told him that Magdalen was missing, and had been last heard of at Aldborough. The kindness which he showed in devoting himself to my unfortunate cause is beyond all description. He treated me, in my forlorn situation, with a delicacy and respect which I shall remember gratefully long after I forget, perhaps, forgotten our necessary altogether. He is quite young—not more than thirty, I should think. In face and figure he reminded me a little of the portrait of my father at Combe-Raven—I mean the portrait in which he looks young. My father when he was a young man.

"I believe as our inquiries were, there is one result of them which has left a very strange and shocking impression on my mind.

"By my advice Mr. Noel Vanstone has lately married, under mysterious circumstances, a young lady whom he met with at Aldborough, named Bygrave. He has gone away with his wife, telling nobody but his lawyer where he has gone to. Mr. George Bartram, my cousin Bartram, who was endeavoring to trace him, for the purpose of communicating the news of his bereavement to his relatives, the housekeeper being the same Mrs. Lecount whose letter you answered for me. So far, you will perceive, nothing has transpired particularly interest either of us. But I think you will be as much surprised as I was when I tell you that the description given by the people at Aldborough of Miss Bygrave's appearance is most extraordinarily and unaccountably like the description of Magdalen's appearance. This discovery, taken in connection with all the circumstances of the case, has had an effect on my mind which I can not describe to you, which I have not courage enough to describe even to me! I have never felt so wretched about Magdalen as I feel now. Suspense must have weakened my nerves in some strange way. I feel superstitious about the slightest things. The accidental resemblance of a total stranger to Magdalen fills me, every now and then, with the most horrible misgivings, merely because Mr. Noel Vanstone happens to be mixed up with it. Once more pray come to me; I have so much to say to you that I can not and dare not say in writing.

"Gratefully and affectionately yours,

"NORAH."

III.

FROM MR. JOHN LOSCOMBE (SOLICITOR) TO GEORGE BARTRAM, ESQ.

"LAMBETH, 20 GEORGE STREET, September 6, 1847.

"SIR,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your note inclosing a letter addressed to my client, Mr. Noel Vanstone, and requesting that I will forward the same to Mr. Vanstone's present address.

"Since I last had the pleasure of communicating with you on this subject my position toward my client is entirely altered. Three days ago I received a letter from him which stated his intention of changing his place of residence on the next day then ensuing, but which left me entirely in ignorance on the subject of the locality to which it was his intention to remove. I have not heard from him since; and, as he had previously requested me to write to him no oftener than usual, there would be no present necessity for his writing to me again—assuming that it be his wish to keep his place of residence concealed from you, and from myself also.

"Under these circumstances I think it right to return you your letter, with the assurance that I will let you know if I happen to be again placed in a position to forward it to its destination.

"I am, your obedient servant,

"JOHN LOSCOMBE."

IV.

FROM NORAH VANSTONE TO MISS GARTH.

"PORTLAND PLACE.

"MY DEAR MISS GARTH,—Forget the letter I wrote to you yesterday, and all the gloomy forebodings that it contains. The morning's post has brought new life to me—I have heard from Magdalen!

"The letter is very short; it seems to have been written in a hurry. She says she has been dreaming of me for some nights past, and the dreams have made her fear that her long silence has caused me even more distress, on account, than she is worth. She writes therefore to assure me that she is safe and well—that she hopes to see me before long—and that she has something to tell me, when we meet, which will try my sisterly love for her as nothing has tried it yet. The letter is not dated; but the post-mark is 'Aldonby,' which I have found, on referring to the Gazetteer, to be a little sea-side place in Cumberland. There is no hope of my being able to write back—for Magdalen expressly says that she is to be on no account—from her present residence, and that she is not at liberty to say where she is going to next. I have also instructions for forwarding any letters after her.

"In happier times I should have thought this letter very short and very unsatisfactory—and I should have been seriously alarmed by that mysterious hint in reference to the secret which will try my love for her as nothing has tried it yet. But after all the suspense I have suffered the happiness of hearing of her again seems to fill my heart, and to keep all other feelings out of it. I don't seem to care any longer how I answer you are coming to me soon, and I want to have the pleasure of seeing you read it.

"Ever affectionately yours,

"NORAH.

"P.S. My uncle Vanstone called on Mrs. Tyrrel to-day. He insisted on being introduced to the children. When he was gone, Mrs. Tyrrel laughed at his good-humored way, and said that his anxiety to see the children looked, to her mind, very much like an anxiety to see me. We may imagine now how my spirits improved when I can occupy my pen in writing such nonsense as this!"

V.

FROM MRS. LECOUNT TO MR. DE BLYDIT, GENERAL AGENT, LONDON.

"ALDBOROUGH, October 25, 1847.

"DEAR SIR,—I have been long in thanking you for the kind letter which promises me your assistance, in the friendly manner in the commercial relations formerly existing between my brother and yourself. The truth is, I have overtaxed my strength on my recovery from a long and dangerous illness; and for the last ten days I have been suffering under a relapse. I am now better again, and able to enter on the business which you so kindly offer to undertake for me.

"The person whose present place of abode is of the utmost importance to me to discover is Mr. Noel Vanstone. I have lived for many years past in this gentleman's service as housekeeper, and, having received from my former dismissal, I consider myself in his service still. During my absence on the Continent he was privately married at Aldborough, in Suffolk, on the eighteenth of August last. He left Aldborough on the next day, taking his wife with him to some place of retreat which was kept a secret from every body except his lawyer, Mr. Loscombe, of Lambeth Inn. After a short time he again removed, on the 4th of September, without informing his lawyer of the new occasion of his new place of abode. From that date to this the lawyer has remained (or has pretended to remain) in total ignorance of the present exile. Application has been made to Mr. Loscombe, under the circumstances, to ascertain what that former place of residence was of which Mr. Vanstone is known to have informed his lawyer. This application he has steadily declined to do, in consequence of having received from the gentleman himself a formal permission to disclose his residence to any one but the lawyer. I have all these latter particulars from Mr. Loscombe's correspondence—the nephew of the gentleman is my own half-brother, and whose charity has given me an asylum, during the heavy affliction of my sickness, under his own roof.

"I believe the reasons which have induced Mr. Noel Vanstone to keep himself and his wife in hiding are reasons which relate entirely to myself. In the first place, he is aware that he knows that my faithful services, rendered through a period of twenty years, to his father and himself, fully justify the common decency, to cast me out helpless on the world without a provision for the future. And of my life is the meanest of living men, and his wife is the vilest of living women. As long as he can avoid fulfilling his obligations to me he will, and his wife's encouragement may be trusted to fortify him in his ingratitude.

"My object in determining to find him out is briefly this: His marriage has exposed him to consequences which a man of ten times his courage could not face without shrinking. Of these consequences he is known perfectly. His wife knows, and keeps him in ignorance. I know, and can enlighten him. His ignorance of this danger that threatens him is in my hands alone, and he shall pay the price of his rescue to the last farthing of the debt that justice claims for me as my due—no more and no less.

"I have now laid my mind before you, as you told me, without reserve. You know why I want to find this man, and what I mean to do when I find him. I leave it to your sympathy for me to answer the serious question that remains: How is the discovery to be made? If a first trace of them can be found after their departure from Aldborough, I believe careful inquiry will suffice for the rest. The personal appearance of the wife, and the extraordinary contrast between her husband and herself, is certain to be remarked and remembered by every stranger who sees them.

"When you favor me with your answer, please address it to 'Care of Admiral Bartram, St. Crux-in-the-Marsh, near Ossory, Essex.'

"Your much obliged,

"Virginie Lecount."

VI.

FROM MR. DE BLERIOT TO MRS. LECOUNT.

"Dark's Buildings, Kingsland, October 25, 1847.

[Private and confidential.]

"Dear Madam,—I hasten to reply to your favor of Saturday's date. Circumstances have enabled me to forward your interests by consulting a friend of mine possessing great experience in the management of private inquiries of all sorts. I have placed your case before him (without mentioning names), and I am happy to inform you that my views and his views of the proper course to take agree in every particular.

"Both myself and friend, then, are of opinion that little or nothing can be done toward tracing the parties you mention until the place of their temporary residence, after they left Aldborough, has been discovered first. If this can be done, the sooner it is done the better. Judging from your letter, some weeks must have passed since the lawyer received his information that they had shifted their quarters. As they are both remarkable-looking people, the strangers who may have assisted them on their travels have probably not forgotten them yet. Nevertheless, expedition is desirable.

"The question for you to consider is, whether they may not possibly have communicated the address of which we stand in need to some other person besides the lawyer. The husband may have written to members of his family, or the wife may have written to members of her family. Both myself and friend are of opinion that the latter chance is the likeliest of the two. If you have any means of access in the direction of the wife's family, we strongly recommend you to make use of them. If not, please supply us with the names of any of her near relations or intimate female friends whom you know, and we will endeavor to get access for you.

"In any case we request you will at once favor us with the most exact personal description that can be written of both the parties. We may require your assistance in this important particular at five minutes' notice. Favor us, therefore, with the description by return of post. In the mean time we will endeavor to ascertain on our side whether any information is to be privately obtained at Mr. Loscombe's office. The lawyer himself is probably altogether beyond our reach. But if any one of his clerks can be advantageously treated with on such terms as may not overtax your pecuniary resources, accept my assurance that the opportunity shall be made the most of by,

"Dear Madam,

"Your faithful servant,

"Alfred De Bleriot."

VII.

FROM MR. PENDRIL TO NORAH VANSTONE.

"Searle Street, October 27, 1847.

"My dear Miss Vanstone,—A lady, named Lecount (formerly attached to Mr. Noel Vanstone's service in the capacity of housekeeper), has called at my office this morning, and has asked me to furnish her with your address. I have begged her to excuse my immediate compliance with her request, and to favor me with a call to-morrow morning, when I shall be prepared to meet her with a definite answer.

"My hesitation in this matter does not proceed from any distrust of Mrs. Lecount personally, for I know nothing whatever to her prejudice. But in making her request to me she stated that the object of the desired interview was to speak to you privately on the subject of your sister. Forgive me for acknowledging that I determined to withhold the address as soon as I heard this. You will make allowances for your old friend and your sincere well-wisher? You will not take it amiss if I express my strong disapproval of your allowing yourself, on any pretense whatever, to be mixed up for the future with your sister's proceedings.

"I will not distress you by saying more than this. But I feel too deep an interest in your welfare, and too sincere an admiration of the patience with which you have borne all your trials, to say less.

"If I can not prevail on you to follow my advice, you have only to say so, and Mrs. Lecount shall have your address to-morrow. In this case (which I can not contemplate without the greatest unwillingness), let me at least recommend you to stipulate that Miss Garth should be present at the interview. In any matter with which your sister is concerned you may want an old friend's advice and an old friend's protection against your own generous impulses. If I could have helped you in this way I would; but Mrs. Lecount gave me indirectly to understand that the subject to be discussed was of too delicate a nature to permit of my presence. Whatever this objection may be really worth it can not apply to Miss Garth, who has brought you both up from childhood. I say again, therefore, if you see Mrs. Lecount, see her in Miss Garth's company.

"Always most truly yours,

"William Pendril."

VIII.

FROM NORAH VANSTONE TO MR. PENDRIL.

"Portland Place, Wednesday.

"Dear Mr. Pendril,—Pray don't think I am ungrateful for your kindness. Indeed, indeed I am not! But I must see Mrs. Lecount. You were not aware, when you wrote to me, that I had received a few lines from Magdalen—not telling me where she is, but holding out the hope of our meeting before long. Perhaps Mrs. Lecount may have something to say to me on this very subject? Even if it should not be so, my sister—do what she may—is still my sister. I can't desert her; I can't turn my back on any one who comes to me in her name. You know, dear Mr. Pendril, I have always been obstinate on this subject; and you have always borne with me. Let me owe another obligation to you which I can never return—and bear with me still!

"Need I say that I willingly accept that part of your advice which refers to Miss Garth? I have already written to beg that she will come here at four to-morrow afternoon. When you see Mrs. Lecount, please inform her that Miss Garth will be with me, and that she will find us both ready to receive her here to-morrow at four o'clock.

"Gratefully yours,

"Norah Vanstone."

IX.

FROM MR. DE BLERIOT TO MRS. LECOUNT.

"Dark's Buildings, October 28.

[Private.]

"Dear Madam,—One of Mr. Loscombe's clerks has proved amenable to a small pecuniary consideration, and has mentioned a circumstance which it may be of some importance to you to know.

"Nearly a month since accident gave the clerk in question an opportunity of looking into one of the documents on his master's table, which had attracted his attention from a slight peculiarity in the form and color of the paper. He had only time, during Mr. Loscombe's momentary absence, to satisfy his curiosity by looking at the beginning of the document, and at the end. At the beginning, he saw the customary form used in making a will. At the end, he discovered the signature of Mr. Noel Vanstone, with the names of two witnesses underneath, and the date (of which he is quite certain)—the thirtieth of September last.

"Before the clerk had time to make any further investigations his master returned, sorted the papers on the table, and carefully locked up the will in the strong box devoted to the custody of Mr. Noel Vanstone's documents. It has been ascertained that at the close of September Mr. Loscombe was absent from the office. If he was then employed in superintending the execution of his client's will—which is quite possible—it follows clearly that he was in the secret of Mr. Vanstone's address, after the removal of the 4th of September; and if you can do nothing on your side, it may be desirable to have the lawyer watched on ours. In any case it is certainly ascertained that Mr. Noel Vanstone has made his will since his marriage. I leave you to draw your own conclusions from that fact, and remain, in the hope of hearing from you shortly,

"Your faithful servant,

"Alfred De Bleriot."

X.

FROM MISS GARTH TO MR. PENDRIL.

"Portland Place, October 28.

"My dear Sir,—Mrs. Lecount has just left us. If it was not too late to wish, I should wish from the bottom of my heart that Norah had taken your advice, and had refused to see her.

"I write in such distress of mind that I can not hope to give you a clear and complete account of the interview. I can only tell you briefly what Mrs. Lecount has done, and what our situation now is. The rest must be left until I am more composed, and until I can speak to you personally.

"You will remember my informing you of the letter which Mrs. Lecount addressed to Norah from Aldborough, and which I answered for her in her absence. When Mrs. Lecount made her appearance to-day, her first words announced to us that she had come to renew the subject. As well as I can remember it, this is what she said, addressing herself to Norah:

"'I wrote to you on the subject of your sister, Miss Vanstone, some little time since; and Miss Garth was so good as to answer the letter. What I feared at that time has come true. Your sister has defied all my efforts to check her; she has disappeared in company with my master, Mr. Noel Vanstone; and she is now in a position of danger, which may lead to her disgrace and ruin at a moment's notice. It is my interest to recover my master; it is your interest to save your sister. Tell me—for time is precious—have you any news of her?'

"Norah answered, as well as her terror and distress would allow her, 'I have had a letter, but there was no address on it.'

"Mrs. Lecount asked, 'Was there no post-mark on the envelope?'

"Norah said, 'Yes, Allonby.'

"'Allonby is better than nothing,' said Mrs. Lecount. 'Allonby may help you to trace her. Where is Allonby?'

"Norah told her. It all passed in a minute. I had been too much confused and startled to interfere before, but I composed myself sufficiently to interfere now.

"'You have entered into no particulars,' I said. 'You have only frightened us—you have told us nothing.'

"'You shall hear the particulars, ma'am,' said Mrs. Lecount; 'and you and Miss Vanstone shall judge for yourselves if I have frightened you without a cause.'

"Upon this she entered at once upon a long narrative, which I can not—I might almost say, which I dare not—repeat. You will understand the horror we both felt when I tell you the end. If Mrs. Lecount's statement is to be relied on, Magdalen has carried her mad resolution of recovering her father's fortune to the last and most desperate extremity—she has married Michael Vanstone's son under a false name. Her husband is at this moment still persuaded that her maiden name was Bygrave, and that she is really the niece of a scoundrel who assisted her imposture, and whom I recognize by the description of him to have been Captain Wragge.

"I spare you Mrs. Lecount's cool avowal, when she rose to leave us, of her own mercenary motives in wishing to discover her master and to enlighten him. I spare you the hints she dropped of Magdalen's purpose in contracting this infamous marriage. The one aim and object of my letter is, to implore you to assist me in quieting Norah's anguish of mind. The shock she has received at hearing this news of her sister is not the worst result of what has happened. She has persuaded herself that the answers she innocently gave in her distress to Mrs. Lecount's questions on the subject of the letter—the answers wrung from her under the sudden pressure of confusion and alarm—may be used to Magdalen's prejudice by the woman who purposely startled her into giving the information. I can only prevent her from taking some desperate step on her side—some step by which she may forfeit the friendship and protection of the excellent people with whom she is now living—by reminding her that if Mrs. Lecount traces her master by means of the post-mark on the letter, we may trace Magdalen at the same time, and by the same means. Whatever objection you may personally feel to renewing the efforts for the rescue of this miserable girl, which failed so lamentably at York, I entreat you, for Norah's sake, to take the same steps now which we took then. Send me the only assurance which will quiet her—the assurance, under your own hand, that the search on our side has begun. If you will do this, you may trust me when the time comes to stand between these two sisters, and to defend Norah's peace, character, and future prosperity, at any price. Most sincerely yours,

"Harriet Garth."

XI.

FROM MRS. LECOUNT TO MR. DE BLERIOT.

"October 28.

"Dear Sir,—I have found the trace you wanted. Mrs. Noel Vanstone has written to her sister. The letter contains no address; but the post-mark is Allonby, in Cumberland. From Allonby, therefore, the inquiries must begin. You have already in your possession the personal description of both husband and wife. I urgently recommend you not to lose one unnecessary moment. If it is possible to send to Cumberland immediately on receipt of this letter, I beg you will do so.

"I have another word to say before I close my note—a word about the discovery in Mr. Loscombe's office.

"It is no surprise to me to hear that Mr. Noel Vanstone has made his will since his marriage; and I am at no loss to guess in whose favor the will is made. If I succeed in finding my master—let that person get the money, if that person can! A course to follow in this matter has presented itself to my mind since I received your letter, but my ignorance of details of business and intricacies of law leaves me still uncertain whether my idea is capable of ready and certain execution. I will call at your office to-morrow at two o'clock for the purpose of consulting you on the subject. It is of great importance when I next see Mr. Noel Vanstone that he should find me thoroughly prepared beforehand in this matter of the will.

"Your much obliged servant,

"Virginie Lecount."

XII.

FROM MR. PENDRIL TO MISS GARTH.

"Searle Street, October 29.

"Dear Miss Garth,—I have only a moment to assure you of the sorrow with which I have read your letter. The circumstances under which you urge your request, and the reasons you give for making it, are sufficient to silence any objection I might otherwise feel to the course you propose. A trust-worthy person, whom I have myself instructed, will start for Allonby to-day; and as soon as I receive any news from him, you shall hear of it by special messenger. Tell Miss Vanstone this, and pray add the sincere expression of my sympathy and regard.

"Faithfully yours,

"William Pendril."

XIII.

FROM MR. DE BLERIOT TO MRS. LECOUNT.

"Dark's Buildings, November 1.

"Dear Madam,—I have the pleasure of informing you that the discovery has been made with far less trouble than I had anticipated.

"Mr. and Mrs. Noel Vanstone have been traced across the Solway Firth to Dumfries, and thence to a cottage a few miles from the town, on the banks of the Nith. The exact address is, Baliol Cottage, near Dumfries.

"This information, though easily hunted up, has nevertheless been obtained under rather singular circumstances.

"Before leaving Allonby, the persons in my employ discovered, to their surprise, that a stranger was in the place pursuing the same inquiry as themselves. In the absence of any instructions preparing them for such an occurrence as this, they took their own view of the circumstance. Considering the man as an intruder on their business, whose success might deprive them of the credit and reward of making the discovery, they took advantage of their superiority in numbers, and of their being first in the field, and carefully misled the stranger before they ventured any further with their own investigations. I am in possession of the details of their proceedings, with which I need not trouble you. The end is, that this person, whoever he may be, was cleverly turned back southward, on a false scent, before the men in my employment crossed the Firth.

"I mention the circumstance, as you may be better able than I am to find a clew to it, and as it may possibly be of a nature to induce you to hasten your journey.

"Your faithful servant,

"Alfred De Bleriot."

XIV.

FROM MRS. LECOUNT TO MR. DE BLERIOT.

"November 1.

"Dear Sir,—One line to say that your letter has just reached me at my lodging in London. I think I know who sent the strange man to inquire at Allonby. It matters little. Before he finds out his mistake I shall be at Dumfries. My luggage is packed, and I start for the North by the next train.

"Your deeply obliged,

"Virginie Lecount."

THE CAMPAIGN IN MARYLAND.

Our special artist with the Army of the Potomac has sent us sketches which we reproduce on pages 676 and 677. Most of these pictures explain themselves; but we subjoin Mr. Waud's descriptions:

SUGAR-LOAF MOUNTAIN

is used as a signal station, having a very extensive view over the neighboring country. When the Confederates were in Maryland their signal officers occupied it, but the advance of Franklin's corps drove them off, and re-established our own on its summit.

MIDDLETON

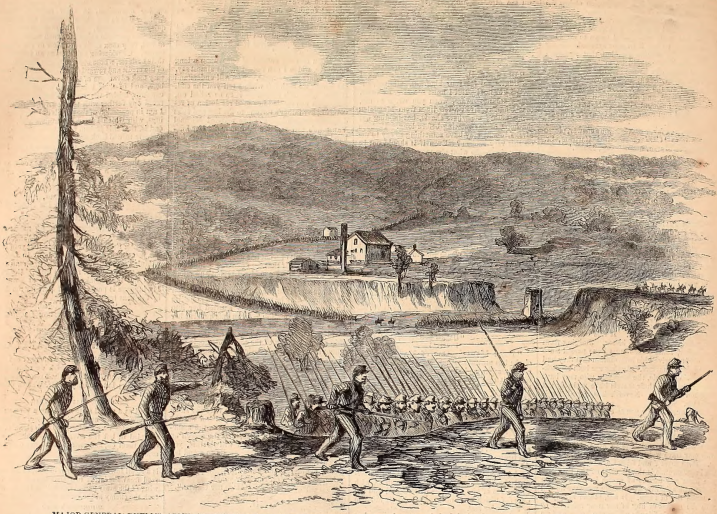
is a small town away from railroads, on the stage-road from Frederick to Hagerstown. The right wing of the army passed through on its way to attack the enemy at the battle of South Mountain.

THORNTON'S GAP

is about six miles from Middleton. The turnpike here crosses the mountain. It was held by the rebels in force, and considered an impregnable position, but it could not stand before the determined valor of the Union army. Our sketch is from the north side of the mountain, the smoke on the top of the mountain at each side of the gap showing where the battle was fought. Nearer is the village of Boonesborough, six miles from the battle-field of Antietam, which was filled with the wounded of both armies.

CRAMPTON'S GAP

is six miles to the south of Thornton's. Here Franklin's corps covered itself with glory. The position of the rebel army was much the same as at Thornton's, being posted on the hill-side, where its guns could command the approaches. Up the steep sides of the hill the brave soldiers of Slocum's division charged, driving first one, and then a second line of the rebels before them. The sketch shows how steep was the incline the soldiers had to climb in the face of the enemy, who in some places used a stone wall as a breast-work. On meeting the second line (seen in the picture, formed on a little mountain road) the Union line wavered. Colonel Bartlett (commanding a brigade in Slocum's division) started forward and led the soldiers to a fresh effort, so impetuous that the rebels were broken and driven over the crest of the mountain in utter rout. The general view of the scene shows where the rebel artillery was posted, and gives a good idea of the difficulties encountered in this battle, which M'Clellan speaks of as the battle of South Mountain.



THE COLONEL OF THE TWENTIETH NEW YORK VOLUNTEERS LEADING HIS REGIMENT AT THE BATTLE OF ANTIETAM.

The Twentieth Regiment, of which General Max Weber was originally Colonel, lost in the recent battle two hundred and forty men and nine officers at one time when it was necessary to charge up a slope against the rebels. The Colonel, Van Vegesark, took the flag, and galloping up the rise, led the Regiment to the crest of the hill amidst a very heavy fire. Strange to relate, the Colonel escaped uninjured.

THE FLAG OF TRUCE.

While the armies stood in line of battle grimly contemplating each other, neither one anxious to renew the engagement, unarmed parties under a flag of truce—which was suffered rather than granted—went about picking up the wounded who lay between the lines. The rebel ambulance corps, with pieces of white cloth on their hats, and our soldiers with white bands on their arms, mixed freely on the field. At one time some muskets were fired, whether by accident or design was not known; in an instant each army sprang into line, cannoneers in position, and all ready at once to renew the combat.

The little church in the sketch was badly peppered by the shot and shell, and its neighborhood was the scene of fearful slaughter. A Union officer, who was taken into it, wounded, by the rebels, had to lie there all through the fight, and was not injured by the shell.

THE NARROW ESCAPE.

"Carpet shoes are much needed in the hospitals." The remark was made in a city railroad car. Two ladies were conversing, and a third sat listening to what they were saying. The listener was quite young, a fair-faced girl, with soft brown eyes, whose countenance was full of interest. She was a stranger to the ladies, and therefore did not join in the conversation, but she took in every word.

At Chestnut Street she signed to the conductor, who stopped the car, and she left it, going down to the square below Ninth Street. In front of Evans's dry-goods store she paused for a moment, and then passed in. But after moving toward one of the counters a few paces, she stood still for an instant, as if in debate on some subject, and then, turning about, left the store. On regaining the street there was an apparent hesitating state of mind. She walked as far as Eighth Street, stood a little while on the corner, then retraced her steps as far as Evans's, paused there, turned toward the door as if resolved to enter; and then, as if the debate which had been going on in her mind had closed, passed up the street with a firm step and a resolved manner. A little while afterward she was in a carpet store inquiring the price of short remnants.

"For what purpose are they intended?" asked the dealer.

The fair face heightened in color with the almost timid answer—

"For carpet shoes. They are wanted in the hospitals."

"Ah!—well—in that case—let me see." The man considered for a little while. "How large a quantity did you propose getting?"

"I will lay out five dollars in this way." She spoke with regaining confidence.

"Very good. For five dollars you shall have more than ten dollars' worth. Where shall I send them?"

The address was given and the money paid.

"Back already!" As the maiden entered a plain but neat and well-furnished room she was greeted with this remark in a tone that expressed surprise. The speaker was a middle-aged woman with a calm, kind face.

"Yes. It didn't take long to get through with my shopping this morning."

"What did you buy, dear?"

"I don't know what you will think of me, Aunt Grace, but—" The young girl paused, not completing the sentence.

"But what, Edith?"

"Well, you see, Aunty dear"—and Edith leaned toward her relative, speaking in a tender, deprecating voice—"as I rode down in the cars I heard two ladies talking about the sick and wounded soldiers in our hospitals; and among other things they said that soft carpet shoes were wanted for the convalescents who were getting just strong enough to walk about in the wards. And so—now don't look soberly at me; don't say I am weak and impulsive—I spent my money for remnants of carpet instead of for gloves, ribbons, and under-sleeves. They'll be sent home in a little while, and I'm going to cut them all up into carpet shoes. Katy Dawes has a pattern—I saw her at work on some last week—and she'll show me just how to make them."

Edith paused, with her pure, earnest eyes full on her aunt's face, waiting for the answer to all this. Aunt Grace, in half surprise, mingled with pleasure, was already leaning toward her niece. Laying her hand gently on the head of Edith she said, in a voice slightly veiled with feeling,

"I have not a word of disapproval, my dear. When we obey suggestions of self-denial for the good of others we obey God. You have done well."

Tears came into Edith's eyes. She bent her head for a few silent moments; then rallying to full self-possession, she replied,

"I am glad you think I've done right. And now I'll put on my bonnet again and run around and see Katy Dawes about the pattern."

"You were just in my mind," said Katy, as her friend looked in upon her. "I've been wanting to see you all the morning. You don't know what a nice letter I've received from George! And, what do you think? He's been promoted again."

"You don't tell me so!"

"Yes, indeed! He went as a private. Not for honor nor pay, but with a brave, true heart to save his country. It was hard to let him go; but I would have loved him less if he had staid at home."

Edith sighed faintly. Her friend went on.

"He was wounded in the arm, you know, at Phillippi, and had to go to the hospital for a month. When he came out, well enough to rejoin his company, he found a second lieutenant's commission awaiting him, conferred for soldierly conduct and bravery in battle. Wasn't my heart proud! Didn't it seem for a while too large for my bosom!"

Another sigh parted the lips of Edith.

"And now he writes me that he is a first lieutenant."

"I am so pleased to hear of it," said Edith.

"Promoted again for bravery and good conduct," added Katy Dawes.

"No wonder you feel proud, dear Katy." Edith spoke in a slightly subdued voice, as if there were in her heart some drawback to the pleasure expressed.

The two young friends spent an hour together, during which time Edith acquired the art and mystery she had come to learn. From some cause she was not in the best of spirits when she returned home, and appeared disinclined to talk. At once she set about the work in hand, assisted by her aunt, and was soon fashioning the remnants of carpet into soft shoes for sick soldiers. Twilight stayed her busy fingers ere the day seemed half departed. During tea-time Edith's face wore an absorbed, almost troubled, expression, which her aunt did not fail to observe. After supper she resumed her work. Half an hour later the door-bell rung. The sound gave Edith a start, and her aunt noticed, in the pause which followed, that her hand slightly trembled.

"Mr. Loto," said the servant, coming in a few moments afterward.

"Say that I will be down."

The servant retired. Aunt Grace hardly recognized a familiar tone in the voice that made this answer. As Edith arose and left the room, taking her work with her, a paleness was visible in her face.

The young man who met her in the parlor was about twenty-three; stout, compactly built, and in robust health. He wore a full beard; the mustache carefully cut and slightly twisted at the ends. He moved quickly across the room to meet Edith as she came in, catching her free hand in both of his, and greeting her in words of tender familiarity. He would have been blind or stupid not to have noticed a strange impassiveness, or, we might say, coldness, in her manner. Still, he affected not to perceive this altered state, and said, lightly, as he seated himself beside her on a sofa,

"And pray what is this?" at the same time taking hold of the work in her hand.

"It is for the hospitals," replied Edith.

A slightly amused expression was seen in the young man's countenance as he lifted a half-made shoe and held it out before him.

"Oh! I see." And he dropped the article. He did not manifest contempt, or ridicule, or disapproval—only indifference.

"And now, Edith," he said, speaking with the pleased ardor of one who brings welcome intelligence, "I have some good news for you."

"Ah! what is it?" She fixed her soft brown eyes on him expectantly.

"I've escaped."

"Escaped what?"

"The enrollment," replied the young man.

"The enrollment? I'm not sure that I understand you."

"You know that they've been enrolling for the draft."

"Yes."

"Well, I've been nervous about it ever since the thing was ordered. If my name got down I knew it would be all over. The draft would take me, sure. That's my luck! So I set my wits to work to escape the enrollment, and have succeeded."

"Indeed!" The soft brown eyes grew large and round, parting with much of their softness.

"Yes. And I'll tell you how it was done." And the young man tried to get possession of one of Edith's hands; but she moved it out of his way.

"As soon as I learned that the enrolling officer was at work in our ward I got up a little breeze with my landlady—no hard matter at any time, for she has a quick temper—and under cover thereof left the house. Within an hour afterward I had my trunks removed. I take my meals at an eating-house and sleep at the store. Next week I will find a new boarding-house. I tell you all about it to relieve your mind. But don't speak of it for the world. If it gets out the marshal will order my arrest and put a musket in my hand for the war. I had a narrow escape, for the enrollment in our block was made on the day after I left."

"You are not the only one who has made a narrow escape, Mr. Loto." Edith's face was almost white; but her voice was deep and firm. She had drawn herself a little away from the young man and was looking at him sternly.

"Ah! who else has made an escape?"

"I have!"

"You?"

"I asked a week in which to consider your offer, Mr. Loto." Edith's tones did not falter. "If you had been a soldier in the field, or on the eve of marching to the defense of your imperiled country, I would have yielded this hand without an instant's hesitation. But your lack of courage or patriotism, I knew not which, made me hold back and question your fitness to be my husband. Now I know you to be unworthy. I might have looked past a natural shrinking from the hard and dangerous life of a soldier—excused you on the ground of constitutional impediments, if you will call them so—and on this plea accepted your failure to spring to the rescue when your country was assailed—still believing in your honor—still having faith in your will to do right no matter how stern the demand might be when it came clear and unmistakable. I can understand that there may be good reasons why one may hold away from the act of volunteering—and I gave you the benefit of this assumption. But when the danger becomes so imminent that an allotment has to be made for defense, only the meanest spirits seek to evade their duty. John Loto, I am speaking plainly, for I do not mean that you shall misunderstand me. Our ways part to-night never to touch again; and in parting I leave with you hard words that may do you good. Take my advice and give in your name to the enrolling officer. If drafted, go cheerfully and stand up with brave men for your country's safety. There is a worse thing than death—it is dishonor!"

He attempted, in a confused way, to reply; but Edith, who had arisen, waved her hand, saying:

"Leave me, Sir! The argument is closed. Our ways have parted, and they can not meet again!"

"I have passed through a great trial, aunt!" said Edith, in reply to anxious questions. Aunt Grace had found her, not long afterward, lying on a sofa in the parlor in a state of partial stupefaction. She had not been weeping. Her face was still very pale; her eyes had parted with their tender sweetness; her lips were almost rigid. On returning fully to herself she had made this answer.

"And come out purer and stronger, I trust. Is it so, dear Edith?" replied her aunt.

"Purer and stronger, if walking through pain to duty gives purity and strength," said Edith.

"Trial—pain—duty. These words include stern meanings, Edith. Mr. Loto is not here."

"And will never be here again, aunt. I have made a narrow escape."

"How?"

"The man who lacks honor, courage, and patriotism, is false to the heart's core."

"Does Mr. Loto lack them?"

"He has, on his own confession, by a mean trick evaded the enrollment."

"You fill me with surprise!"

"I was shocked. But strength and courage came to me. I rebuked him in strong, indignant language, and then told him that here and now our ways parted—parted forever. A coward and a poltroon for a husband! My whole nature rises in revolt."

The pale face grew crimson with the mounting blood, and the dull eye flashed with kindling fires.

"Poltroon is rather a coarse word for my Edith's lips," said Aunt Grace.

"Do you know its origin? Only yesterday, I read it in French, and the significance being in my mind, I could not repress the fitting term. When bows and arrows were among the chief weapons of semi-civilized European tribes and nations, it sometimes happened that a mean and cowardly fellow would cut off the forefinger or thumb of his right hand so as to unfit him for a soldier's duty. He was called, from the act, a poltroon—and the word has come into our language to express a mean-souled, cowardly fellow, who resorts to any trick or shift to escape from an unpleasant or dangerous duty. And so, under the impulse of strong feelings, I have called this man a poltroon. It is the fittingest word, in all our language, to express my present thought of him. Thank God for a narrow escape, dear aunt! I am wounded and bruised in the sudden sharp conflict through which I have passed—hurt inwardly—but not unto death. A little while, and my heart shall beat strong and evenly again. I did not love Mr. Loto for what he was, but for what I imagined him to be. The idol which I thought to be of gold, silver, and precious stones, is discovered to be of clay, and I sweep it from the pedestal of honor."

Edith laid her face down upon the bosom of her aunt. Her frame was trembling from excitement. In a little while the tremor ceased, and she grew very still—still and heavy. For nearly half an hour aunt and niece remained thus without speaking. Then Edith raised herself up slowly and wearily, and going to her own room, shut the door, and entering, alone, into her pain-stricken heart, commenced gathering up its rent fibres, and laying them back in safe places tenderly, that nature, assisted by time and repose, might heal them. For such wounds there is always balm.

AFTER THE BATTLE.

On pages 680 and 681 we publish a large picture of a Battle-field after the Battle—the rebels being left in possession. The following extract from a letter in the Times will serve to explain the picture:

To-day, taking advantage of the protection afforded by a flag of truce, which was granted for the purpose of removing the wounded and burying the dead who fell in the battles of Friday and Saturday, I visited the scene of those sanguinary conflicts. Passing out of our lines upon the Centreville Road, and crossing Bull Run Creek at Blackburn's Ford, the outer picket of our army in that direction was reached about two miles from the little hamlet dignified by the name of Centreville. All beyond this barrier, for two miles, was disputed ground, occupied by neither friend nor foe, to the advance picket of the rebel camp. Entering the rebel lines but a short distance evidences of the carnage of a recent deadly strife were to be seen far and near. On either hand were wounded soldiers, just able to drag themselves along at a slow pace by the aid of a cane or a friendly hand—men who had been captured after having been disabled in battle, now paroled and started for a more congenial and friendly camp. Dead horses, broken carriages, shot and shell, and here and there the dead body of a man, shattered trees, ambulances filled with the wounded, caps, equipments, and clothing scattered about—all bore unmistakable evidence of the sanguinary battle that had been fought. Turning to the left from the main-road, and riding perhaps a mile, the dead bodies of our soldiers were visible on every hand. Near this point the strife was hottest on Friday.

In the edge of a piece of timber in close proximity to the field, numerous tents were pitched for the temporary accommodation of our wounded, and where they were cared for by soldiers of our army acting as nurses, who nobly stood to their posts in the hour of trial, while our physicians for the most part abandoned their charge, leaving the bleeding, dying patriots to the tender mercies of a demoralized foe. The medicines left for the wounded were confiscated by the enemy, who refused to permit any portion of them to be used, and many of those left upon the field died because of this inhuman conduct. In plain view of the hospital tents, not fifty yards distant, the dead bodies of seventeen of our men had been placed, side by side, by the rebel soldiery, in full view of the wounded and suffering men, as if they took a fiendish delight in making the picture as shocking as possible. On one side of this field stood two squadrons of Stuart's cavalry formed in square, and standing and lying about the vicinity were large numbers of rebel soldiers, looking curiously at the strangers (?) within their camp; many of them illy concealing the brutal delight they experienced in viewing the scene before them.

A ride of a few minutes in a southeasterly direction, another field was reached, where the contest raged the fiercest on Saturday evening, and near the point where, in some unaccountable manner, our left wing gave way—by which the tide of battle was turned against us, and the day was lost, to be fought for again, it is to be hoped with far different results. This field presented a more ghastly sight, for in this vicinity it is estimated nearly two hundred of our dead were scattered about on the field and in the adjoining woods. The enemy holding the field the night after the scene of carnage had closed, aided by negroes, the officers gathered up their dead, and buried them in trenches, in some instances going so far as to cover the newly-disturbed earth with leaves and brushwood—all of which was evidently done to deceive their deluded followers, and those whom chance brought into the vicinity, as to the exact extent of their losses. The common instincts of humanity seem to have entirely left the breasts of a majority of the rebel soldiery, for they not only neglected to pay the customary attention to the brave dead of the Union army around them, but also violated the sanctity of death by robbing the lifeless bodies of coats, caps, shoes, jewelry, money, and all other valuables, and ignored the claims of the living also, who were suffering and within their power. We doubt if, of all the vast number who fell in the battles of Friday and Saturday, there was one who, dead or alive, was not robbed of every thing of value. Of the hundred or more bodies to be seen above the ground, there was not one whose pockets had not been rifled, and their shoes and other articles of clothing taken away.

The writer entered the enemy's lines especially to obtain the names of the wounded and prisoners in their hands. But he was peremptorily refused this privilege, and threatened with a Richmond prison for violating the flag of truce by taking the names of a few of the dead on the field. The same officer in an imperious manner said there was a Major or a Colonel "yonder," and perhaps I could identify him. We walked to the spot. The deceased had nothing on but pants, under-shirt, and socks; the pockets had been turned inside out, and every thing of value removed. In reply to the question, how he knew that it was a field-officer at all, our rebel companion suddenly became red in the face, and after hesitating a moment, stammered out that they supposed it was a field-officer. I told him in plain terms that the body had been robbed, and expressed my astonishment that such treatment of the gallant dead was permitted. He indignantly denied that it was permitted, but added, in a deprecating tone of voice, that the men could not be restrained.

THE PRESIDENT'S VISIT TO M'CLELLAN'S ARMY.

We publish on page 684 an illustration of the President's visit to Frederick. His journey through Maryland was one continuous and triumphant ovation, and will have the effect not only of teaching the rebels how little they gained by their last raid upon the affections of "My Maryland," but of convincing Northern traitors that henceforth we may count her as irrevocably fixed to the Union.

A vast concourse of people had assembled at the railway station at Frederick; and the President had no sooner got away from those who rushed to shake hands with him, and reached the train, than loud cries brought him to the platform of the rear carriage, to show himself and speak to his friends. This is the moment seized upon and illustrated by our artist. The President, in a clear voice, and with that honest, good-natured manner for which he is so noted, spoke as follows:

Fellow-Citizens,—I see myself surrounded by soldiers and by the citizens of this good city of Frederick, all anxious to hear something from me. Nevertheless, I can only say—as I did elsewhere five minutes ago—that it is not proper for me to make speeches in my present position. I return thanks to our gallant soldiers for the good service they have rendered, the energies they have shown, the hardships they have endured, and the blood they have so nobly shed for this dear Union of ours. And I also return thanks, not only to the soldiers, but to the good citizens of Frederick, and to all the good men, women, and children throughout this land for their devotion to our glorious cause. And I say this without any malice in my heart toward those who have done otherwise. May our children, and our children's children, for a thousand generations, continue to enjoy the benefits conferred upon us by a united country, and have cause yet to rejoice under those glorious institutions bequeathed us by Washington and his compeers! Now, my friends—soldiers and citizens—I can only say once more—Farewell!

OUR ARMY IN FLORIDA.

We reproduce on page 685 two pictures by a volunteer correspondent with General Mitchell's army, illustrating the recent Capture of a Fort on St. John's Bluff, Florida. Our correspondent writes:

Hilton Head, October 5, 1862.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Inclosed I send you a couple of rough sketches of scenes in the last expedition from here—Mayport Mills, the place where the land forces disembarked, and St. John's Bluff Battery, consisting of eleven guns. The expedition started from here on 1st inst., General Brannan commanding, on board the Ben De Ford, the troops on board the Cosmopolitan, Boston, and Neptune. The navy was represented by the Paul Jones, flag-ship, Port Royal, Uncas, Semirona, Patroon, and S. B. Hale, all under command of O. E. Stedman. The troops disembarked on the 2d at the Mills, and marched for the battery, about eight miles distant, but were compelled to return owing to an unfordable creek; while the naval squadron sailed up to the battery, and the Paul Jones opened fire on it, receiving replies occasionally; and having ascertained the calibre of their guns returned, but started again next morning; while the infantry, having again landed on the opposite side of the creek, took up their line of march, the Forty-seventh Pennsylvania, Colonel Good, taking the lead, and surprising a camp of cavalry, who made good their escape.

In the mean time the naval squadron, having arrived opposite the fort, about four P.M. opened fire upon it; but receiving no reply, a boat was sent ashore, and the fort was found to be completely abandoned, upon which the "Old Flag" was raised amidst much cheering from all hands. Upon arriving there, about 5 P.M., the Forty-seventh took possession of the late rebel stronghold.

GENERAL WADSWORTH

On page 685 we publish a portrait of General James S. Wadsworth, the Union candidate for Governor of New York. As there is little or no doubt of his election, we have thought our New York readers would like to see the features of their next Governor.

James S. Wadsworth is the son of James Wadsworth, of Geneseo, and is himself a resident of the same place, and the richest man there. He has never filled any public office, and once only, we believe, came before the public previously to the present war. That was during the famine in Ireland, when he sent the Irish a ship-load of food. When the war broke out he was one of those who apprehended a deficiency of supplies for the troops who were hurrying to the defense of the capital; and accordingly, without waiting for orders, authority, or money from Government, he chartered a steamer here, filled her with provisions, and sent her to Annapolis, going himself as supercargo. How much suffering this prompt action of his may have saved it is hardly possible to say. But the Government and the troops so appreciated it that General Wadsworth was at once appointed an Aid-de-camp to General M'Dowell, with the rank of Colonel. In that capacity he participated in the Battle of Bull Run. He was shortly afterward appointed Brigadier-General, and placed in command of Washington as Military Governor, which post he has filled with energy and judgment.

In his letter of acceptance to the Convention General Wadsworth said:

I think I can not be mistaken in assuming that the election will turn upon the necessity of sustaining our national Government in its effort to uphold itself, and maintain its territorial integrity, and especially upon the proclamation of the President, issued to that end, and referred to in the fourth resolution of the Convention.

I entirely approve of that proclamation, and commend it to the support of the electors of New York for the following reasons:

1. It is an effectual aid to the speedy and complete suppression of this rebellion.

Six or eight millions of whites, having had time to organize their government and arm their troops, fed and supported by the labor of four millions of slaves, present the most formidable rebellion recorded in history.

Strike from this rebellion the support which it derives from the unrequited toil of these slaves, and its foundation will be undermined.

2. It is the most humane method of putting down the rebellion, the history of which has clearly proved that the fears of slave insurrections and massacres are entirely unfounded. While the slaves earnestly desire freedom, they have shown no disposition to injure their masters; they will cease to work for them without wages, but they will form throughout the Southern States the most peaceful and docile peasantry on the face of the earth.

The slaveowners once compelled to work for their own support the war must cease, and its appalling carnage come to an end.

3. The emancipation once effected, the Northern States would be forever relieved, as it is right that they should be, from the fears of a great influx of African laborers, disturbing the relations of those Northern industrial classes who have so freely given their lives to the support of the Government.

This done, and the whole African population will drift to the South, where it will find a congenial climate and vast tracts of land never yet cultivated.

I forbear to enter into the discussion of the great increase of trade to the Northern States and the whole commercial world which would result from the wants of four millions of free and paid laborers over the same number held as heretofore in slavery.

I forbear also to enter into the question of the ultimate vast increase in the production of the great Southern staples. This is not a time to consider questions of profit. It will long be remembered, to the great honor of the merchants, bankers, and manufacturers of the North, that giving the lie to the calumnies of slave-breeding aristocrats, who charge them with being degraded and controlled by the petty profits of traffic, they have met the numerous sacrifices of this great struggle with a cheerfulness and promptness of which history furnishes no parallel.

Nor is the question now before us one of philanthropy alone, sacred as are the principles therein involved; nor is it a question of abstract ideas, involving an unprofitable discussion of the equality of races. It is simply a question of war, of National life or death, and of the mode in which we can most surely and effectually uphold our Government and maintain its unity and supremacy.

Our foreign enemies, for it is not to be disguised that we have such, reproach us with waging a territorial war. So we do; but that territory is our country. For maintaining its greatness and power among the nations of the earth, by holding it together, they hate us. We can bear it; but if we were to yield to their suggestions, and submit to its dismemberment, they would forever despise us.

This Great domain, from the lakes to the gulf, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, one country; governed by one idea —freedom—is yet destined to dictate terms, if need be, to the world in arms, and I hold that man to be a traitor and a coward, who, under any defeats, any pressure of adversity however great, any calamities however dire, would give up one acre of it.

BUELL'S ARMY ON THE MARCH.

WE publish on page 684 a picture which represents BUELL'S ARMY CROSSING SALT RIVER, KENTUCKY, from a sketch by Mr. Mosler. The bridge over the river was destroyed some time since, but the water is so low that it was easily forded, and as soon as Buell's skirmishers cleared the way the army crossed in heavy column. The result of the expedition, or at least one of its results, will be found recorded in another column.

THE REBEL BISHOP-GENERAL POLK.

THE debates in the Episcopal House of Bishops on the subject of the rebel BISHOP-GENERAL POLK, have induced us to present our readers with a portrait of the personage in question on page 685.

Leonidas Polk was born in North Carolina about the year 1805. He entered West Point in 1823, and graduated in the artillery in 1827. Six months' service in the army quenched his military aspirations, and resigning his commission he studied for the Church. In 1831 he was ordained an Episcopal minister, and officiated regularly in the Southwest for seven years. In 1838 he was appointed "Missionary Bishop" of Arkansas and the Indian Territory, and discharged the functions of that office for three years. In 1841, the Episcopal See of Louisiana falling vacant, he was elected to fill it, and continued to do so until the rebellion broke out. He sympathized so ardently with the rebel leaders that he was induced in an evil moment to resign his bishopric, and accepted from Jeff Davis a commission in the rebel army as Major-General. His service has chiefly been in the Southwest. He was in command for some time at Columbus, Kentucky, and took part in the Battle of Shiloh. His present station we hardly know.

Report says that since Bishop Polk became a soldier he has doffed the decent manners of the episcopate for the habits of a trooper—that he drinks, swears, etc., etc.

BURIED ALIVE.

MY name is Karoly Varga. I worked in the salt-mines, as my father and brother do, and as my grandfather did, and his father before him. On the 17th August, 1723, I dressed myself as usual and descended into the mine, taking with me a box of candles, which were to be used for a purpose I shall mention presently. My orders were to make a careful examination of the arches that had been erected, and the blocks that had been placed round the pools of water to prevent the expected visitors from falling in, for it was intended to give a concert and entertainment in honor of the director of the mine and his wife, who would complete twenty-five years of married life on the twenty-fifth day of the month mentioned. I had also to select a place in which to establish the orchestra, of which I was myself one of the members, the rest having deputed me to make this choice in consequence of my experience in working the mine, care being always requisite in choosing the position, from the danger of the vibration causing a fall. Having performed the first part of my duty I climbed up into a gallery, which had been cut long before the mine had reached its present depth, to select the position in which the orchestra was to establish itself. The spot that seemed most suitable was a recess, lofty at the entrance but of no great depth. Its shape was so good for the purpose that I fetched the box of candles and put it in the recess ready for use. It was not till I had done this that it occurred to me to sound my horn and try the effect produced. I blew it first at the entrance, then drew back farther and farther, sounding it at intervals, knowing there were others in the mine who would be able to tell me what the effect was in that part where the company would be assembled. I was standing at the very bottom of the cave, and was in the act of drawing a deep breath to sound a final blast, when I was stopped by a pattering sound which paralyzed me, and before I was myself again there was a fall of earth and salt, lumps of which rolled to my feet. I had a lighted torch beside me, and with this I examined the fall to see if there was any opening for escape, but there was none, the recess being blocked up to the roof. I thought I might call the attention of my fellow-miners to my position by blowing my horn, but the only result of my doing so was to cause another fall. I laid it down to think over my position, and calculate my chance of escape. I hoped that, as they would be certain to miss me within a few hours, there might be something in the slip to attract their attention. Hour after hour passed over without my hearing a sound, except that caused by the earth crumbling down as it settled into a firmer mass. The torch I had extinguished long since, to save myself from being suffocated by the smoke, and instead of it I had lighted a candle, but this melted away in a few minutes owing to the air being so hot. I was now in total darkness. The air was filled with particles of salt, which stung my eyes and made the inside of my mouth, and nose, and my throat smart painfully, besides exciting a sensation of intense thirst. As for hunger, it was long before I felt it, and when I did I had a ready means at hand for assuaging it, in the box of tallow, which, disgusting as it would have been at any other time, was a treasure to me now. There was another comforting circumstance, that air made its way to the little hollow in which I was confined: where from I could not tell, but it was sufficient in quantity to prevent me from being suffocated, though breathing was a matter of great difficulty and pain. I soon began to feel sleepy, and stretched myself on the ground, but whether I slept only a few minutes or several hours I have no idea; and so the early part of my imprisonment passed away.

All this time nothing had occurred to show that any body had discovered the place where I was buried, though I was sure I must have been missed long since. Then, for the first time, I was seized with a hopeless dread. I became intensely cold, my heart almost ceased to beat, and my tongue and the roof of my mouth became dry and hard, as if it had been burned with a red-hot iron. I curled myself in a heap on the ground, and for a time was insensible. When I again grew conscious my sufferings were much aggravated. A burning heat was gnawing at my body from head to foot. The feeling is indescribable and can not be imagined. I knew that the salt was getting into my blood, and that I must soon go raving mad if I could not keep it out of my lungs. I ate as much of the tallow as I could, or rather I put it in my mouth and let it run down my throat. This relieved me very much, and I then tore a piece off my dress and fastened it across my mouth and nose, which added to the difficulty of breathing, but kept the larger particles of salt from entering my lungs. I also found that the air was better when I was standing than when I was lying down, and from thenceforth I stood with my back resting against the side of the cave, as much as my strength allowed me. Before this I had tried to remove the earth nearest the roof, but I could find nothing to encourage me to persevere, and the exertion was so painful, and the clouds of salt dust raised were so thick, notwithstanding that I placed every handful I took out carefully at the bottom of the heap, that I desisted, thinking it better to bear my sufferings as patiently as I could till my situation was discovered than to render it worse by vain efforts to escape from it. But as they continued to increase I determined to make another attempt, whatever the consequence might be. I grouped about till I found the hole I had made, and began to rake out the earth with my hands, but with less precaution than before, for I had now become desperate, and would gladly have died to have been released from my misery. The salt forced itself through the cloth over my face, penetrated to my lungs, and caused me such torture as no words can describe. I dashed myself against the sides of my prison, I beat my head against the rock, but I was unconscious of pain from so doing; life seemed raging within me with greater strength and intensity than I had ever felt before, and it seemed to me that I could move a mountain by my own strength alone. I thrust my head and shoulders into the hole I had made, and tried to burrow my way through like a mole, and when I could endure this no longer I threw myself on the ground and rolled and writhed. In imagination I screamed and cried, but in truth I could utter no sound. I prayed, oh! how fervently I prayed, for death, but it would not come. Then I swallowed some of my provisions, and this gave me relief for a time, but only for a time, for the same tortures began again very soon, followed by a repetition of my frantic attempts at self-destruction. If I could have abstained from the only thing that gave me relief my torments must soon have been at an end; but the very intensity of my pain forced me, against my will, to resort to it. Thus my sufferings went on ebbing and flowing, but, like the rising tide, always mounting.

I was in this dreadful condition when I heard the sound of music. At first I thought it must be my imagination, that I was at last going mad. Then, as it continued, I remembered the concert in honor of the director. I searched about for my horn, and when the music was silent, I raised it to my lips and tried to sound it: I might as well have attempted to rend the rock asunder which cut me off from the light; my dry and cracked lips would not fit themselves to the instrument, and the little air my lungs were still capable of expelling wasted itself soundlessly. In my madness I beat it furiously against the ground, I bit and gnawed it, and, finally, I dashed it down, and seizing handfuls of the dirt, I thrust it into my mouth in vain efforts to choke myself. Again and again the music was renewed, but at last it ceased altogether, and I knew that I was once more alone in the mine.

I afterward learned that, during the concert, one of the miners in wandering through the old workings noticed a mark on the rock where I had cleared the head of the torch. The freshness of this mark drew his attention to the fall of earth, and though he was not able to distinguish whether this fall was of recent or old date, he pointed it out to others, and they determined to clear it away, that my body, if it were beneath it, might receive Christian burial. The next day the director gave them a fête in return for their entertainment, and the following day being Sunday, it was not till the succeeding day they began digging for me, which was the twelfth day of my imprisonment. On that evening I was released and carried out of the mine.

My appearance at this time was frightful. Every hair had fallen from me, my eyes had disappeared, and my body, from head to foot, was covered with crystals of salt. I was laid in warm water and kept there: warm and cold water was given me to drink as often as I could swallow it, and my sufferings soon began to diminish. In time they became endurable, but they have never left me altogether, and I shall always be a poor, blind, suffering creature such as I am now.

Lyon's Kathairon.
This delightful article for preserving and beautifying the human hair is again put on by the original proprietor, and is now made with the same care, skill, and attention, which first created its immense and unprecedented sale of over one million bottles annually! It is still sold at 25 cents in large bottles. Two million bottles can easily be sold in a year if there is a single person who finds Kathairon useful. Only the most delightful hair dressing in the world. It is the only article ever discovered that will restore gray hair to its natural color, and it will forever prevent the hair from turning gray. These are considered the only facts worthy of notice. The Kathairon has been tested for over twelve years, and is warranted as described. Any lady who values a beautiful head of hair will use the Kathairon. It is finely perfumed, cheap and valuable. It is sold by all respectable dealers throughout the world.

THE TOWN OF PERRYVILLE, KENTUCKY, SCENE OF THE RECENT BATTLE.—SKETCHED BY MR. H. MOSLER.—[SEE PAGE 695.]

THE PIRATE "ALABAMA," ALIAS "290," CERTIFIED TO BE CORRECT BY CAPTAIN HAGAR OF THE "BRILLIANT."—[SEE PAGES 690 AND 699.]

THE PIRATE "ALABAMA."

THE picture of this famous pirate, which will be found on the preceding page, has been attentively examined by Captain Hagar of the Brilliant, and pronounced correct. He has kindly given to the following certificate of the fact:

I have seen the drawing of the Alabama which will appear in the next number of Harper's Weekly, and pronounce it a correct picture.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1862.

THE REBEL ENTERPRISE IN KENTUCKY.

THE smoke is clearing away from the scene of the campaign in Kentucky, and we are at length beginning to understand the mysterious movements of Buell and Bragg.

When Mr. Lincoln called for a new levy of 600,000 men it was evident to the Southern leaders that, unless they could achieve decisive successes before that new levy was brought into the field armed and disciplined, their cause was gone. The fact, therefore, went forth that the defensive policy must be abandoned, and that Northern States invaded. At that time General Bragg was at Chattanooga, General Buell within 20 miles of him, each with an army of some 35,000 men. For some time past Buell's object had been to manœuvre Bragg out of Chattanooga, which then appeared to be the key to the whole country, and which, by the way, it still remains. In August last, to the astonishment of Buell, Bragg evacuated that city, and moved rapidly northward in the direction of Nashville. Rapidly comprehending the movement, Buell likewise abandoned the city which he had so long contended, and marched northward on a parallel line to Bragg. Being nearer to Nashville than his enemy, he arrived there first, and the capital of Tennessee was saved. Bragg, perceiving that he was foiled, shifted his line of march to the eastward, and entered Kentucky, where John Morgan and Kirby Smith, with the armies of Eastern Tennessee, had been operating for some little time previous.

This was the situation at the middle of September. Buell's one object of Bragg was to save Louisville and Cincinnati there can be now no doubt whatever. Buell had to choose between moving outwardly upon Louisville, and ward Louisville on a parallel line to his enemy, with the advantage which he had previously enjoyed on the march to Nashville, of being nearer the point they both wished to reach. He chose the latter, with evident wisdom, and reached Louisville in time. Bragg's army being nearly two days' march from the place when Buell's advance-guard entered it. Buell's entry into Louisville was evidently the turning-point in the campaign. Foiled in both his objects, having taken neither Nashville nor Louisville, Bragg had now no choice but to retreat from whence he came. Buell, on the other hand, was free to pursue him with a largely increased army, freshly equipped and supplied. He commenced the pursuit accordingly, dividing his army in pitch a way, and directing them to march by such roads as, in the opinion of competent judges, rendered it likely that Bragg might be surrounded.

This plan failed, owing, it is said, to the disobedience of a corps commander, who could not resist the temptation of giving battle, at Perryville, with his single corps, to the whole rebel army. The consequence was that Bragg made good his escape in the direction of Cumberland and Big Barren Mountains, with his artillery and most of his stores.

Take it all in all, it must be admitted that the rebel enterprise in Kentucky has failed. Bragg has not succeeded in the great objects he had in view—the capture of Nashville or Louisville. He has not received the decisive reinforcements which the rebel leaders deemed it essential to achieve before our new levies were in the field. He has not wrested from us and permanently held any single point. He has overrun and plundered the finest region of Kentucky, but this will have no more influence upon the result of the war than the raids of the pirate "290."

It is a little remarkable that, while a large number of journals and politicians at the North have been reviling Buell for not fighting Bragg, the rebel papers are equally severe on Bragg for not fighting Buell. The probability is that both Generals acted for the best. If Buell had fought Bragg in Southern Tennessee, or again in Southern Kentucky, and had been defeated, Louisville and Kentucky would inevitably have been lost. And the forces of the two Generals were so nearly matched that no one can tell what might have been the issue of a battle. If Bragg had been routed in Southern Tennessee nothing could have saved Chattanooga, Rome, and Knoxville to the Confederacy.

The Richmond Examiner is especially severe on Bragg for being "too slow," and for allowing Buell so constantly to "outstrip him in the race." To which it may be hardly set against the oft-repeated complaints of our journals about Buell being "too slow." The fact is that both Generals marched very fast indeed, but Buell having the shorter distance to run, won the race. And the practical result of the campaign is, that the rebels have not, or are being, expelled from Kentucky, where they have left a record which will make them execrated for generations.

LEE, BEAUREGARD, AND M'CLELLAN.

No one who reads the voluminous Reports of Scott's Generals in Mexico can fail to observe the frequency with which special honor-able mention is made of three young officers of the Engineers. In his first dispatch, giving an account of the capture of Vera Cruz, General Scott, after ascribing the success of this operation mainly to the Engineers, says, "Of it there he any thing in the form, position, and arrangement of the trenches and batteries, or in the manner of conducting the siege, is due to the ability, devotion, and unremitting zeal of these officers." Prominent among these specially commended are "Captain Lee, Chief Lieutenant P. G. T. Beauregard, and Brevet Second Lieutenant George B. M'Clellan."

Lee and Beauregard had the special favorite of the veteran General, and there is hardly a single dispatch in which his name is not honorably mentioned. But this was owing, no doubt, to the fact that, as he was highest in rank, the direct execution of the more important duties was committed to him. In the case of subordinate officers the names of Beauregard and M'Clellan, with special commendations of their skill and ability, occur with about equal frequency. We have noted nearly thirty instances of honorable mention of each of their names; and that of Lee, as might be so frequently mentioned, mainly by Scott himself.

In reading the reports of the battles in Mexico, and remembering the positions now occupied by the various officers, some curious coincidences are found. Thus Magruder gives especial credit to Sumner, and Sumner to Magruder. "The Rifles were accompanied throughout by the distinguished young Lieutenants Beauregard and Smith, and M'Clellan, of the Engineers, in command of a portion of the Engineer corps; all, I am happy to say, bore themselves with the greatest gallantry."

At Churubusco M'Clellan was under the immediate command of Lieutenant G. W. Smith, subsequently Major-General commanding in New York, and now one of the "Generals," the highest rank in the Confederate service, superior to Major-General, and nearly corresponding to Marshal in the French army. Smith is especially warm in his commendation of M'Clellan. He says: "Lieutenant M'Clellan, Topographical Engineer, and several times in command of the Engineer Company, is entitled to the highest praise for his cool and intelligent conduct in the actions in the 17th and 20th." And again:

"The Rifles, with Captain Lee of the Engineers, were reconnoitring the same works, and had gone to our right considerably further from the battery than we were." M'Clellan was directed to attend the proper officials, and reported that Lee was engaged with a superior force. "I ordered Lieutenant M'Clellan," continues Smith, "to report to Captain Lee, and continue to General Twiggs. He did so, and on the recommendation of Lieutenants Stevens and M'Clellan, in which I concurred, the Engineer of artillery was ordered to support the Rifles. I have every reason to be satisfied with the daily gallantry of Lieutenants G. B. M'Clellan and J. G. Foster, and am much indebted to them for the valuable assistance which they rendered their arduous duties on the 19th and 20th of August."

At Churubusco M'Clellan was also under the immediate command of Smith, who, in his report to Captain Mackall (the Confederate General Mackall, we suppose, who was killed near Corinth), says: "To Lieutenant G. B. M'Clellan, of the Engineer Company, I am indebted for the most important services, both as engineer and as a company officer. His daring gallantry, always conspicuous, was never more clearly shown than on this occasion. Operating most of the time separately, I relied implicitly on his judgment in all matters where I was not present, and am happy to say that the result in every case justified his decisions."

The careful reader of the whole series of dispatches cannot help observing that in Mexico Will come to the conclusion that the three men who, after the veteran commanding General, displayed the highest military talents were the three young officers of Engineers, Lee, Beauregard, and M'Clellan. Beauregard has not, on the whole, justified his early promise in as high a degree as the others; though it may be doubtful whether the reason is not to be found in the jealousy of the Confederate authorities rather than in any want of capacity on his part. Lee and M'Clellan are now virtually at the head of the two armies of the North and the South, and by the ultimate issue consist of both which they are the most capable men to fill these posts. So far as we can now judge, from the combined reports of the Generals, their operations in which they have been pitted against each other, M'Clellan has shown himself the superior. His campaign in the Peninsula resulted unfortunately, it is true, but the unanimous verdict of the country is that this was owing to his plunk being thwarted by men without any competent military knowledge. The success of his operations in Maryland, where he has had uncontrolled authority, vindicates the highest claim for military genius which his friends have ever advanced for him.

SCHOOL-BOOK LITERATURE.

THERE was a time—and fully within the memory of the oldest inhabitant—when it was thought that the publication of a book would necessarily be school purposes, and when, consequently, the little that there was of the publishing business was confined to the issue of the hardest crusts and the dryest morsels imaginable. Those only who can go back with us to that school-days, can appreciate the change for the better which a single generation has seen. Now the very best books, both in point of style and of mere mechanism—the best talent is employed in compiling them; the best artists in illustrating them, and the "getting up" in some of the neatest, most attractive, and most substantial kind. The first expense—the outlay—to publishers is very considerable, but the profits, in market for a really good school-book—and none but such are ever likely to succeed—is, indeed, almost illimitable.

We have been led to these remarks by an examination of the series of truly splendid "School and Family Charts," twenty-two in number, prepared by Messrs. William and Charles Leypoldt, and published by Mr. Appleton. Nothing equal to them—whether as to attractiveness or adaptation—is in existence in the entire range of works for primary instruction, either in the Old World or in the New. The early numbers connected with Reading Lessons for instructors upon the "object" system—a high type sufficiently large to be easily read twenty feet distant; then succeeding ones on Colored Sounds, Phonetic Writing, Drawing, Lines and Measures, Forms, Solids, Colors, Quadrupeds, Birds, Reptiles, Fishes, Plants, etc., etc., the whole embracing more than six hundred colored illustrations! And though so costly in getting up, and a wonderful cheapness of art, the low price at which they are sold—nine dollars for a complete set, mounted—places them within the reach of every family and every school. An accompanying Manual of Instruction by Mr. William, the author of the well-known series of "School and Family Readers," gives the information and the directions for their use. Every family in which there are children to be educated, and every school, should have a set of these Charts and a copy of the Manual.

THE LOUNGER

THE ABOLITIONISTS.

THERE is no word more frequently and angrily used and less understood than the word Abolitionist. President Lincoln and Daniel S. Dickinson, Governor Johnson and Governor Andrew, Thurlow Weed and Fitzhugh Lee, Phillips, are all called by the same name. Of course there is but one point upon which all these agree, and that is a truly vigorous prosecution of the war. But that is not abolitionism. Emancipation as a means of war may be justifiable, and all of them, I am not abolitionists. The word Abolitionist designates a party in the country whose principles and influence have never been correctly estimated, because its members have been too much hated to be fairly treated. They have taken the honest pains to know what they thought or what they proposed. It has been enough that they were said to be abolitionists. Not a bill of abolitionists, or why disunionists, have not been questions thought to be worth the asking, although the politicians have never cut their late companions Abolitionists, because they would be sure to get into the other camp and help insist upon the Union at every cost; and which they said the more deadly disunionists at the South "erring brethren."

But the history of these times will have to deal differently with the facts, the influences, and the characters which are summarily classed as "Abolitionists." For nearly to call the name of one of Abolitionists a handful of fanatics, incendiaries, and agitators, explains them and their work as much as Sydney Smith's sneering accounts of Methodism and the Methodists, or Hume's description of Cromwell and the Independents, is no more. It is certainly not very complimentary to the Abolitionists to say that they have been fanatics at the North called Abolitionists, and a few other fanatics at the South called Secessionists, who have brought about the present unnatural civil war. If the individual James Otis had held his tongue would there have been no Revolution? If John Hampden had paid the ship-money would the Stuarts to-day be Kings of England? James Otis and John Hampden were but men who spoke for fundamental and decisive principles. When those ideas were in play there was never incredulity. If fifty Abolitionists and as many Secessionists had been hung, think many, there would have been no trouble. But do you think that if Luther had been hung there would have been no Reformation? In what conceivable way was Luther strong or successful but in being the mouth of those who believed as he did? Unless you could have hung the instinct of popular liberty in England in 1640, or the same instinct in America in 1770, you would have struck but one soldier of an army in striking Hampden or Otis. Unless you could kill Protestantism you might as well spare Luther. And unless you can hang abolitionism you will hang Abolitionists in vain.

Correctly speaking, the Abolitionists were, in our history, a single party of protest. They were strong; who held that the Constitution favored it; and that as the system was sure to corrupt the whites as well as inferior it had no business to hope for either but in the change of the Constitution. And the limitation of the Union of which it was the bond. But they proposed that the change should be effected peacefully and legally, by common consent; and to that end they referred to show what they considered the ultimate danger and present wrong of the Constitution. This was their "agitation." They opposed violence of every kind. They were, many of them, non-resistants. They did not vote, for to vote was to acknowledge what they thought a wicked Constitution. They did not approve the method, but only the purpose of John Brown; and they said to the rest of us, "You who believe in force have no right to blame him for helping others to do what you yourselves for doing in the Revolution." They believed that insurrective emancipation was desirable, but they stated as their duty the necessity of following public opinion through that perfect freedom of discussion which the Constitution guaranteed. Some among them—but very few—were more vehement, and sometimes attempted to resist the law, as in Boston at the rendition of Anthony Burns and Liberty-bills, although the Abolitionists approved and had originated those laws, were the Abolitionists in which no Abolitionist sat, because no Abolitionist could swear to support the Constitution and the laws of the United States.

Abolitionism, justly understood, was thus a purely moral power. It sought a result to be effected by moral means only, by vituperative, and denunciative; but as has every party been. In this sense they were a party of the higher duties to worldly ambition, and accepted the contumely heaped upon them by both the great parties in the country. Because they were unpopular they received the same or suspicion of abolitionism. And justly. For the Democratic party political alliance with slavery, and the Republicans differed fundamentally from the Abolitionists in their interpretation of the Constitution. The Democrat held it to be a bond of slavery; the former of liberty. The Abolitionists thought that the history of the country was in evidence from the Constitution. The Republicans believed that the Slavery question could be settled peacefully by a constitutional change of the Constitution.

They were right. For it was the clear perception of the slave interest that it could be so settled—a fact of which Mr. Lincoln's election was the example—that lured the slave interest to destroy the Constitution. Philosophically, the difference between the Republicans and the Abolitionists was one of political economy, not of moral sentiment. But in human affairs a difference of method is radical. The Republicans were for preserving the present Constitution not the Union. But they deplored the false interpretation of the one and the prostitution of the other. They were for the Union at any price that could save both. Consequently they were all of them loyal to the Union. They did not threaten it unswerving Unionists. They did not threaten to rebel if they were not successful at the polls, and they severely condemned all who assented to such threats. For they held it to be a popular government to right even the worst wrongs. And their faith is justified.

There is no more interesting chapter of our history than that known as Abolitionism, which is so misunderstood. It was the utterance of the whole continent. To call it fanaticism, and consider that a final and satisfactory explanation, is as ludicrous as for the Athenian Assembly to call Pericles a sophist or a heretic.

OLD LETTERS.

To show a private letter written at the moment of the struggle, in cases of great importance, or to establish and expose fraud, or some other purpose of general advantage, is sometimes very commendable, and very rare. But at a late party political meeting a letter was read which was said to have been written by Mr. Seward a year ago last March, and which was confessedly made public without General Scott's authority. If the letter was written, as is believed, at Scott's opinion, the wisest way for the new administration was to say that it was always understood to rebel, "with word sisters, depart in peace!"

As to the letter itself, there are two things to be said. First, that General Scott is a soldier and not a statesman; and that his advice, under the circumstances, was probably as safe as he would think it worth while to try to defend its existence, a young and able general, with 500,000 disciplined troops, and $250,000,000, and with enormous waste of life and property, would be essential, and, after all, might be no good. Secondly, considering that in March, 1861, therefore, as a soldier, was that the Union could not be maintained by force against the South, General Scott changed his opinion in July, 1861, does not appear.

The second thing to be said upon the letter is that it by no means follows that a man's views are the same now that they were upon the eve of Mr. Lincoln's inauguration. Multitudes of the bravest and best men in the army, who have relinquished all to fight for the Government, are now ready to die or liberty under law, who believe, with General Corcoran, that it is an "accursed rebellion," unbelievably held the views that General Scott expresses at the time when he wrote the letter. General Corcoran himself was unquestionably of that opinion. But his exact conviction on this point—how just representatives pledged to a vigorous prosecution of the war" should be sent to Congress. General John Cochrane made a famous speech at Richmond in the early spring of 1861. But General Cochrane, late in the autumn of the same year, declared for the most radical military measures against rebellion.

Suppose that some politician should now quote what General Corcoran privately said, and when General Cochrane certainly acted, and on the same day when General Scott's letter was written, as arguments for the surrender of the Government to the rebellion, would it be an honest and creditable reply to point to the acts and words of those men now? What General Scott thought and said and knew the rebellion can not be fairly quoted as counsel for surrender at this. The difference between Mr. Seymour, in whose hall letter was read aloud by Mr. Van Buren, and such Democrats as General Corcoran and Cochrane, and General Scott and M'Clernand, and, probably, M'Clellan, is that although they hoped the rebellion might be avoided, when it came they knew no party, no cause, no hope, but its overwhelming suppression; while Mr. Seymour, who wished to surrender to it before it had struck a blow, now wishes to yield to it after it has slain unnumbered thousands of our best and bravest. But the national Government and the rebels could not effect, even with Mr. Seymour's assistance, before they fired at the flag, they are not likely to achieve, still when they have fired, merely because they are smeared all over with the blood of our brothers.

A LUDICROUS APPREHENSION.

This apprehension which a few people seriously felt, and which the rebel press sometimes affected to regard as to the effect of the President's Proclamation upon the army, was, in the nature of things, utterly groundless. If an army is marching on a city: if it has been before it for a year and a half: if it has encountered the enemy in the most sanguinary contests: if the hostility it intends and the enemy's conduct behaviour: does any sane man suppose that that army will become suddenly demented and mutinous because it hears that the city has been missed, or that the enemy's supplies have been cut off, and that they have been summoned to surrender or to abide the consequences? What is the army there for? Is it not to do the most effective force the surrender of the enemy? Could a man be heard for the loud laughter of the camp, who should overhear a body soberly debating how to operate the enemy to mine their city and cut off their supplies? Is it supposed that soldiers will be wounded, killed, and mangled by shot and shell without exasperation upon their part?

Yes, reply the objectors: then you see it isn't constitutional.

What isn't constitutional? Is it constitutional to break the key of rebels but not to kill them? Is it constitutional to march to subdue them, but not to make them pay the expense? Is it constitutional to fight them with Columbiads but not with Parrott guns? Is it constitutional to kill them with minnie but not with shell? Is it constitutional way of making war upon rebels, and by rule constitutional ways to kill them and to destroy wives at once and with every means you can command. You may blockade them and cut off all their food and supplies. You may drive them to battle and slay until they yield or retreat. You may shell them out of their forts and cities. You may withdraw from their service as many men and hands as you can induce to leave them. You may destroy the squadrons of steamers that ply to their cities, and the trains that carry bread and salt. This is war. This is the organized and brute force. When the rebels invited war they invited this. They are having it, and so are we.

But if we are and feel this kind of war, soldiers too? They who have seen their comrades gashed and torn and slaughtered; who have heard the taunts of the enemy for the fate that was in store for who have seen the rebels shooting our men as they carried water to their companions wounded and dying: who have found the carved bones of their friends and cousins in the camp of the rebels; and who know that this bloody effort is against their country, and to ruin all the safeguards of civil liberty, is made for no reason whatever except because the aristocratic class in the country would not submit to share the Government with the great mass of the people who are working men.

It was simply ludicrous to suppose that the soldiers would abandon a campaign or a siege and strike the rebellion in its weakest part, but is also the solution of the vital question from which the rebellion sprung, an act of justice peculiarly fitting for Americans.

A PLEA FOR HONORABLE DISCHARGE.

There is a constant application for the release from service of certain familiar quotations upon the ground of utter exhaustion. They have done duty beyond all reason. They have worn out their welcome. They are as appalling upon the page as bores are in society. They are contaminated and stale they should be gratefully dismissed.

There are certain phrases, likewise, which have come constant duty in the war that their constant thirsty demands honorable discharge. They may fitfully have been of service as a stimulus, but their time is entirely past. The first phrase of the kind, and the longest in active service, is this: "The enemy greatly outnumbered us." This, it appears, has been the case wherever we have met them. So that the President upon being asked the actual number of the rebels answered, "About twelve hundred thousand;" and when the astounded inquirer incredulously repeated the figures and besought an explanation, the President replied, "Why, Sir, we have about four hundred thousand, and the reports after every engagement inform us that the enemy were three to our one; and three times four are twelve."

Indulgent dismissal is also earnestly entreated for the phrase, "We have completely surrounded the enemy, and they will be bagged." The thing, indeed, has never been done, but it is not from any want of activity upon the part of the phrase. That, indeed, had itself nearly telegraphed from Virginia and from the West. It was not its fault if the facts did not correspond. Veni vidi vici for facts. And still another phrase, "We are now perfectly prepared to receive the enemy at all points." This is a most gallant and magnificent boast. It takes history of the entire line of the war east and west. Those rebel vermin, we constantly learn, are under our eyes. They think they are going to be a thing or two. Never fear. We have them in hand. We only want them to come on; for we are prepared at all points. To be sure they do come on. They ride ostlerly around us. They put Cincinnati, Louisville, Pennsylvania (by the burning of the fastidious!) the most awful "funk." They seize whatever they can lay their hands on. Corps and council, mount them on horses, and carry them off as prisoners." They burn and ravage and receive the surrender of every town miles behind us at points' of our lines. They "will probably repeat in Gettysburg to-night the performance in Chambersburg." But our permanent telegraphic consolation is, not that General Somebody's forces "arrived at the scene of action" (as the rebels had fatalished crossing," but that we are fully prepared at all points. That is an immense satisfaction. And we have only to be in that condition of waiting and watching, that the very phrase is exhausted and ought to have been long discharge.

The constant rumors that the chief rebel generals were killed in every battle; that the foe is utterly routed; that the rebels are entirely demoralized, that they have nothing to eat nor wear, may all be true. Nevertheless, we have constant reports in our ports, claim victories, and fight again. The routed foe skips all round us and hits us once more. The demoralized rebels fight like fiends. And having nothing to eat or wear, their commissariat must needs be economical, and their clothing thin. They go up to wretched, shoeless, hatless, and breadless, why do we sit down on the Potomac and stare at them for a month and more? Why do we not pursue? If they are utterly demoralized and destitute, the more shame is as that they are not long since dead to a man.

A little public charity is respectfully requested that these long-continued and stale phrases which have done as much service as any feather in a general's hat or gold lace upon his coat. They are fallen sick and weary. They have no means of earning further support. They should be honorably discharged with the gratitude and the benediction that they will never try to return to service.

THE HABEAS CORPUS.

THE right of personal liberty is equally sacred with the right of life. Its careful defense is the foundation of free society. The most ancient recognition is the mark of progressive civilization. The writ of habeas corpus is thus the great bulwark of civil society. Its suspension is a matter so solemn and important as to require especial record; and the eyes of a free people will with nothing more jealously than the inviolability of that writ.

When our Constitution was framed the peculiarity of the temporary suspension of the writ under extreme circumstances occurred to the Convention. In the first draft it was provided that in case of a government, which was the ground-work of the present Constitution, he proposed (May 25, 1787): "Nor shall the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus ever be suspended, except in cases of rebellion and invasion." And in the draft of the Constitution reported certain propositions for the Committee of Detail. Among them was this: "The privileges and benefit of the writ of habeas corpus shall be enjoyed in this Government in the most expeditious and ample manner; and shall not be suspended by the Legislature except upon the most urgent and pressing occasions, and for a limited time, not exceeding — months." Mr. Pinckney, in proposing to fill the clause, upon the 28th of August, he urged the necessity of the writ, and Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved that it should not be suspended but on the most urgent occasions, and then for a time not exceeding three months. Mr. Rutledge thought it ought to be absolutely inviolate—that its suspension could never be necessary. Then Mr. Pinckney and Mr. Morris moved the clause as it now stands: "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it."

So jealous was the Convention of the security of the writ that it agreed to the first part of the clause as far as the word "unless," unanimously. But when out of the ten States (Rhode Island, Maryland, and Georgia) voted against the latter part.

Thus the privilege of suspension is granted in terms. But how may power be wielded so that its suspended is not specified. In Mr. Pinckney's original draft the clause stood as it now does, after defining and limiting the powers of the Legislature. And this particular paragraph is as follows: "The Legislature of the United States shall pass no law on the subject of religion; nor touching or abridging the liberty of the press; nor which shall suspend the writ of the habeas corpus," etc. as already quoted. So in the subsequent proposition to the Legislature of the United States shall pass no law which shall suspend the writ of habeas corpus, or the Constitution the writ is provided for in the ninth section, which limits the power of Congress.

Thus the context of the Constitution, the English tradition, where Parliament suspends, and the whole spirit of our Government, gives the power of suspension to Congress. It certainly does not reside in any Secretary more than in a Secretary's clerk, unless it may be exercised by every officer of the Government, and by every body who chooses, in his own sole. But in the great emergency which threatened the President at the outbreak of the rebellion, compelled by the eminent peril of the country, he rightfully and wisely assumed a power which was clearly granted, but whose exercise was not expressly assigned to any other authority. Yet he should then have instantly summoned Congress, fresh from the people, to confirm the suspension and to define precisely the conditions under which, and the persons for which, the power should henceforth be exercised.

That was not done, but it should be the first duty of the session of Congress. For it is, beyond all question, the universal and profound conviction of the country that the suspension of the writ is the open grave, although strictly constitutional, that only the extreme and urgent peril of the state can justify, and that by the people as their representatives shall decree.

THE POSTAGE CURRENCY.

SINCE we are of those who have called attention to what seemed to be a repudiation by the Government of certain obligations in the shape of postage stamps, it is only fair to say that the postmaster of New York has published an explanation of the general order of the department to the effect that only stamps so defaced that it is impossible to decide whether they have been used to pay postage or not will be rejected. The result of the order practically will be that the utterly defaced stamps will not be taken in exchange. But the true remedy of the difficulty in the adequate supply of paper-money. Millions of this may be released from the vaults, boxes, and old stockings into which it has broken itself.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A YOUNG lady of eighteen was engaged to be married to a gentleman of forty-five. Her mother having noticed her low spirits of late thus inquired the reason. "Why, mother," replied the young lady, "I was just thinking that when I am as old as Mr. Blank my age will be twenty-six—true; but how only thirty-six." "Yes, but only thirty-six when I am forty-five, but when I'm sixty—" "Oh dear! why, then he'll be a hundred and twenty!"

"The only way to look at a lady's faults," exclaimed a gallant beau, "is to look over them."

Shortly after his arrival in the metropolis an Irishman came running to him in the street, crying, "Orh, blessin' on ye, Docther M——! Here ye are?" "I'm very well," replied the divine, "but what's that to you?" "Why, isn't it me come to London?" "Last week; but how do you come to know me?" "Sure, I've seen your song in the papers." "The Doctor, perceiving that the Irishman had his pocket-book open, gave him the shilling, and was answered by the laddie, "Sure then and I see your name on your umbrella."

Carve to all but just enough,
Leave them hungry, leave no more stuff;
And, that you may have your joke,
Carve the fowl, but don't provoke.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

RECONNOISSANCES ON THE POTOMAC.

On the 10th inst. at 4 A. M., General Humphreys's division crossed at Blackford's and Edwards's Ferries, and marched supported by General Hancock's division about the same time a portion of Sumner's corps consisting of part of General Couch's and General Sedgwick's divisions, under command of General Hancock, advanced from Bolivar Heights along the road to Charlestown, and met the enemy's pickets in force, supported by a battery, near Halltown, driving them back with artillery fire, and following them up toward Charlestown, which place our troops occupied at 9 A. M. The object of the reconnaissance having been accomplished, the armies returned. The rebel force was General Jackson's, followed by rebel cavalry and artillery in within a short distance of Shepherdstown, where they crossed the river and destroyed the bridge. The number of rebel prisoners, and it is understood that the rebels had been reinforced, and was killed and wounded while engaging the enemy.

THE CAMPAIGN IN KENTUCKY.

No more battles have taken place in Kentucky. General Bragg is retreating toward the Cumberland Mountains, and General Buell is following him. The distance between the two armies on the 15th was about 70 miles. Our troops passed through Crab Orchard.

THE REBEL RAID AT LEXINGTON.

Morgan, with fifteen hundred guerrillas, captured Lexington on the 17th, after a sharp fight with a small force of National cavalry. He then moved on toward Frankfort, destroying the railroad to the Versailles turnpike, and between Versailles and Frankfort, he was suddenly met by about 2500 of General Granger's command and routed. The short fight—his force being collected. It is supposed that he will continue to unite his scattered forces with Humphrey Marshall.

AFFAIRS AT NASHVILLE.

The following correspondence will explain itself:

THE DEMAND.

HEAD-QUARTERS UNITED STATES FORCES,
NASHVILLE, TENN., September, 1862.

To Brigadier-General Negley, Commanding Forces at Nashville:

SIR—Having strongly invested your position, we demand an immediate surrender of the forces under your command. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

GENERAL NEGLEY'S REPLY.

HEAD-QUARTERS UNITED STATES FORCES,
NASHVILLE, TENN., September, 1862.

SIR,—General Negley is prepared and determined to hold this place.

JOS. A. LAWLER, Captain and A. A. G.

No attack was made by the rebels, and General Negley finding them in none fears at Lavergne, fifteen miles from the city, attacked them and defeated them.

THE OCTOBER ELECTIONS.

The latest returns of the Pennsylvania election indicate that fifteen Union Congressmen are elected. The State ticket is still in doubt, but the chances are in favor of the Republicans. The Republicans will have a majority in the State Legislature Senate, with a Democratic majority on joint ballot.

The Democratic majority in Ohio will be about 20,000. Iowa sends six Republicans to Congress. Among the Republicans elected are Messrs. Kasson, Grow, Wilson, Grow of Pennsylvania, Bingham of Ohio, Richman of Pennsylvania, etc.

NO DRAFT IN DELAWARE.

It appears by the following order from the War Department that Delaware has already filled her quota of troops:

Ordered, That the draft ordered by the President of the United States of September 3, 1862, and by the President Department, been raised by volunteers, the order for the draft in the State of Delaware from the Board of Enrollment, be order of the PRESIDENT.

E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

There will be no draft in Illinois. In NEW YORK a draft will take place on the 10th November.

GENERAL JEFFERSON C. DAVIS RELEASED.

General Jefferson C. Davis, on 14th, received an order from the War Department releasing him from the arrest under which he has hitherto been confined since killing General Nelson in a personal affray at Louisville. The facts were fully stated in our issue of Oct. 4th, page 627. It will be in the recollection of our readers that Nelson struck Davis before long. He appeared on the streets the same afternoon, for the first time since Nelson's death.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S emancipation proclamation has excited the greatest interest throughout Europe. It is considered by the English press equivalent to the abolition of the State paper by the British people." The writer says that the North has now the right to declare that it will not confer the right to abolish slavery either on the President alone or on the President and Congress, or on the Legislature. It is said, is "a thunder-bolt placed in President Lincoln's hands to destroy the whole social organization of the south at a blow." The London Times thinks that the President has no power to enforce "his decree." The London Post more compass every square mile of the South before it can make the proclamation effective. The London Herald says:

THE VOICE OF THE PEOPLE OF ENGLAND.

A meeting of working men was held in London on the 22d, presided, having for its object "the question of the recognition of the Southern Confederacy by this country, as an independent nationality," by petitioning the Queen and Parliament to that effect. Mr. Mason was invited over the organization. Mr. Mason having been invited to offer his opinion on the subject, did so by letter. After recapitulating the secession arguments, Mr. Mason declares that the "separation from the United States is final and forever," and that "in no possible contingency——" and the war he continued to be carried on by the people of the Southern States are to be removed to the regular and Union." To the above he endeavored to pass a resolution declaring that the rebellion of the United States in certain portions of the Union constituted a civil war, and that having to such a war it was expedient to recognize the Confederate States as an independent nation. The resolution was rejected by the eminent people of the country, and a resolution was carried by a majority of 1,500 to 1,000 against the resolution.

A RIOT.

A riot took place in Liverpool on the 24th, in consequence of the Orangemen attempting to march through the Roman Catholic districts. The police interfered, and a fight ensued, in which several persons were killed and wounded.

THE CAMPAIGN IN KENTUCKY.

The rebels have been driven from Kentucky. General Bragg is retreating toward the Cumberland Mountains, and General Buell is following him. The distance between the two armies on the 15th was about 70 miles. Our troops passed through Crab Orchard.

THE REBEL RAID AT LEXINGTON.

Morgan, with fifteen hundred guerrillas, captured Lexington on the 17th, after a sharp fight with a small force of National cavalry. He then moved on toward Frankfort, destroying the railroad to the Versailles turnpike, and between Versailles and Frankfort, he was suddenly met by about 2500 of General Granger's command and routed. The short fight—his force being collected. It is supposed that he will continue to unite his scattered forces with Humphrey Marshall.

AFFAIRS AT NASHVILLE.

The following correspondence will explain itself:

THE DEMAND.

HEAD-QUARTERS UNITED STATES FORCES NASHVILLE,
LAVERGNE, TENN., September, 1862.

To Brigadier-General Negley, Commanding Forces at Nashville:

SIR—Having strongly invested your position, we demand an immediate surrender of the forces under your command. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES A. PAUL, A. A. G.

GENERAL NEGLEY'S REPLY.

HEAD-QUARTERS UNITED STATES FORCES,
NASHVILLE, TENN., September, 1862.

SIR,—General Negley is prepared and determined to hold this place.

JOS. A. LAWLER, Captain and A. A. G.

No attack was made by the rebels, and General Negley finding them in none fears at Lavergne, fifteen miles from the city, attacked them and defeated them.

THE OCTOBER ELECTIONS.

The latest returns of the Pennsylvania election indicate that fifteen Union Congressmen are elected. The State ticket is still in doubt, but the chances are in favor of the Republicans. The Republicans will have a majority in the State Legislature Senate, with a Democratic majority on joint ballot.

The Democratic majority in Ohio will be about 20,000. Iowa sends six Republicans to Congress. Among the Republicans elected are Messrs. Kasson, Grow, Wilson, Grow of Pennsylvania, Bingham of Ohio, Richman of Pennsylvania, etc.

NO DRAFT IN DELAWARE.

It appears by the following order from the War Department that Delaware has already filled her quota of troops:

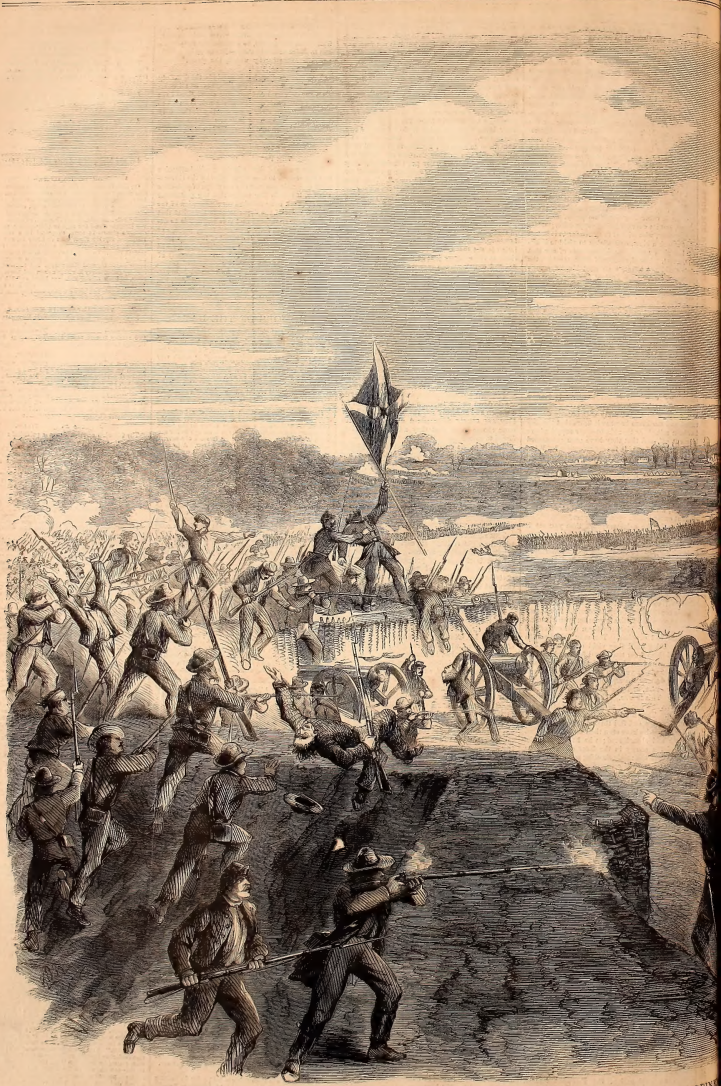
WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, SEPT. 20, 1862.

Ordered, That the draft ordered by the President of the United States of September 3, 1862, and by the President Department, been raised by volunteers, the order for the draft in the State of Delaware from the Board of Enrollment, be order of the PRESIDENT.

E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

There will be no draft in Illinois. In NEW YORK a draft will take place on the 10th November.

GENERAL JEFFERSON C. DAVIS RELEASED.



General Jefferson C. Davis, on 14th, received an order from the War Department releasing him from the arrest under which he has hitherto been confined since killing General Nelson in a personal affray at Louisville. The facts were fully stated in our issue of Oct. 4th, page 627. It will be in the recollection of our readers that Nelson struck Davis before long. He appeared on the streets the same afternoon, for the first time since Nelson's death.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S emancipation proclamation has excited the greatest interest throughout Europe. It is considered by the English press equivalent to the abolition of the State paper by the British people." The writer says that the North has now the right to declare that it will not confer the right to abolish slavery either on the President alone or on the President and Congress, or on the Legislature. It is said, is "a thunder-bolt placed in President Lincoln's hands to destroy the whole social organization of the South at a blow." The London Times thinks that the President has no power to enforce "his decree." The London Post more compass every square mile of the South before it can make the proclamation effective. The London Herald says:

CAMP DICK ROBINSON, GARRARD COUNTY, KENTUCKY—THE GREAT RENDEZVOUS OF UNION TROOPS AND REFUGE OF TENNESSEE EXILES—RECENTLY DESERTED BY GENERAL BRAGG.—[DRAWN BY MR. W. T. R. BRIDGE.]

CAMP DICK ROBINSON.

WE publish on this page a view of CAMP DICK ROBINSON, Garrard County, Kentucky, a twenty-mens place, which has just been vacated by the rebel army under Bragg and reoccupied by Union troops. Our picture is from a sketch by Mr. W. T. R. Bridge, of Cincinnati.

Camp Dick Robinson is situate about midway between Cincinnati and Cumberland Gap, 126 miles from the former place, 27 miles from Lexington, and 8 miles east of Danville, the residence of Hon. C. A. J. Breckinridge. It is on the farm of the famous Captain Dick Robinson, an uncompromising Union man, and a very popular citizen of Kentucky. The camp is well known as having been the first rallying-place for the Kentucky Unionists and the refugees from Tennessee. Hither were sent the arms furnished by Government to the Union Home Guards of Kentucky, which here formed the nucleus of the Union army in that State; its importance as a military depôt during the first year of the war was second to that of no other spot in the State. The late Major-General Nelson was one of its early commanders; he may be said, in fact, to have founded it. He always loved the place, and after he was shot he expressed a wish to be buried on the spot which had been the scene of his patriotic endeavors to preserve his State in the Union. The rebels, in their recent invasion of Kentucky, took possession of Camp Dick Robinson, and rechristened it Camp Breckinridge. They found but little there, however, to reward them for the capture. Quite recently they evacuated the place with precipitation, and the loyal residents believe that no flag but the old Stars and Stripes will ever again float over Camp Dick Robinson.

Our picture is taken from the southwest. Captain Robinson's house is seen just over the tents, a little to the left of the centre of the picture. The road in front of the house, passing to the right of the picture, is the turnpike to Cumberland Gap, along which Bragg's army lately skedaddled and Buell followed in pursuit.

HE HAS GONE, AND I HAVE SENT HIM!

He has gone, and I have sent him!
Think you I would bid him stay,
Leaving, craven-like, to others
All the burden of the day?
All the burden? nay, the triumph!
Is it hard to understand
All the joy that thrills the hero
Battling for his native land?

He has gone, and I have sent him!
Could I keep him at my side
While the brave old ship that bears us
Plunges in the perilous tide?
Nay, I blush but at the question,
What am I, that I should chill
All his brave and generous promptings
Captive to a woman's will?

He has gone, and I have sent him!
I have buckled on his sword,
I have bidden him strike for Freedom,
For his country, for the Lord!
As I marked his lofty bearing,
And the flush upon his cheek,
I have caught my heart rebelling
That my woman's arm is weak.

He has gone, and I have sent him!
Not without a thought of pain,
For I know the war's dread chances,
And we may not meet again.
Life itself is but a lending,
He that gave perchance may take;
If it be so, I will bear it
Meekly for my country's sake.

He has gone, and I have sent him!
This henceforward be my pride,
I have given my cherished darling
Freely to the righteous side.
I, with all a mother's weakness,
Hold him now without a flaw;
Yet when he returns I'll call him
Twice as noble as before.

BURIED ALIVE.

THOMAS WHITMEAD, Joseph Anscombe, and Henry Aldham lived at Stratford, in the county of Wiltshire, in England, and worked a chalk-pit on Salisbury Plain for their joint benefit. This so-called pit was in the form of a crescent, the excavation having been begun at the foot of a large mound, so that the entrance should be on a level with the adjoining plain. After the excavation had been carried on for some time, they cut out a chamber in the chalk for the purpose of shelter in stormy days, and for holding tools, wheel-barrows, and other things. On the 16th of April a terrific storm arose, the wind blowing with peculiar violence on this plain, owing to its great extent and the few obstacles which exist there to impede its progress. The rain fell in torrents, and the flashes of lightning succeeded each other so rapidly that the air seemed all ablaze. The three men sat down in their nook to wait till the storm had passed over. Whitmead and Anscombe struck a light and began smoking, but Aldham, who was a man of an unusually serious turn of mind, and much given to the study of religious subjects, sat down a little within the entrance, just out of reach of the driving rain, and began reading the Pilgrim's Progress, the numbers of which were left at the pit by a bookhawker who crossed the plain at regular intervals during the year. Being asked by his persons to read aloud, he commenced with the account of Christian's journey through the Valley of the Shadow of Death. The exciting character of the narrative, combined with the awe inspired by the raging storm, caused the other two to listen with such breathless interest that their pipes were forgotten and the light died out. Just as Aldham was reading the passage—"The flames would be reaching toward him; also, he heard doleful voices, and rushings to and fro, so that sometimes he thought he should be torn in pieces, or trodden down like mire in the streets. This frightful sight was seen, and these dreadful noises were heard by him for several miles together; and coming to a place where he thought he heard a company of fiends coming forward to meet him, he stopped and began to muse what he had best to do"—a more furious blast came, the howling and roaring of which drowned the reader's voice, and almost overpowered the sound of the falling of a large fir-tree, several of which grew within a few paces of the top of the cave. This tree fell over the entrance, and its matted roots tore up a large portion of the earth which formed the roof of the cavern, and in this circumstance the two men were probably indebted for their escape from instant suffocation from the consequences of what followed almost immediately afterward. They were still trembling from the fright when the lightning descended upon the fallen tree, tearing it into fragments, and from these passed into the earth, rending it, and causing the chalk to fall into the cavern where they had sheltered themselves, and burying them therein. Anscombe and Whitmead being at the bottom of the excavation happened to be under the part of the surface from which the earth had been torn up by the roots of the tree, and were able to breathe with tolerable facility, though unable to extricate themselves from the mass of chalk which surrounded them; their position being still further aggravated by the pain which, continuing to pour without slackening for some time, trickled through the floor and streamed down their faces and saturated them to the skin. After a night passed in this position, during which they could hear the groans of their unfortunate companion, they were rescued by their fellow-villagers without other injuries than a few bruises of no importance. As for poor Aldham his case was much worse. Having been seated near the entrance of the cave, under the roof from which no portion of the earth had been removed, he had been completely buried in the chalk, the pressure being to some extent increased by the body of the tree. To the circumstance that chalk fractures in pieces and not in powder it was owing that he was dug out alive; but it been earth he must have been stifled. Though, however, he was yet alive when he was placed on a hurdle and carried to his cottage, he received such severe internal injuries that the doctor, who had been sent for in anticipation, after a very brief examination, pronounced his case hopeless. Still he lingered on day after day, with the shadow of the hand of death on his feet and the point of his dart pressing against his breast. Meanwhile his partners had recovered their health and strength and were able to work again.

I have now to relate a very extraordinary occurrence which forms part of this painful history. The three men whose names I have mentioned, with ten others, formed a club, which combined for numerous beneficial purposes. Their meetings were held on a certain evening every week in a little house in a garden belonging to a mariner, who was one of the members of the club. The entrance to this garden was through his house, or through a door opening into the fields, of which each member had a key. On the fifth evening after the accident they were assembled as usual. Some of them were smoking, and had jugs of beer before them, but all were unusually grave and silent, for Whitmead and Anscombe, who were present, had called on their suffering partner on their way down and found him speechless and at the point of death. While they were sitting they were expecting every instant to hear the passing-bell tell of his spirit's departure, the figure of their friend, with no clothing except a shirt upon him, appeared in the room. It looked about for an instant, and then sat down in a vacant chair near the door. Not doubting that it was the apparition of their friend, and not a being of flesh and blood, no one dared to speak. The figure sat still for some minutes without speaking; quite regardless of everything around, then repeating in a low monotonous tone, "He hath turned the shadow of death into the morning," it rose, glided noiselessly from the room, and disappeared through the door opening into the fields. It is not known, nor is it possible to form an idea with any certainty, how many minutes elapsed before any of those present had so far recovered their self-possession as to open the door and look out; but when they did, the figure was no longer visible, though they could see for some distance along the path leading in the direction of Aldham's house. After exchanging a few remarks, Whitmead, Anscombe, and another, named Jennings, agreed to go to their friend's house and ascertain his condition; but before they returned the bell of the church had informed those who remained behind that Aldham had ceased to exist. The information which the three brought back was, that Aldham had died at twenty minutes past six o'clock, upon which one of the party averred that this was the very time when the figure entered the room, as he had his watch in his hand at the moment for the purpose of showing his neighbor the time—an event to which his neighbor confirmed.

The narrative of Jacob Hirsig, a Jew, who was buried alive in a poisoned well.

In the year 6108, which in the European calendar is 1348, a Jewish physician named Balcrinus, who dwelt at Thanon, near Chillon, and being the fear of the Most High God, even before he was born, under the influence of torture, he having wrenched several times, and being, moreover, threatened with other and more grievous torments, confessed that he had received from Rabbi Jacob Hirsig, through the hands of a Jewish boy, a packet of poison, which he was directed to throw into the principal wells of the town in which he lived, which injunction he had obeyed. This pretended confession, which he made in the madness caused by intense suffering, was afterward read over to him, and he was made to swear to its truth on the Law. Subsequently, while still insane, he confessed, or was said to have confessed, that he had thrown a portion of the poison into a certain well, and that he had concealed another portion tied up in a piece of rag beneath the stones on the brink. Being taken to this well, and compelled to search among the stones, he, in the presence of the magistrate and other of the municipal authorities, drew out a piece of rag, which on being opened was found to contain a red and black powder mingled together. The mob of Christians then present did thereupon seize a certain renegade Jew, who had departed from the religion of his forefathers, and forcing the magistrate to put a small quantity of the powder into a vessel, they filled it with water and compelled the Jew to swallow it, who was immediately smitten with death and died in great agony within an hour—a most just punishment for his former apostasy. As for Balavignus he was taken back to prison, and subsequently put to death with great cruelty.

On the day following the said discovery of the poison, in the evening, being the eve of the Sabbath, and my wife, Esther, having just kindled the lights, according to the custom of our people, the magistrate of the town of Chillon, attended by his officers, rode up to the door of my dwelling, dismounted, and entered therein. They first seized me, and then bound my arms together behind my back with great cruelty, so that the blood forced its way beneath my nails and dropped from the ends of my fingers to the ground. They next searched every corner of my house, trying by blows and threats to make my wife and daughter, Rebecca, reveal the secret hiding-place in which I kept my poisons. My heart was rent at the sight of the sufferings and indignities they were made to undergo, but I was powerless to help them, and I could only beseech them to bear patiently the trials to which they were subjected. After searching every part of my house, and finding nothing of what they were in search, I was dragged away to prison. The next day the magistrate and other officials came to me in my cell, and read to me the confession of Balavignus, concerning which they put to me many questions. I denied that I had sent any poison to him, or had ever thought of so doing, or that I had ever heard any of our people even speak of such a thing. Finding that I continued firm in my denial, and that I was prepared to swear on the Five Books of Moses that I knew nothing of any plot for poisoning the wells, I was ordered to be racked till I should be tortured into making confession of a falsehood. Four times were my limbs torn asunder by that hellish invention, till I could feel no longer, after which I was left for eleven days on the floor of my dungeon undisturbed. On the twelfth day I was taken from prison to the place of execution, to witness the murder of my countryman, Solomon Chomer, a man of wonderful knowledge, and greatly learned in the philosophy of the Egyptians and Chaldeans. He, too, had been sentenced to die for the same crime with which I was charged, and I was placed near him to be a witness of his sufferings. Together we called on the God of our forefathers for fortitude, and, verily, the patience with which he bore the cruel tortures to which he was subjected could only have been born of insensibility. He was stretched on a wheel, and after his arms and legs had been broken in sundry places by the bar of the executioner, he was unbound and laid on the ground, his body folded back on his legs so that his head rested on his heels. He was again questioned touching the crime with which he was charged, but he gave no answer; whereupon he was laid on the wood which had been prepared for the purpose, the fire was kindled, and his spirit rose with the smoke which ascended from the pile.

I was being taken back to prison, my heart quaking with fear at the doom that was before me, when one cried "Let us not suffer this Jew to escape us," and another, "Let us throw him in the well he poisoned for us." Then there was a great cry, and much tumult, and I was taken from the officers and dragged to a well outside the town in which the poison had been found and hurled therein—the body of the apostate Jew, which had lain there unburied, being cast down upon me. The water reached above my shoulders when I stood upon my feet, and I was forced to stand on the tips of my toes to keep my mouth above water. Standing thus, with my flesh torn, bruised, and bleeding, I heard the planks laid across the top of the well, and stones thrown on these, and then all was silent, and I was left to die an agonizing death. After a while I felt that my feet were sinking deeper in the sand and gravel, and I had to cling to the sides of the well to keep myself from instant death.

I had been in this position several hours when I heard a noise above me as though one were removing the stones, then a voice, which was that of my wife, Esther, calling my name. My heart leaped within me at the sound of her voice, and I answered joyfully, upon which she bade me be of good cheer. Presently she called again, and told me to tie the rope she was letting down about my body. I had much difficulty in doing this, because I was forced to loosen my hold and suffer myself to sink below the water till it forced itself beneath my eyelids. I succeeded at last in tying the cord tightly beneath my armpits, and was then drawn up to the well's mouth, and laid on the grass by my beloved wife and daughter. While I was slowly recovering the use of my limbs, which had been much weakened by the torments I had undergone, they occupied themselves in restoring the planks and stones to their places. When this had been done, we left the spot while it was yet dark, and I hid myself in a tree in a wood near my house, to which place Rebecca brought me food. Our escape to Poland was accomplished with great difficulty and much suffering.

WHO MOST NEED OUR PITY?

Oh! pity those whose lifeless hearts
Have never known a patriot's thrill;
Who, though they have a mind and will,
Lack courage now to act their parts.

Yes, pity them! for where the power
To rouse those feelings that remain,
If Liberty has called in vain
In this their Country's needful hour?

They can not feel (who stand aloof)
That glow of noble, inborn pride
For which men barter all beside,
And give the world their loyal proof.

Yes, pity them! the thronged Broadway,
Where selfishness and fashion meet—
The very stones beneath their feet
Might boast of hearts as well as they.

SOLDIERS' DEAD-LETTERS.

"Why not write Dead Soldiers' Letters at once?" says a voice at my elbow.

Only out of respect to the old logical rule requiring the perfect definition of a class to embrace all the individuals composing it. It is a sad truth that too many of these missives that have been wandering about in the mail-bags are the letters, and the last letters—the last written expression of thought or wish—of men who have dared to die for their country. Many of these rough-looking, soiled, and torn envelopes now lying in the Dead-letter Office, after a fruitless journey in search of friends to read their contents, are filled with strange tales of blood and battle, or breathe sentiments that should stir the very soul of patriotism, and fire the heart and nerve the arm of every man who perils his life in the cause of his country's honor. Outside, it is a shapeless and uninviting mass of worn and crumpled envelopes, soiled with the dust and smoke of every camp and battle-field on the continent; within, are the thoughts, wishes, last words, and dying prayers of those who have offered their own lives to save the life of the nation.

Up to the last of August soldiers' letters, written from camps or head-quarters, and containing no valuable inclosure, when returned from the local post-offices to the Dead-letter Office because they were "not called for," have been destroyed, because they could not, like ordinary letters, be returned to the writers. Armies are always upon the move, and the ten or twelve weeks that must expire between the date of a soldier's letter in camp and its return to Washington as a "dead-letter" render any attempt to place it again in the hands of the writer as impossible as it is useless. The Department having once sent the letter to its place of destination, and advertised it there, has no legal authority to incur further trouble or expense in the matter. Hence the practice that obtained in the opening-room of the Dead-letter Office, of throwing into the waste-basket all "dead-letters" containing no valuable inclosure, which had been written by soldiers from camps or head-quarters. As the war progressed and great battles were fought, consecrating in history such names as Pea Ridge, Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Fair Oaks, and Malvern Hill, and marking the boundaries of each field of bloody strife with the tumuli of buried heroes, it came to be noticed that many of the soldiers' letters, written upon the eve or at the close of these fierce struggles for a nation's life, contained matter of the gravest interest to the friends and relatives at home. Some of these lost missives, containing the words of father, brother, son, or husband, who had gone down in the storm of battle, or survived to tell the fate of other martyrs in the holy cause, and which had failed in the first effort to place them in the hands of the persons addressed, were rightly conceived to be of as much importance to the soldiers' friends as the letter inclosing a part of his pay to the wife and little ones at home.

The subject having attracted the attention of Mr. Zevely, the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, who has charge of the Dead-letter Office, and whose hand is as open as his heart is warm in the cause of aiding the soldier in the field and his family at home, he at once determined to have this class of dead-letters examined by a competent clerk, and all that were likely to be of interest or importance again forwarded to the post-offices originally addressed. As the law authorized no additional expense for such an enterprise, one of the clerks volunteered to perform the work out of office-hours; and so a second effort is being made to get these soldiers' letters into the hands of their friends.

An interview with the clerk who spends his evenings and mornings in this work brought me to a knowledge of the enterprise, and I write this sketch with the purpose of bringing the matter to public notice, and thus to aid in getting these lost letters into the hands of those for whom they were intended.

I learn from the gentleman who has charge of the work that four or five hundred letters a day of this class come into the Dead-letter Office. As they are opened, all soldiers' letters containing no valuable inclosure are placed in his hands, and after office-hours he proceeds to examine them, and select such as can be again sent to the local post-offices with some prospect of reaching the parties addressed. Each letter thus re-sent is entered upon a blank form addressed to the postmaster, and charging him to use "all diligence to secure its delivery." This form contains not only the name of the person addressed on the envelope, but the name of the writer and of the place where the letter was dated. This schedule, or catalogue of letters, is to be conspicuously posted for one month, and any letters upon it that are not delivered in that time are to be returned to the Dead-letter Office at Washington, to be destroyed. The whole thing is a work of grace on the part of the Postmaster-General, there being no charge made for the second transportation of the letters or their delivery at the local post-offices. This being the case, it is proper to add, for the benefit of the Department, and to save people from unnecessary trouble, that it is quite useless to address inquiries to any one in the General Post-office respecting letters of this description. No record is kept of them, and those not re-sent are immediately destroyed. Any one looking for such a letter, known to have been advertised at a local post-office and returned as "dead" to Washington, should watch the posted catalogue of "Soldiers' Letters," which, for the smaller offices, is forwarded at the close of each month, and once a week or fortnight to the large city offices.

With a proper care not to violate the confidence and privacy peculiarly strict in this office, I have been allowed to notice the character of some of these letters. Here is one written by T. F. H., Lieutenant-Colonel Fifth Ohio Cavalry, and very fully and carefully directed, yet it has failed to reach its destination; and lest a second effort should prove as fruitless as the first, I am permitted to make an extract, in the hope that it may reach the eyes of the bereaved parents. The letter is written from Zanesville, Ohio, under date of May 27th, and addressed to Mr. and Mrs. Elliott, Baleyville, near Minneapolis, Minnesota, and reads thus:

Friends,—On the evening of Monday, April 7, 1862, about five o'clock, after my regiment had been halted in its pursuit of the fleeing hordes of rebels, I rode slowly around the field, meditating on the result of that bloody action [Shiloh], and observing the effect of the "bolts of war" on the dead bodies which covered the ground. Various were the attitudes and expressions of the fallen heroes; yet as I rode along one smooth-faced lad, whose features were lit up by a smile, so attracted and riveted my attention as to cause me to dismount and examine him. His uniform was neat as an old soldier's, his buttons polished, his person clean, his hair well combed, lying squarely on his back, his face toward the enemy, his wounds in front, from which the last life-drops were slowly ebbing, his hands crossed on his breast, and a peaceful, heavenly smile resting on his marble features. I almost envied his fate as I thought,

"How sleep the brave who sink to rest,
By all their country's wishes blest!
* * * * * *
By fairy hands their knell is rung,
By forms unseen their dirge is sung;
Lo! Honor comes, a pilgrim gray,
To bless the turf that wraps their clay,
And Freedom shall a while repair
To dwell a weeping hermit there!"

I asked the by-standers who that lad was. No one could tell. Hoping to find some mark on his clothing by which I could distinguish him, I unbuttoned his roundabout, and in the breast pocket found a Bible, on the fly-leaf of which was an inscription by his mother to "John Elliott." In the same pocket was a letter from his mother, and one he had written to his uncle, both dabbled with blood. Pleased with getting these data from which to trace his family, I determined to preserve the Bible and letters and send them to you. I have since regretted that I did not examine all his pockets and save whatever may have been in them; but my time was short, and I felt that the Bible he had so faithfully carried would be treasure enough for you, and in the hurry of the moment I did not think to look for any thing else. His remains received decent sepulture that night, and he now sleeps in a soldier's grave.

And now, my dear friends, I would have written to you weeks ago, but was long sick in camp, was sent to Ohio low with fever, and am but just able to begin to sit up.

You have doubtless wept over your dead boy. No human sympathy could assuage your grief. Yet He who guides and governs the universe of man and matter, I doubt not, has thrown around you "everlasting arms," and supported your faint, bereft, and bleeding hearts.

After a while, when time shall have healed the wounds that war has inflicted, it will be a heritage of glory for you to reflect that your boy died in the cause of human rights and to save the life of a great nation; and you can with righteous pride boast that he fell in the thickest of the fight, with dead rebels all around him, his face to the foe, and in the "very forefront of the battle."

He died a young hero and martyr in the holy cause of freedom, and Elijah riding up the heavens in a chariot of fire had not a prouder entrance to the Celestial City than your boy. Let your hearts rejoice that there is one more waiting to welcome you back to the "shining shore."

Here is a brief extract from the letter of a surgeon on the Peninsula to a friend at home:

Almost the first one I came to was our poor little friend Dick, the bright-eyed but pale-faced drummer boy, who broke from the warm embrace of his mother and rushed into the wild storm of war at the first call to arms. He was still alive, and able to speak in a low voice. I raised his head and gave him some water. He smiled his thanks, and said, "Doctor, tell mother I wasn't afraid to die. Tell brother Jimmy he can have my pony; and Sis can have all my books; and they mustn't cry about me, for I think I have done right. And take the drum to them; and bury this little flag with me—and that's all!" And that was all; and a moment afterward the spirit of the young hero went up to heaven.

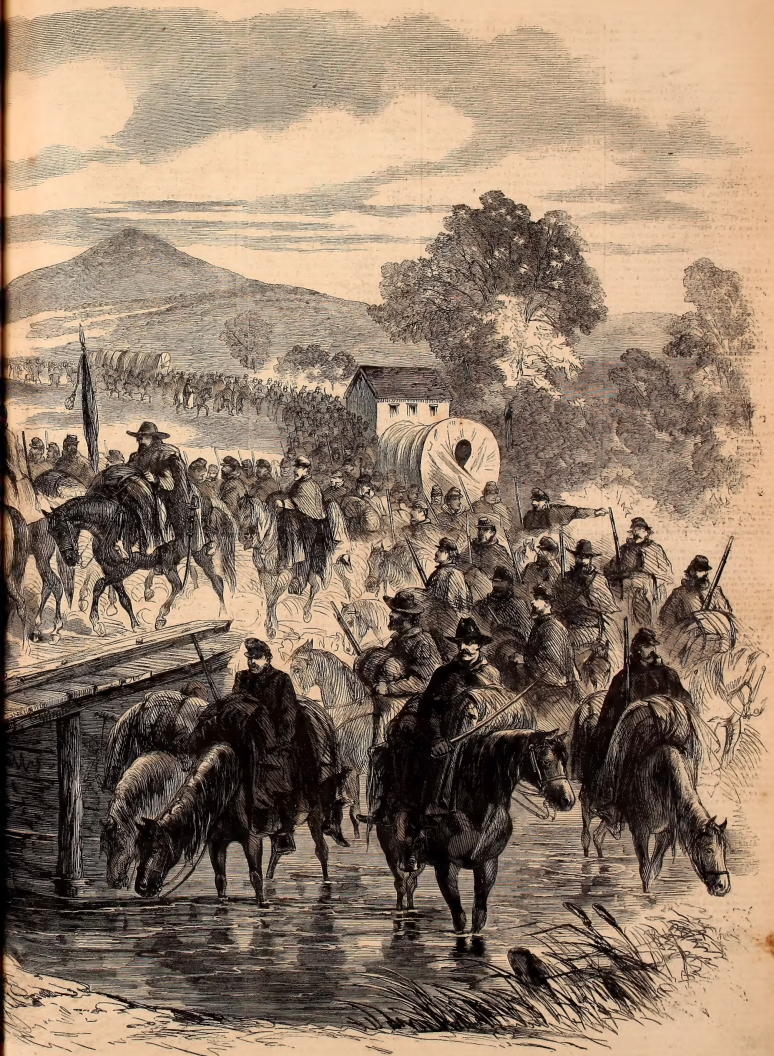
Here is a letter from a wife to her husband in the Peninsular army. It arrived too late, and is on its way back to the writer, with the simple indorsement on the envelope, by an officer of his regiment: "Was killed yesterday in the battle of Malvern Hill."

These are a few examples of what may be found in the "Soldiers' Dead-letters;" and if local postmasters will manifest the same disposition exhibited in the action of the Department at Washington, thousands of these lost epistles will find their way to the rightful owners, and serve to comfort and console many a bereaved and breaking heart.

THE BATTLE OF PERRYVILLE.

On page 689 we give a picture of the little town of Perryville, Kentucky, where M'Cook fought the rebel army on 8th; and on page 700 a picture of the Battle; both from sketches by our special artist, Mr. H. Mosler. Perryville is a small place of about 500 inhabitants. It is now entirely evacuated by the residents, and several of the houses have been destroyed by the shells. Of the battle a Times correspondent gives the following account:

When M'Cook and Rousseau appeared before the town they found the immense forces of the enemy most advantageously posted to meet them. The rebels were posted on a long range of hills, extending in a crescent form from north to west, the termini of the crescent being almost due north and due west, with its inner centre precisely northwest. This semicircular range of hills formed their advance, and on these hills the rebel generals exhorted their soldiers to dye their colors deep in the blood of the enemy rather than surrender them. These hills are about a mile and a half from Perryville. Behind this range of hills, and between them and the Big Spring, there are two other high hills, along the left base of which is a corn-field, and along the right base the tortuous course of the Spring, to the right of which is the extensive and finely-shaded woodland forming their camping grounds. Running off through the corn-field, and angling a little south of west, beyond the western terminus of the advance crescent, there is a strong stone fence, behind which the enemy posted a part of the infantry. Under the brow of the semicircular range of hills the rebel batteries were placed in admirable position, sustained by their infantry—who could fire with destructive effect, and then screen themselves behind the hills and among the grass and weeds. In front of the enemy's right there is a narrow valley of meadow-land, after descending which you come into a skirt-woods. Facing the enemy's centre there was a corn-field, which extended, a little broken, for several hundred yards back to the woods. Facing the stone fence is a stretch of waste land, gently sloping parallel with the fence to the woods. Behind the fence there is heavy timber. The rebels were commanded by their chosen and favorite generals. Bragg was on the field in person, and assumed general command. Buckner led the centre, Hardee the right, and Polk the left wing. General Cheatham had the reserve, while General Brown and a host of other Brigadiers cheered and led on their commands. This General Brown is the same Colonel Brown who commanded the Third Tennessee Regiment at Fort Donelson, and who, with Buckner, surrendered, and served a term at Fort Warren. Since his exchange he has received a Brigadier-General's commission. He is, I believe, a nephew of Niel S. Brown, of Tennessee. So much for the position of the enemy. Now let us look at our own.



The approach of Gilbert's Corps, with M'Cook, Rosseau, and Mitchell, was well known to the rebels. Our men had made forced marches through heat and dust, over a rough road, and through a country utterly destitute of water. Their arrival in the morning was hailed by a shell from the enemy's battery. Notwithstanding the formidable array before us, and notwithstanding the advantages of position the enemy had, our men prepared for action. Harris's battery was planted on our left, Loomis's on the right, with Parson's and Simonton's between the two. M'Cook was chief in command on the field, and Rousseau second. General Jackson, with his brigade, was posted on the left, Rousseau in the centre, while the right was led by General Mitchell. We opened upon the rebels at 1 o'clock P.M., on the 8th. The most sanguinary battle of the war commenced. The enemy opened all their batteries upon us. Soon the whole rebel artillery let their guns loose upon us. The hills shook to their base, as one livid sheet of flame poured across them. Shell would whiz through the air, fall at the point of their aim and burst, dealing death all around. Solid shot went screaming across the field, cutting great gaps through the ranks. Mingling with the terrific roar of cannon, now the shrill hiss of grape and canister, thinning out the troops—literally mowing them down, and piling them in mangled swaths over the field and across the hills. Next come the crash of musketry, quick, loud, and incessant. The noise of these guns blended with that of the artillery in tumultuous roar. Never, perhaps, was there a battle fought at so short a range, and never were fires so murderous and destructive. The battle commenced at 1 o'clock and had reached its height at 3. For an hour now it was a succession of advances and repulses, first one side advancing and then falling back before their infuriated pursuers. On the right a desperate attempt was made to flank the reinforcing columns of M'Cook, which was for a time partially successful, some of the new regiments wavering and staggering under the galling cross-fires poured upon them. The scene was terrific. Dense smoke rolled all over the field, while the hills were literally enveloped in sheets of fire. The thunder of cannon and the crash of musketry can be compared to nothing I have ever heard. The simultaneous falling and splitting of a thousand forest trees might perhaps be something like it.

Harris's Battery which, as stated, was posted on our right, poured grape and canister into the ranks of the advancing rebels, and literally paved the slope with their dead bodies. Yet, on and on came these fierce rebels, over heaps of dead of their own, to within forty yards of that death-dealing battery. Again and again would they recoil with decimated ranks from the terrible machines of death. Determined yet to take that battery, they charged down the slope and through the hollow, diagonally across, from toward the centre, and there one of the regiments supporting it fell into confusion. Still the battery maintained its ground, right in the face of fearful odds; and again the rebels were driven back with fearful slaughter. Parson's Battery, to the right of Harris's, in the mean time had been dealing destruction in the ranks of the foe. The enemy, in overwhelming numbers, and with determined exasperation, closed in upon this battery and succeeded in capturing it. They subsequently spiked the guns and cut the wagon-wheels to pieces. In taking this battery the rebels lost fearfully, our men fighting like heroes against their superior advance. In the early part of the action, General James S. Jackson was killed. He was coolly giving some order on the left. He and General Rousseau had been in conversation. Rousseau turned toward the centre, and Jackson deliberately lighted a cigar; just as he had lighted it, a ball from the enemy struck him, killing him almost instantly. Jackson was a member of the National Congress from the Second District of Kentucky. He resigned his seat to draw his sword for Constitutional liberty. The nation mourns no truer patriot; the army no braver soldier. About this time, also, Colonel Terrell, one of the bravest and most skillful officers of the service, fell mortally wounded, while engaged in pointing a battery under fire of the enemy. The First Wisconsin, Colonel Starkweather, had engaged the First Tennessee rebel regiment on the left, and warm work was going on. The ground was sharply and gallantly contested for hours, with apparently no decisive results, the fire of the First Wisconsin thinning the ranks of the enemy at every round.

The Twenty-third Indiana, toward the centre, covered itself with honors. Their flag was planted near the centre of the field, and the regiment was raked by the crescent-shaped batteries and cross-fires from the rebels. Their ammunition gave out, and they heroically threw themselves upon their faces, the balls of the enemy passing over them in a perfect shower. This regiment suffered severely, one-third of its men being killed or disabled. Their flag was riddled into strings and shreds, and its staff splintered by the enemy's bullets. Yet they kept it waving, and preserve its torn fragments as a memorial of their bravery upon that bloody day. M'Cook and Rousseau both pronounced this a much more hotly-contested fight, and the fires much severer than they were at any time at Shiloh. The Twenty-third Indiana was now happily relieved. Further to the right the immortal Tenth Ohio, of the Seventeenth Brigade, under Colonel Lytle, who was Acting Brigadier, stood their ground firmly for hours in a perfect rain-storm of shot and shell. At length their leader, the high-souled and heroic Lytle, fell dangerously wounded. The Tenth Ohio was now withdrawn. The battery of Captain Loomis, which had all day piled the enemy in heaps, was now threatened by the enemy, who were throwing their dense columns forward with a view of surrounding and capturing it. The battery was withdrawn toward the wood, but continued to hurl its leaden death-messages at the enemy. A part of Gilbert's command now came superbly into action on the left, driving the enemy before them, though suffering heavily from the fire poured upon them from the stone fence. General Webster was in the mean time killed, as was also Colonel Jouett, of the Fifteenth Kentucky. The first advantage gained by the enemy in the centre was by one of those acts of perfidy which they have never been slow to exhibit. A rebel Colonel, with National uniform on, advanced along to the centre, where the brave Indianians were exposed, and shouted, "Hurrah for the old Hoosier boys!" He was met as a comrade, and by deception the rebels were permitted to advance to within a few yards of our men. A most unexpected and murderous fire was poured upon us from two sides, without our regiment even returning it. The Indiana boys were of course stunned and thrown into temporary confusion. The battle having raged fiercely now for five hours, and the men being exhausted with slaughter, just as night began to conceal the field of death and of blood, the combatants ceased their awful work. Our troops fell back a short distance under cover of the woods, worn and exhausted with their hot day's work. A portion of the rebels held possession of the larger part of the battle-field. We had but twelve thousand troops on the field, which contended with the combined rebel forces, fully forty thousand strong.

THE REBEL RAID INTO PENNSYLVANIA—STUART'S CAVALRY ON THEIR WAY TO

THE POTOMAC.—Sketched near Poolesville, Maryland, by Mr. A. R. Waud.—[See Page 698.]

THE REBEL RAID IN MARYLAND.

On pages 696 and 697 we reproduce a sketch, by Mr. A. R. Waud, representing SHARP'S RIFLE CAVALRY on the Poolesville Road, returning from their recent raid. On page 696 we publish three more pictures on the same subject, from sketches by Mr. Davis. One of these shows the quiet little town of CHAMBERSBURG, which surrendered to the rebels on their approach. They spent the night there, and finding a large quantity of soldiers' clothing in one of the stores, helped themselves to it freely. One of Mr. Davis's pictures shows us the rebels casting off their tattered and filthy butternut attire, and equipping themselves in the comfortable costumes provided for our soldiers. In the morning they fired the storehouse, among others, likewise carried off some 500 horses. Some subtilities estimate the property destroyed and seized by them at fifteen. Of the following account of the marauders is published in the Washington Star:

A lady arrived here this morning from the vicinity of Pa's Ferry states that he was in the presence of General Stuart a few minutes before he moved his rear with the marauding force in retreat from Pennsylvania. Stuart informed him, in a surprised manner, he had left Chambersburg, but regretted he had not accomplished what was intended when he started, as we were not prepared for his attack. Maryland, destroying the Government stores of that place, and destroying the railroad for over two miles, and but that all things taken into consideration, he had carried out his programme with much success. He had captured 1,200 horses looked extremely exhausted, but the former were in high condition. He had also captured 1,200 head of cattle, which had been driven with the horses, and that while they had tied on their extra mules and horses, which numbered about 1,000, a change would be very acceptable, and that their shoes and heels, of which they had a large quantity. Gen. Stuart further said, in addition to a number of United States officers with whom he was acquainted in old times.

The Herald correspondent at Frederick thus speaks of Stuart:

The termination of the rebel cavalry raid did not result in their capture, or any considerable portion of them, as had been hoped.

The strong force under General Pleasanton, which passed through this city at daylight on Sunday morning, reached the vicinity of Poolesville a short time after the main body of the rebels. Both men and horses had had a very hard time, the men having been in the saddle and on the road almost constantly from the time the fact of the rebels having crossed the Potomac above was announced by neither of them seem inclination to render so efficient service as they had done on former occasions.

The rebels made their appearance, and opened a single gun on a hill, as glanced at to cover their passage. One battery was found in position, but not a shot made to silence this gun. The firing was kept up at intervals for about two hours, during which time no harm of any consequence was done.

It is said that no attempt was made to fire upon the cavalry while they were crossing the river, which might easily have been done, and would have had a most important material change upon their by our cavalry and regular them. This can only be accounted for upon the supposition that the horses were too much exhausted to warrant such an attempt. It is also said by hypothesis no small portion of the cavalry would seem to have been most disgraced to them- selves and the service.

Persons who were present and saw the rebels, state that the men were well supported only by about twenty-pounder guns.

The crossing occupied some three or four hours, and from first to last met with no serious opposition. The rebels went on their way with their plunder, no doubt convinced as well as delighted at having escaped so easily. The result was, in fact, nothing which could be called even a skirmish, and for the first time in the war, a standard our troops might as well have been at Harper's Ferry.

THE WAYSIDE HOUSE.

THE traveler who passes along the H——road can hardly fail to remark, in a house of rather unusual shabby appearance on his right. Nothing about that dreary old house, standing desperately near you into decay and desolation. The glass is gone from every window, and there are boards nailed across the openings. Some of the stones that go to form the foundation have crumbled away, and fallen away it is stained with mould, or hidden with a growth of yellow lichen. Weeds grow rank in the parlor, and a few grasses spring even on the highest window-sills, and a little ivy creep about the walls, but the last seem to embrace the general sadness.

Many, many years ago, in that bay window, now almost hidden by the tangled boughs, a father and daughter lingered over the breakfast-table. It was late in the autumn, and the shades of thick leaves made a shelter from the sun, while the air was heavy with the perfume from the flower-beds. There was an air of comfort and even of wealth about every thing, from the chased silver and exquisite china on the table to the fair dress of the young lady. The dark silken folds fell like the rich purple of a queen's robe; her tall figure, and accorded well with the stately beauty of her face and head. The dark hair smoothly braided, the deep-gray eyes with their heavy fringe, the short upper lip, and well-developed chin, the finely-moulded throat set off by the low collar and knot of rose-color, the rich glow that pervaded cheek and lip, all combined to make Honoria Calvert a beautiful woman. Her father considered her more so as he watched her pouring out his tea with a grace and dignity that might have becomed an empress.

"Did I tell you I met an old friend yesterday, Honoria?" asked Mr. Calvert.

"No, Sir; who was it?"

"I hardly know whether you can recollect him, it is so long ago; but he was a pupil of old Brown's when we lived at Hendon, and he sometimes dined with us on Sundays. You were but five or six years old, and he was a great lad of sixteen. His name is Benham."

"Oh yes, I remember him," answered Honoria, with a smile; "Archer Benham used to swing me and let me ride on his shoulder. He was a merry, good-natured boy."

"Well, he seems a pleasant young man enough," said Mr. Calvert, "and I told him we should be happy to see him here. If he should call this afternoon, ask him to stay and dine. I will bring Ellis back with me to make a fourth."

Honoria hoped somebody else was usually chary of her words—but she looked pleased, for she had an agreeable recollection of her old play-fellow, and she liked anything out of the common. Luncheon she opened one of Beethoven's sonatas, and labored vigorously at its complicated chords and movements, thoroughly enjoying and enjoying the difficulty, though she missed the beauty.

"Well, dear, you have made a manly voice, when at length she paused for a little rest; out turning round, she saw a gentleman, whom she easily guessed to be Mr. Benham.

"I beg pardon, Sir," he said, "I am afraid I startled you; you are duly announced, but your grand music drowned my humble name."

She held out her hand and gave him welcome "I think I should have recognized you," he said, looking steadily into his face; "you are very little altered, only older and taller."

He shook back his light brown hair and twirled his mustache with an air of good-humored self-satisfaction, which was pleasant.

"I hardly think I should have known you."

"I was as much surprised," Honoria replied, turning away with a slight blush at the compliment his looks implied. He soon glided into a subject less embarrassing to her, and Honoria returned, bringing his old friend Mr. Ellis, he found the young pair strolling side by side in the shadow of the trees, as natural as if they had been in those old days of which they had been speaking, when Honoria was a child.

The evening passed away cheerfully. Mr. Ellis, who held a confidential situation in the banking house in which Mr. Calvert was a partner, was sensible and well-bred; and while he talked politics with the gentlemen, Honoria and Archer found themes more interesting. There was music, too, to beguile the time. Mr. Benham had a rich tenor voice, and Honoria accompanied him in song, she could accompany him brilliantly. She could talk of pretty things and remember pretty things, for she had felt it more deeply. Certain it is that, if Archer Benham rode slowly home, his thoughts were busy with Honoria Calvert.

She is a glorious creature to look at," he said half aloud, as he turned his horse's head homeward enough. Now every body is out of town, it won't be a bad thing to ride this way occasionally. I shouldn't like to lose sight of that girl—she would look in a rage!"

Such were his reflections; but with Honoria life became serious matter. She had enjoyed that evening's conversation; she had uttered more of her heart's feelings than she had ever yet accustomed to do; her imagination had been warmed and excited by her companion's descriptions of foreign travel, and by the sympathy in the tone of most of his voice.

"What a pleasing young man," remarked her father; "if you seemed to like him, Honoria, and I hope he will come again. He sings well, doesn't he?"

Honoria ignored the question, gave her father a slightly formal kiss on the cheek, and left him to shut her door on the outer world, extinguished her taper, and went to the open window, leaning out among the roses, and inhaling the perfume with the moonlight. There was a half-smile on her lips as she murmured,

"Have I met my fate so today? I could almost think so. All was yesterday so stagnant, so dull, and now—But I will not be a fool."

Days, weeks, and months passed on, and Archer Benham frequently came, and become matters of course. Very commonly Honoria's brother Edward from Oxford, and sometimes a friend or two from London in the afternoon to meet her father, and to dine with them, and Archer Benham was left alone. She was a noble figure on horseback, and Archer had often the playfully given her the title of "Empress," by which he had first addressed her. Mr. Calvert observed all that passed, and was pleased. Mr. Ellis, a confirmed old bachelor, clerk in the Foreign Office, with a small salary, but by no means poor and heir to Sir Archer Benham, of Benham Hall, was not likely to become an eligible match, even for the stately Honoria. As yet he never spoke of love to her, but Honoria could be construed into only one meaning, and Mr. Calvert complacently awaited the event, ready to give her consent whenever Archer should ask it—a consent should arrive.

Honoria never was it with Honoria herself? She was living in a dream of happiness, which she would not pause to analyze. Enough to know, that every day was bringing her to the time when she can be alighthill; or, if he came not, enough to feel that he was near her, or in the twilight stroll in the shrubbery, or—as autumn drew on—at the fireside, or by the piano. Enough to think of the future, and to be suggested to some slight remark of his, and to look out over the broad landscape, and to know he would soon return. For on that summer day when Archer Benham had come to the old house Honoria had "met her fate," and she was conscious of it—that it was so.

Did he love her? She never asked herself the question. Perhaps the reserve occurred to Archer himself, and received a doubtful sort of answer. He liked her society—her conversation always so animated with him; her beauty so brightened and almost glorified by her present happiness. He might, he thought, be drifting on toward matrimony; if so, well and good. It did not much matter; but, at all events, she was handsome enough for an empress, and never enough to make no doubt her father would give her a good portion; and if he should, it would be easy to him, why, all parties would be very well pleased.

So time passed on, and Christmas was coming near. One evening Mr. Calvert had brought Archer in his carriage from London—an unusual and unusually large dinner-party. Honoria came down with her father just before the other guests arrived, and Archer started from his seat to receive her. She never dressed like others of her age, but in a picturesque style of her own, and on this occasion she was more than ordered velvet, with a coronet of chased gold beads on her head.

"You are glorious to-night, Empress!" exclaimed Archer; "allow me to tender my homage. I can not greet you as an ordinary mortal," and he took her hand and kissed her hand. Then he her smiled, and, turning her toward the light, said, "Well, you are very handsome to-night, my dear, though I say it."

"Thank you, papa; it is something to get a compliment from you," said Honoria; and then, to change the subject, she asked if he had read the letter she had left in his room.

Susie's letter do you mean? Yes. Little darling, how glad I shall be to see her at home again!"

"And who else is coming, Sir?" asked Archer.

"Susie is my sister," replied Honoria.

"Your sister! Do you mean to say you have a sister? I never told me so," he exclaimed.

"I wonder you never spoke of Susie in all your talks," said Mr. Calvert. "She was my only other child, and she leaves school at Christmas, to my great joy; for she is a sweet, loving little creature, and the delight of her poor mother."

A silence fell on the three. The father's thoughts were full of Susie's dead girl; Archer wondered how it was that Honoria had never spoken of her sister—her young, only sister. It did not seem natural to him. Honoria felt the cloud of reserve that came over him. She might have told him it was only because she had never thought of him or even mind had been full of him and his interests, that she had never mentioned her little sister; but perhaps it is always a part of the punishment of idolatry such as hers to be misunderstood by its object.

The guests arrived; the momentary cloud dispersed; and Archer could not but admire the perfect grace with which Honoria presided at the feast. He noticed, however, that, though perfectly polite to all, she seemed intimate with none of the ladies present, and wondered what this to her society of them were playing and singing.

"Don't you sometimes you?" he said, slightly shrugging her shoulders. "I am quite used to it. We beauties have no friends. No woman ever loved me except my mother, and she died when I was very little Susie—if I may call that scrap of humanity a woman."

Again Archer was a little startled. He did not like a sarcastic woman. He began to be glad he had not committed love to this hard beauty, who had no friends.

She saw the shadow again; and with her most winning smile, said,

"I am tired of all this insipid music. Come and sing your favorite duet, Mr. Ellis and I."

He did sing—in these full, rich tones that found an echo in her heart. The music was one of Mozart's most beautiful melodies, and Honoria's great eyes were filled with tears when she looked up to Archer's face. It all seemed so wonderful that he might have led him to consult himself by some tender speech, but that Mr. Calvert drew near.

"That is very beautiful, Benham," he said. We must have some duets when Susie comes."

"What! does she sing?" asked Archer.

"She always had a sweet little voice," replied the father; "and now she has been taking lessons. I hope she will sing pleasingly well."

The idea of singing duets with a little girl fresh from school was not very attractive to a musician of Archer's pretensions, but he answered politely, as Honoria would still play the accompaniments. He was going to Devonshire for Christmas, but on his return he would call and bring some music with him to try Susie's voice.

The time passed on, and in January he came. The lamp was lighted, the crimson curtains drawn, and the fire burning merrily, as he entered that cozy drawing-room. Mr. Calvert was up stairs preparing for dinner. Honoria, in a dress of some rich shawl pattern, leaned back in an easy-chair; and in a cushion at her feet nestled a little figure, almost a child in size, but with a face and light hair that Archer said lovingly on Honoria's lap, her blue eyes looking dreamily into Honoria's face. Both started as Mr. Benham entered.

"Welcome!" said Honoria, giving him her hand. "Allow me to present my sister Susie." She continued, turning to the little figure now shyly standing beside her—"this is my sister Susie; Susie, this is my friend Mr. Benham."

Archer took the little childish hand, only half-extended to him, and clasped it kindly as he looked down with interest on the girlish figure before him. Honoria watched him, and a fierce pang shot through her heart. He had many a time regarded her herself with admiration, with amusement, even with kindness; but that look of interest was an expression which she had never seen in his face before. What did it mean?

Mr. Calvert now joined them, and Archer dined with the family. Susie was petted by her father, and her shyness soon abated, so that the gave him a playful reproach for not remembering his little cultural conversation. Honoria was unusually grave, and Archer saw Susie glance uneasily at her occasionally.

"What ails the Empress?" he said, at last; "a sour magnificence, I declare. Are you wearied with the festivities of the season?"

"No," Honoria said, with a faint smile; "we have been very quiet."

"I thought very young ladies had parties at this time of the year," he continued, with a sly glance at Susie.

"Indeed, Mr. Benham," Susie said, laughing, "I am not a very young lady now. It is very hard, because one has an empress for a sister, that one is not glad for a child when one is a young woman of eighteen."

"I beg ten thousand pardons," said Archer. "I had no idea I was offending the dignity of eighteen years. I shall be more discreet for the future."

After dinner the piano was opened, and Susie was coaxed to sing. Truly had her father spoken when he said her voice was sweet. There was a pathos in its tones that went straight to the hearer's heart—a tender sadness that brought tears to the eyes. When she sang alone, and the full, yielding tones rose thrilling and clear, Archer listened with hushed breath. Not a note escaped him. Honoria saw it, as she accompanied her sister, and felt a pang such as she had never known. Then came that after duet, the two lovely voices blending in perfect harmony. Mr. Calvert was beside himself with delight.

"Is it not beautiful, Honoria?" he said; "only Honoria has always played them and sung them so loud. Of course, you know best; but it seems to me they ought to die away with the music."

"I am tired," Honoria said, abruptly, pushing back her chair; "my head aches, and I can play no more. So if you want any more singing, you must play your own accompaniments, Susie."

Archer laughed and said he understood. Also from what bitter anguish of heart does a woman's seeming ill-humor sometimes spring! Susie was kinder.

"How good of you, dear, to play for us so long! How selfish we have been! Of course, we won't sing any more. Sit here and let me rub your head."

Her pretty caressfulness was charming, and Archer watched it with a smile, forgetting to express regret for the pains he was trying to soothe. It was Honoria who said, "Thank you, Susie dear," when Honoria said she would go to her room. She only needed darkness and quiet, a very little resting headache, and no one need be disturbed about it. Archer held the door open as she swept out, and thought what a fine lady she would one day be.

"I fear you are worse than you will acknowledge," he whispered, as he passed him, and he caught sight of her troubled face. He sighed, petted all her pride to her aid, and smiled.

"It is nothing, I assure you. Good-night." And she shook hands.

Her fingers were cold as ice, and he could not forget the expression of her countenance for months before; but his reflections were soon disturbed by Susie Calvert, who begged for more music, and silenced all Susie's objections by the assurance that Honoria could not hear it in her room.

When Archer Benham had fairly shut the door, thrown aside the heavy curtains, and opened the window of which she had stood observing so happily a few short months ago. It was a wild, stormy night. The meadows were covered here and there with patches of snow, which, in the moonlight, and dark clouds were driving over the moon, which shone out at intervals with keen brightness above the saddened landscape. Honoria had gone in the way-scene to Honoria's heated brow. She could have thanked an answer to that wild cry that her eyes were full of despair, as the moonlight fell upon it. She wrung her hands in anguish.

"I cannot, cannot," she murmured. "A love it coming. Fool, fool that I have been, not to foresee it! I knew it from the first moment I saw it. God! I have staked all my happiness, all my peace, and he cares not for me. He will love her. Love her! I know it by the tone of every word he says. Day after day, day after day. Oh! if I might die! I might die!"

Passionate moans and inarticulate cries gave way at last to a burst of tears, and then she beat her troubled forehead of moan of despair. It was plain he did not care; and Susie, too, was hateful, inconsiderate, unfeeling, to sing when her heart was like to break. Honoria's passion was exhausted now, and had given place to an intense hatred of Susie. She rose up shadow with a shudder, drew the curtains, and prepared for bed. Susie's gentle voice pleaded in vain for admittance; and at last a cold "good-night" answered Mr. Calvert's kindly inquiries.

This was the spirit in which Honoria met her beauty trial—the bravest, perhaps, that could be laid on a nature like hers. She had seen the truth. Archer looked at Susie with a gentleness that all Honoria's beauty could not equal. His heart was touched as it had never been touched before. All that was best in her was called forth by his young, tender creature, who could but love him in return for his kindness. And Honoria recalled good qualities she very naturally saw in him. Oh! what days and weeks of torture for Honoria! She sang down, she was the poor slave of misery, the anguish of her jealousy, she were a smiling face in public of a breaking heart. She watched Archer as a friend, and talked to him as of old, when her sister was out by. Susie was so occupied with the strange joy of being introduced into the ball saloon time to wonder at Honoria's wayward manner—sometimes so full of affection toward herself, sometimes so cold and stern as almost to frighten her gentler spirit. Still the crisis had not come—Archer had not spoken of love to Honoria nor Susie alone. There was to be yet one more drop of bitterness in Honoria's cup. Archer had forgotten, as it was easy for men to do, some old time when he had dreamed of the possibility of making Honoria his wife. Now that he knew Susie's character, and as such, of course, his friend. He could find no opportunities of speaking to Susie. He believed he could win her love easily, but would he open still wider with wonder! He would speak to Honoria. She loved her sister, and would have all about her feelings, and speak for him. So he watched for an occasion, and soon found it.

"You know so well what admiration it, fair Empress," he began; but Honoria shrank away, as if she had been stung. "Forgive me," he continued; "perhaps that address is imperfectly familiar. I only meant that, used as you are to homage, you must know what admiration you inspire your sister. She is so young and gentle, I am afraid that she may be her; and if you will stand my friend I shall be eternally grateful to you."

He paused; but she kept her eyes fixed on the ground, and said, in a low voice,

"What would you have me do?"

"Will you advise me?" he asked. "I am so afraid of speaking too soon. Will you talk to her of me, and prepare her for my declaration?"

"On one condition," Honoria answered.

"What is it?"

"That you promise not to speak till I give you warning. You will ruin your own cause if you speak too soon."

Archer hesitated; then said, smiling, "Well, I promise; only you must not try me too long."

She wondered at herself for the composure with which she now could go through scenes like this one. No one knew what passed in the solitude of her own chamber, when the tall, proud form lay stretched on the ground, as if crushed by some heavy blow; no human eye saw the haggard face, peering out in the moonlight, the clenched hands raised in a mad supplication for death. Morning found her in her usual place at the breakfast-table, calm and attentive to her duties, ready to listen to her father's plans, and to take her part in conversation. There was no outward change, or, at least, Mr. Calvert perceived none; and if he was a little puzzled at seeing Mr. Benham devote himself to Susie quite as much as to Honoria, yet he made no remark, and concluded, probably, that it was a natural consequence of the little girl's pretty voice.

But a dark shadow hung over the old house. Mr. Calvert was seized with a fit at his office, and almost instantly expired, only the day after Archer had made his appeal to Honoria for her assistance. The sisters were overwhelmed with sorrow, and Susie drooped at once, like some tender plant beaten down by the storm. When Mr. Ellis arrived to announce the sad news, he found the sisters sitting together busied with some womanly work. His face betrayed that he was the bearer of evil tidings. He tried to tell them cautiously, but when Susie understood the truth she dropped from her seat like one heart-stricken.

"Poor child!" Mr. Ellis said, kindly, as he raised her in his arms as gently as if she had been his own daughter. "Let me carry her to her room, Miss Calvert; she will be better there."

Pale and wan, but tearless still, Honoria led the way, and Susie was carried to her room. The sun was shining gayly in, but Honoria, almost impatiently, drew the heavy curtains to shut out the daylight; and begging Mr. Ellis to send Susie's old nurse, who was still a favored member of the household, she began to undress the poor child. The swoon lasted long; and for many a day afterward Susie lay, feeble as an infant, with wide-open eyes, scarcely speaking, even to old nurse, who sat beside the bed, working at the black garments, and wishing for cries or tears, or any thing rather than that strange stillness.

Meanwhile, Honoria came and went through the darkened chambers, gloomy, hopeless, and most miserable. She saw no one but Mr. Ellis, who had been named in Mr. Calvert's will as one of Susie's guardians, while Honoria herself was the other. The property, which was considerable, was divided equally between the two sisters; and in the event of one of them dying all was to belong to the survivor.

"Arrange all as you think best," Honoria said to Mr. Ellis; "only I shall remain in this house with Susie. I do not care for any thing else."

Mr. Ellis offered his wife's assistance.

"No," Honoria replied; "you are very kind, but we can do very well. I am glad to have something to do;" and she sighed drearily. About one thing she was obstinate—she would not see Archer Benham. He called, he sent messages through Mr. Ellis, he wrote imploring letters, but all in vain; she always sent the same answer, "He must wait."

So the weary weeks passed on, and Susie could yet only bear to be lifted from the bed to the sofa; but she sometimes spoke of her father with quiet tears that the nurse rejoiced to see. Strength might return to the delicate frame, enfeebled by so severe a shock, now that the mind was clear and calm. And all this time there was a heart beating only for her. Archer longed to defend her with his strong, loving arms against all the cares, all the sorrows, all the unkindness of the world. If she had only known!

One day Honoria was beside her sister's couch, silently watching the thin fingers braiding some pretty work. It was so still outside that they could hear the approach of a horseman, and presently a voice almost under the window asked for Miss Calvert. Honoria saw the color rise in Susie's cheek, the eyes fill with moisture, the trembling hands drop the work. She saw how the tender little heart yearned with eager longing at the sound of that voice, but she had no pity then. She rose, pressing her hand on her heart, and left the room. With that burning, passionate jealousy in her soul she dared not stay beside her sister. She went to her room, the scene so often of her fearful mental struggles, and sat down, gasping for breath, and shuddering at her own thoughts. A knock roused her, and the servant put a letter into her hand.

"Mr. Benham says, Will you be good enough to see him, only for five minutes, Miss Calvert?"

"I can not see him," she answered, hoarsely. "Tell him I will write."

She sat listening till she heard him ride slowly away; then she rose and went to the window, whence she watched the solitary horseman as long as he was in sight. Almost with a groan she then broke the seal of the letter she had held all this time. An inclosure fell out, addressed to Susie; she laid it aside, and read the sheet addressed to herself. In it Archer implored her forgiveness, but he could wait no longer. Surely, if Susie loved him, it would be a comfort to her to receive the assurance of his deep and unalterable affection. Would she not give him some hope? He could not stay so near and not try to see her. If Susie would not give him an answer now, would she name a time when he might come? Might he return in a month—two months—three months? Meantime he would go abroad. He would not harass her for the world; he would be a wanderer till she bade him come; only let him have a hope, he asked no more.

There was a cold, cruel gleam in Honoria's eye as she read. The jealous passion she had nursed had grown beyond her unassisted human strength now, and she yielded to its whispers. Lighting a candle, she held Susie's letter in the flame till it blazed, then threw it on the hearth, and stood watching it till the last particle was consumed; then she sat at her desk and wrote, without glancing at the open sheet that lay beside her.

"Susie can not, will not listen to you now. You will lose her forever if you persist in writing. Her heart is full of her father, and she thinks it sacrilege to talk of any other love now. Your plan of going abroad is excellent. Leave her to me and go. In three months you may return." For a moment she paused. Implied falsehood had been but too easy; a direct untruth was harder. Again her evil spirit prompted, and she listened. A very few words were added. "Susie bids me say so."

She dared not read what she had written. Hastily sealing and directing it, and only pausing to crush Archer's letter into a secret drawer of her desk, she took her note to the hall, and put it into the letter-bag herself. She could not stop to think, but went straight to Susie's room. The poor child looked up with eager, wistful eyes, and her lips were white with agitation. Honoria moved out of reach of her glance, and said, as easily as she could—

"I have had a note from our friend Mr. Benham. He inquires kindly for us, and is just going abroad."

Her ear caught a low, shivering sigh, but there was no answer; and when she ventured to turn from the window the little fingers were busy with their delicate work again. Honoria smiled bitterly.

"She does not care much, after all," she thought.

A few days later Mr. Ellis mentioned, accidentally, that Mr. Benham was gone abroad for three months. Honoria replied that she had heard so from himself, and then the subject was dropped, and Archer's name was mentioned no more.

Summer was coming with its roses, but no roses returned to Susie's cheek. The doctor, whom Honoria anxiously consulted, said the nerves had sustained so severe a shock in her father's sudden death that she could only rally by very slow degrees. The old nurse trembled for her darling, and called Honoria's attention to the fact that Susie grew weaker. The old woman carried her about like a child, and Susie liked to be taken to the couch in the bay-windowed room, to lie listening to the whispering leaves and dreaming over the past.

Honoria herself was fearfully changed. Her cheek was hollow, her eye burned with a restless fire. Sleep seldom visited her. Through the long nights she wandered up and down her room, pausing at the window to watch the gray dawn stealing up the sky, or to gaze over the meadow-land, where the grass was once more rich and high, as in the time last year when Archer Benham first came to the old house. Thoughts which almost maddened her rushed over her brain in those miserable nights.

"Was Susie really dying, as nurse feared? Was it only grief for her father's death? Would the knowledge, the blessed certainty that she was beloved, send fresh life through those veins, fresh vigor into that fading form? Should she hear the truth soon—to-morrow? No: Honoria would wait till she knew where he was, and could summon him. She knew not now any thing of his whereabouts; she must wait. Only three months, and he would come, and then......and then......"

Two-thirds of the time had rolled away. It was a lovely day in June, and the blackbird was piping in the pink-thorn whose bloomy boughs shadowed the bay-window. Susie was on her couch facing the garden, and Honoria sat with her back to the light, looking at her sister, and trying to fancy she was better. Susie shook her head in reply to some remark of Honoria's. "I have taken my last walk, dear," she said; "you must learn to do without little Susie."

Honoria hid her face in her hands, when suddenly she was startled by a low cry, and, looking up, she saw Susie raising herself on the couch, with outstretched hands and glowing cheek, her eyes intently gazing out of the window. Honoria turned. He was there; pale, travel-worn, altered—but it was Archer Benham.

In a few moments he was in the room, kneeling by the couch, Susie's little head lying on his bosom in an ecstasy of joy. Tender as a mother's were his low, caressing words: "My little one, my dove, my darling, why did you send me away?"

He could only think of the bliss of seeing her again at first. Honoria sat spell-bound, till at last he turned to her, and said, fiercely, "Why was I not warned of this? Why did you not tell me? I heard from a stranger that she was ill."

"How could I know where you were?" faltered Honoria.

"You knew my uncle's address," he said; then, turning to Susie, "Why did you not answer my letter, my little one? Why not tell me I should be welcome? One word would have brought me, as I told you. Why did you not write!" Susie looked up astonished.

"Letter!" she said; "I had no letter."

Honoria hid her face, and the truth flashed on Archer that he had been deceived. He started to his feet and confronted her.

"You did not give her my letter?" he asked, seizing her wrist. "Where is it?"

"I destroyed it."

The words sounded unnaturally hollow. He stood a moment, as if paralyzed; then a low moan from Susie roused him, and he flew to his place by the couch, where the poor child lay cold and still, faint with terror.

"God forgive you!" he muttered, as he turned from Honoria. "You have murdered your sister."

It was too true. Joy came too late to save the young life, blighted by sorrow and falsehood. The next day, with words of Christian forgiveness and Christian hope on her lips, Susie's spirit passed into the world where sorrow is unknown. Honoria had confessed all, and Susie had earnestly pleaded with Archer; but Honoria felt that his seeming pardon was but spoken to pacify her sister, and that in reality he shrank from her with disgust. One promise Susie had exacted from her old nurse; it was that she should always remain with Honoria. Even Susie's influence would have failed here had the old woman known the truth, but none ever knew it except the three persons concerned.

The funeral moved away from the house, and once more Honoria gazed from the window, wild and hopeless, as the body of her only sister was carried to the grave. From that day she never again saw the face of Archer Benham, nor did any friendly foot ever cross her threshold. With Mr. Ellis she would only communicate by letter on matters of business. She dismissed every servant except the gardener, his wife, and the old nurse. She never left the house by day, only in the twilight she would steal into the garden or shrubbery, and wander for hours like a restless ghost; and many a time the passing traveler might be startled by the sight of a white, despairing face looking drearily out of one of the upper windows. Who shall say whether peace ever came to that proud and sinful heart? Death took her after many years. The nurse, entering her room one morning, found the bed had not been occupied, but on the floor under the window lay Honoria, her gray hair unbound, her hands clasped as if in supplication. She was dead.

Her will left all her large fortune to different charitable institutions, after providing for her servants. The house she bequeathed, without remark, to Archer Benham, now a baronet and in possession of Benham Park, but still a sad and solitary man. By his order the furniture was sold, with the exception of some few things he reserved for himself. In the secret drawer of Honoria's desk he found a crushed letter, which he tore and flung to the winds; the other papers he handed to Mr. Ellis. After the sale, he ordered that the house should be shut up and left to decay. The very windows had been removed, and replaced by boards, and neglect soon did its work. The once cheerful home is now but a desolate ruin, which the traveler can scarcely pass without a sigh, even when the history of its former inmates is unknown to him.

THE PIRATE "ALABAMA," ALIAS "290."

WE publish on page 689 a faithful portrait of the new PIRATE "ALABAMA," alias "290," which was built by the British a few months since to prey upon our merchant navy, and which has already taken and burned fourteen vessels of various sizes. She is commanded by Captain Raphael Semmes, late of the Sumter. Captain Hager, of the Brilliant, one of the vessels taken and burned by the Alabama describes her as follows:

The Alabama was built at Liverpool, or Birkenhead, and left the latter port in August last; is about 1200 tons burden, draught about fourteen feet; engines by Laird & Sons, of Birkenhead, 1862. She is a wooden vessel, propelled by a screw, copper bottom, about 210 feet long, rather narrow, painted black outside and drab inside; has a round stern, billet head, very little shear, flush deck fore and aft; a bridge forward of the smoke stack carries two large black boats on cranes amidships forward of the main rigging; two black quarter boats between the main and mizen masts, one small black boat over the stern, on cranes; the spare spars, on a gallows between the bridge and foremast, show above the rail. She carries three long thirty-two pounders on a side, and is pierced for two more amidships; has a one hundred-pound rifled pivot gun forward of the bridge, and a sixty-eight pound pivot on the main deck; has tracks laid forward for a pivot bow gun, and tracks aft for a pivot stern chaser—all of which she will take on board to complete her armament. Her guns are of the Blakely pattern, and manufactured by Wesley & Preston, Liverpool, 1862. She is bark rigged; has very long, bright lower masts, and black mast-heads; yards black, long yard-arms, short poles (say one to two feet), with small dog-vanes on each, and a pendant to the main; studding-sail booms on the fore and main, and has wire rigging. Carries on her foremast a square foresail; large try-sail with two reefs, and a bonnet top-sail with two reefs, top-gallant sail and royal. On the mainmast a large try-sail with two reefs and a bonnet. No square mainsail bent, top-sail two reefs, top-gallant sail and royal. On the mizen-mast, a very large spanker and a short three-cornered gaff top-sail; has a fore and foretop-mast stay-sail and jib; has had no stay-sail to the main or mizen-mast bent or royal yards aloft. Is represented to go thirteen knots under canvas and fifteen under steam. Can get steam in twenty minutes, but seldom uses it except in a chase or an emergency. Has all national flags, but usually sets the St. George's cross on approaching a vessel. Her present complement of men is one hundred and twenty, all told, but is anxious to ship more. Keeps a man at the mast-head from daylight till sunset. Her sails are of hemp canvas, made very roaching; the top-sails have twenty cloths on the head and thirty on the foot. General appearance of the hull and sails decidedly English. She is generally under two top-sails, fore and main try-sails; fore and foretop-mast stay-sails; sometimes top-gallant-sails and jib, but seldom any sails on the mizen except while in charge of a vessel. She is very slow in stays; generally wears ship. She was built expressly for the business. She is engaged to destroy, fight, or run, as the character of her opponent may be. She took her armament and crew and most of her officers on board near Terceira, Western Islands, from an English vessel. Her crew are principally English; the officers chivalry of the South. All the water consumed on board is condensed. She has eight months' provisions, besides what is being plundered, and has about four hundred tons of coal on board.

He gives the following additional information, which will be found interesting and important:

In all cases where Captain Semmes captures a vessel, he sends an armed boat on board and orders the unfortunate captain on board the Alabama with his papers. On his arrival he is ushered into the presence of the pirate Semmes, who receives him in the most pompous and overbearing manner. He is questioned as to the name of the ship, where from, where bound, and the character of his cargo. Captain Hagar, in reply to the latter question, said that some of his cargo was on English account. On his giving this reply Semmes scowled at him and remarked, "Do you take me for a d—d fool? Where are the proofs that part of your cargo is on English account?"

The papers, unfortunately, not having the Consular seal attached, were not considered proof, and the Brilliant and her cargo were in consequence seized by Semmes as a prize.

When Captain Hagar left the Alabama there were between forty and fifty of the crews of the different vessels she had destroyed still on board. They were confined below in irons, in the most miserable condition. They were where every drop of rain fell on them, and every sea that came aboard the vessel washed over them, and the poor fellows were in a terrible plight, having lost every thing, with the vessels they belonged to, the pirates permitting no baggage, except the very smallest quantity, to be brought away from the prizes before they were destroyed. They had the satisfaction of knowing, however, that it could not be long before they would be released; for Semmes could not afford to have his ship filled up with prisoners.

The plan that Semmes has adopted to bring fish to his net is as follows: It will be seen at a glance that the position he was last reported in was in the track of many vessels bound to and from Europe. This is the position he has chosen to do the greatest possible amount of destruction; and he certainly has been most successful. Whenever he captures a ship, after taking from her all that he and his officers want, he lays by her until dark, and then sets her on fire. The light of the burning ship can be seen many miles, and every other ship within seeing distance stands toward the light, thinking to rescue a number of poor fellows from destruction. The pirate keeps in the immediate vicinity awaiting the prey that is sure to come, and the next morning the poor fellows who have, to serve the cause of humanity, gone many miles out of their course, find themselves under the guns of the Alabama, with the certainty that before another twenty-four hours they will share the fate of the ship they came to serve.

This plan will enable him to destroy an immense amount of property without much cruising. He can lay in one position and gather the ships around him during the night ready for operations on the coming day for weeks to come; for it will be a long time before his depredations can be made known.

Again, he will be enabled to cruise for an indefinite length of time; for he uses no coal, depending upon his canvas entirely, which, it seems, is all-sufficient for his purpose. He carries stores for eight months, and can always replenish from the prizes he may take. He will be here to-day, there to-morrow, and will be certain to be found where no one is looking for him. Looking for him will be like "looking for a needle in a haystack," and with the majority of vessels we have cruising at the present time, should one of them be fortunate enough to see him, all we shall benefit thereby will be a look, and so it will continue to be until we have ships of greater speed than we now possess or expect soon to have.

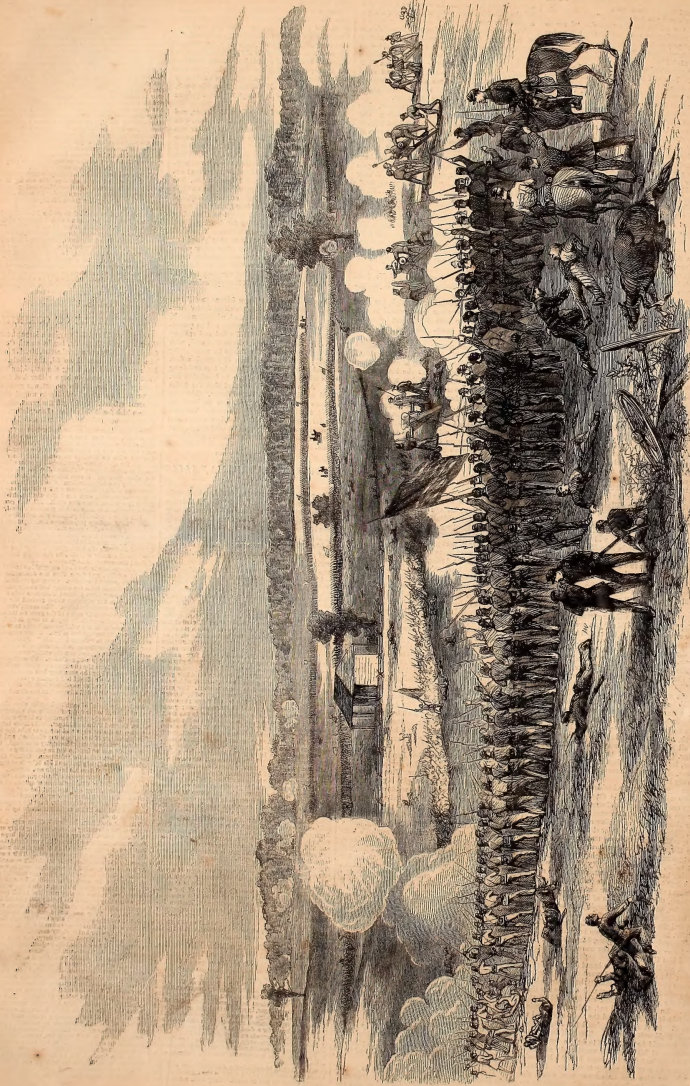
THE BATTLE OF CORINTH.

ON pages 692 and 701 we give a large picture of the BATTLE OF CORINTH, fought on 4th October, from a sketch by our special artist, Mr. A. Simplot. The battle commenced on 3d, the rebels under Price and Van Dorn being the attacking party. That day they seem to have rather had the advantage. On the 4th the contest was renewed at daybreak. For some hours it was waged with indifferent success. At length the great effort was made which forms the subject of our picture. The Tribune correspondent describes it as follows:

For a time there were no demonstrations on the part of the enemy, and they remained altogether quiet in the angle of the woods near the railroad. Presently two lines were formed, one at right angles to the other—the one destined with its reserves to sweep over the railroad, through the abattis into the village—the other with its reserves to attack battery "Robinett," which was the key to the whole position. It once taken and held, Corinth was undeniably in rebel possession. The line destined for the occupation of the village came rapidly forward at a charge across the railroad, over the fallen timber, driving the Union line before them like chaff. All that grape and canister could do to impede their progress was attempted, but still their irresistible progress was not stayed. Batteries of light artillery played upon their front and left incessantly; their colors were thrice shot away; but they came still onward, nor halted until they reached the public square, and formed in line of battle directly in front of General Halleck's old head-quarters. Our line of battle was formed directly opposite, in the street leading past General Rosecrans's head-quarters.

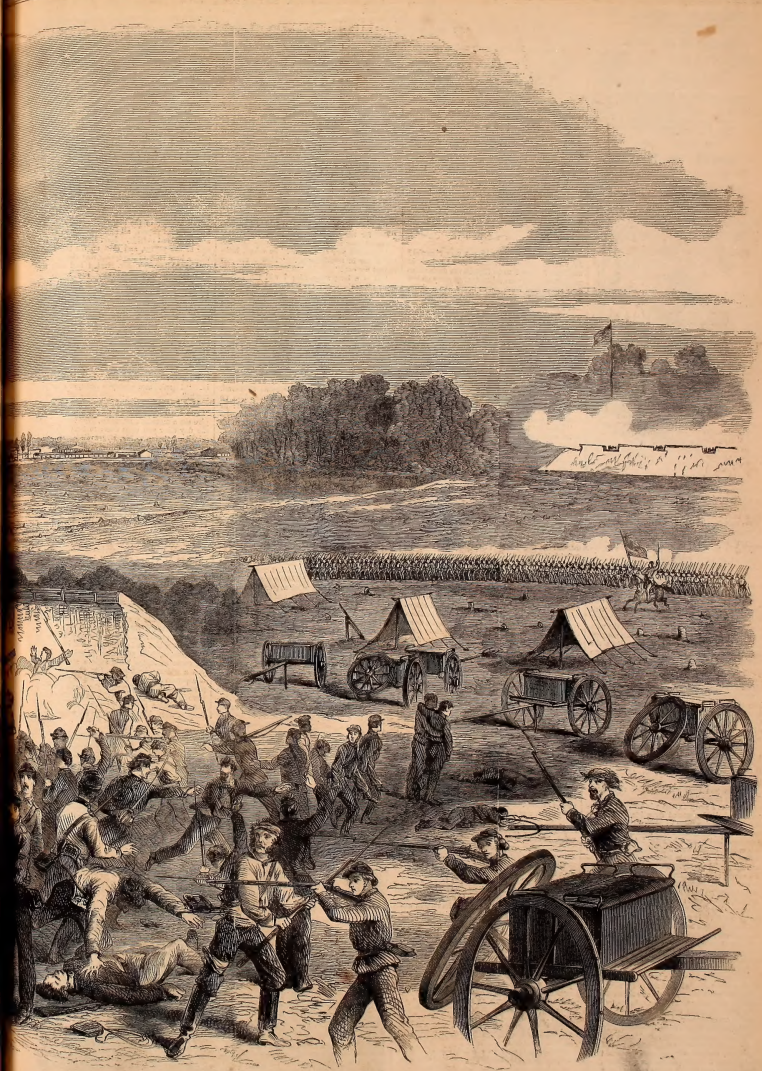
The two armies advanced and engaged in a terrible hand-to-hand conflict, and for a time the destruction of the Union line seemed inevitable. Our army gradually yielded, and fell back until the enemy had nearly reached the Corinth House. Here General Rosecrans rode along the line, and in a few cheering words revived the drooping courage of the wearied soldiers. The enemy's reserve was at this time directly in range of the guns on the redoubts to the left, and huge shells began to drop in their midst, whose explosion in the solid masses began to create considerable confusion and loss of life. At the same time the order was given to "charge bayonets." At this command our brave soldiers sprang to their work with a will. They attacked vigorously, and soon the enemy were flying across the public square in wild confusion. The explosion of the fiery missiles from the two batteries added haste to their movements, and by the time they had reached the cover of the timber their retreat had become a rout.

By the time this line was driven back the other line with their reserves were well advanced in the direction of battery "Robinett."



During the period of seeming inaction when the enemy had withdrawn to the cover of the timber, while preparing to make the two charges as recorded in the preceding narrative, General Price and his principal officers held a consultation to devise ways and means to take the battery. The importance of its capture was admitted, and the risk and danger of the attempt thoroughly canvassed. General Price would not undertake the responsibility of ordering the attack, but called for volunteers. Colonel Rogers of Arkansas immediately tendered his brigade as the forlorn hope, and Colonel Ross his brigade as a support.

They massed their troops eight deep, and advanced under a heavy fire of double charges of grape and canister. A terrible enfilading and flanking fire was poured upon them from every battery bearing in that direction, aided by incessant volleys of musketry from the supports of the batteries and the Union regiments drawn up in line parallel with them.



The first shell from Battery William exploded in the centre of the advancing column, sending thirty or forty to their long home. Every discharge caused huge gaps in their ranks. An eye-witness of that wonderful charge says that he can compare the effect of our fire to nothing but the falling of grain before the scythe. This tremendous mortality did not affect their irresistible onward march. As fast as one man fell his comrade stepped forward in his place. I doubt whether history has ever recorded a charge characterized by such determined valor and bravery. Twice did they approach almost to the outer works of the battery, and twice were they compelled to fall back. The third time they reached the battery and planted their flag upon the edge. It was shot down, raised again, and again shot down. They swarmed about the battery; they climbed over the parapets; they fired through the escarpments, and for a time it seemed as if they had secured the victory their valor had so richly earned.

When they obtained the battery, our men who were working it fell back behind the projecting earth-works, out of reach from our shells, and immediately all the batteries bearing upon the position were turned upon Battery Robinett, and soon a shower of missiles were falling like hail upon the brave intruders. No mortal man could stand the fire, and they retreated. Slowly the brave remnant turned their unwilling steps toward the forest from which they started, when the order was given to the two regiments supporting the battery to charge. This order was splendidly executed. The miserable remnant of troops whom the batteries had nearly destroyed was now almost annihilated. A few scattering troops were all that remained of the column which so valiantly attacked the battery scarcely an hour before. The dead bodies of rebels were piled up in and about the intrenchments, in some places eight and ten deep. In one place directly in front of the point of assault 216 dead bodies were found within a space of a hundred feet by four, among them the commanders of both brigades making the assault—Colonel Rogers and Colonel Ross.

This was the termination of the engagement.

THE FIFTH SCENE.

BALIOL COTTAGE, DUMFRIES.

TOWARD eleven o'clock on the morning of the 21st of November the breakfast-table at Baliol Cottage presented that essentially comfortless appearance which is caused by a meal in a state of transition—that is to say, by a meal prepared for two persons, which has been already partaken of by one, and which has not yet been approached by the other. It must be a hardy appetite which can contemplate without a momentary discouragement the battered egg-shell, the fish half stripped to a skeleton, the crumbs on the plate, and the dregs in the cup. There is surely a wise submission to those weaknesses in human nature which must be respected and not reproved, in the sympathizing quality with which servants in places of public refreshment clear away all signs of the contented past from the eyes of the customer in the present. Although his predecessor may have been the wife of his bosom or the child of his loins, no man can find himself confronted at table by the traces of a vanished eater without a passing sense of injury in connection with the idea of his own meal.

Some such impression as this found its way into the mind of Mr. Noel Vanstone when he entered the lonely breakfast-parlor at Baliol Cottage shortly after eleven o'clock. He looked at the table with a frown, and rang the bell with an expression of disgust.

"Clear away this mess!" he said, when the servant appeared. "Has your mistress gone?"

"Yes, sir—nearly an hour ago."

"Is Louisa down stairs?"

"Yes, Sir."

"When you have put the table right send Louisa up to me."

He walked away to the window. The momentary irritation passed from his face, but it left an expression there which remained under compression of pluming discontent. Personally, his marriage had altered him for the worse. His wizen little cheeks were beginning to shrink into hollows; his frail little figure had already contracted a slight stoop. The former delicacy of his complexion had gone—the sickly paleness of it was all that remained. His thin fiaxen moustaches were no longer pragmatically waxed and twisted into a curl: their weak feathery ends hung meekly pendent over the quivering corners of his mouth. If the ten or twelve weeks since his marriage had been counted by his looks, they might have recorded as ten or twelve years. He stood at the window mechanically picking leaves from a pot of basil placed in front of it, and dreamily humming the forlorn fragment of a tune.

The prospect from the window overlooked the course of the Nith, at the bend of the river a few miles from Dumfries. Here and there, through wintry gaps in the wooded bank, broad tracts of the level cultivated valley met the eye. Boats passed on the river and carts plodded along the high-road on their way to Dumfries. The sky was clear; the November sun shone as pleasantly as if the year had been younger by two good months; and the view, noted in Scotland for its bright and peaceful charms, was presented at the best which its wintry aspect could assume. If it had been hidden in mist or threatened with rain Mr. Noel Vanstone would, to all appearance, have found it as attractive as he found it now. He waited at the window until he heard Louisa's knock at the door—then turned back sullenly to the breakfast-table and told her to come in.

"Make you tea," he said, as if now nothing about it. I'm left here neglected. Nobody helps me."

The discreet Louisa silently and submissively obeyed.

"Did your mistress leave any message for me," he asked, "before she went away?"

"No message in particular, Sir. My mistress only said she should be out late if she visited Braygrave."

"Did she say nothing else?"

She told me, at the carriage-door, Sir, that she would most likely be back by the end of the week."

"Was she in good spirits at the carriage-door?"

"No, Sir. I thought my mistress seemed very anxious and uneasy. Is there any thing wrong, Sir?"

"I don't know. Wait a minute."

He proceeded discontentedly with his breakfast. Louisa waited resignedly at the door.

"I think your mistress has been in bad spirits lately," he resumed, with a sudden outbreak of petulance.

"My mistress has not been very cheerful, Sir."

"What do you mean by not very cheerful? Do you mean to prevaricate? Am I nobody in the house? Am I to be kept in the dark about every thing? Is your mistress to go away on her own affairs and leave me at home like a child, and am I not even to ask a question about her? Am I to be prevaricated with by a servant? I won't be prevaricated with! I repeat my question. What do you mean by not very cheerful?"

"I only meant that my mistress was not in good spirits, Sir."

"Why couldn't you say it then? Don't you know the value of words? The most dreadful consequences sometimes happen from not knowing the value of words. Did your mistress tell you she was going to London?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Did she tell you think when your mistress told you she was going to London? Did you think it odd she was going without me?"

"I did not presume to think it odd, Sir. Is there any thing more I can do for you, if you please, Sir?"

"What sort of a morning is it out? Is it warm? Is the sun on the garden?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Have you seen the sun yourself on the garden?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Get me my great-coat; I'll take a little turn. Where's the hair-brush? Ah, there it is—the nob brush it yourself? What do you mean by saying he has brushed it, when you didn't see him? Let me look at it. Humph! there's a speck of dust on the tails I'll turn the man off! Help me on with it."

Louisa helped him on with his coat, and gave him his hat. He went out irritably. The wind was a large one (it had belonged to his father); the hat was a large one (it was a misfit, purchased in a hurry by himself). The wind took the garden-walk. The path sloped gently from the back of the house to the river, which it followed, as was carried by a low wooden fence. After pacing backward and forward slowly for some little time, he stopped at the further extremity of the garden, and, leaning on the fence, looked down listlessly at the smooth flow of the river.

His thoughts still ran on the subject of his first painful experience in London. Even considering over the circumstances under which his wife had left the cottage that morning, and over the want of consideration toward himself implied in the manner of her departure. The longer he thought of his grievance the more he magnified the atrocity of the garden, and, leaning on the fence, looked down listlessly at the smooth flow of the river.

The longer he thought of his grievance the more he magnified the atrocity of the conduct. Although his predecessor may have been the wife of his bosom or the child of his loins, no man can find himself confronted at table by the traces of a vanished eater without a passing sense of injury in connection with the idea of his own meal.

Some such impression as this found its way into the mind of Mr. Noel Vanstone when he entered the lonely breakfast-parlor at Baliol Cottage shortly after eleven o'clock. He looked at the table with a frown, and rang the bell with an expression of disgust.

"Clear away this mess!" he said, when the servant appeared. "Has your mistress gone?"

"Yes, Sir—nearly an hour ago."

"Is Louisa down stairs?"

"Yes, Sir."

"When you have put the table right send Louisa up to me."

He walked away to the window. The momentary irritation passed from his face, but it left an expression there which remained under compression of pluming discontent. Personally, his marriage had altered him for the worse. His wizen little cheeks were beginning to shrink into hollows; his frail little figure had already contracted a slight stoop. The former delicacy of his complexion had gone—the sickly paleness of it was all that remained. His thin flaxen moustaches were no longer pragmatically waxed and twisted into a curl: their weak feathery ends hung meekly pendent over the quivering corners of his mouth. If the ten or twelve weeks since his marriage had been counted by his looks, they might have recorded as ten or twelve years. He stood at the window mechanically picking leaves from a pot of basil placed in front of it, and dreamily humming the forlorn fragment of a tune.

The prospect from the window overlooked the course of the Nith, at the bend of the river a few miles from Dumfries. Here and there, through wintry gaps in the wooded bank, broad tracts of the level cultivated valley met the eye. Boats passed on the river and carts plodded along the high-road on their way to Dumfries. The sky was clear; the November sun shone as pleasantly as if the year had been younger by two good months; and the view, noted in Scotland for its bright and peaceful charms, was presented at the best which its wintry aspect could assume. If it had been hidden in mist or threatened with rain Mr. Noel Vanstone would, to all appearance, have found it as attractive as he found it now. He waited at the window until he heard Louisa's knock at the door—then turned back sullenly to the breakfast-table and told her to come in.

"Make you tea," he said, as if now nothing about it. I'm left here neglected. Nobody helps me."

The discreet Louisa silently and submissively obeyed.

"Did your mistress leave any message for me," he asked, "before she went away?"

"No message in particular, Sir. My mistress only said she should be out late if she visited Braygrave."

"Did she say nothing else?"

She told me, at the carriage-door, Sir, that she would most likely be back by the end of the week."

"Was she in good spirits at the carriage-door?"

"No, Sir. I thought my mistress seemed very anxious and uneasy. Is there any thing wrong, Sir?"

"I don't know. Wait a minute."

He proceeded discontentedly with his breakfast. Louisa waited resignedly at the door.

"I think your mistress has been in bad spirits lately," he resumed, with a sudden outbreak of petulance.

"My mistress has not been very cheerful, Sir."

"What do you mean by not very cheerful? Do you mean to prevaricate? Am I nobody in the house? Am I to be kept in the dark about every thing? Is your mistress to go away on her own affairs and leave me at home like a child, and am I not even to ask a question about her? Am I to be prevaricated with by a servant? I won't be prevaricated with! I repeat my question. What do you mean by not very cheerful?"

"I only meant that my mistress was not in good spirits, Sir."

"Why couldn't you say it then? Don't you know the value of words? The most dreadful consequences sometimes happen from not knowing the value of words. Did your mistress tell you she was going to London?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Did she tell you think when your mistress told you she was going to London? Did you think it odd she was going without me?"

"I did not presume to think it odd, Sir. Is there any thing more I can do for you, if you please, Sir?"

"What sort of a morning is it out? Is it warm? Is the sun on the garden?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Have you seen the sun yourself on the garden?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Get me my great-coat; I'll take a little turn. Where's the hair-brush? Ah, there it is—the nob brush it yourself? What do you mean by saying he has brushed it, when you didn't see him? Let me look at it. Humph! there's a speck of dust on the tails I'll turn the man off! Help me on with it."

Louisa helped him on with his coat, and gave him his hat. He went out irritably. The wind was a large one (it had belonged to his father); the hat was a large one (it was a misfit, purchased in a hurry by himself). The wind took the garden-walk. The path sloped gently from the back of the house to the river, which it followed, as was carried by a low wooden fence. After pacing backward and forward slowly for some little time, he stopped at the further extremity of the garden, and, leaning on the fence, looked down listlessly at the smooth flow of the river.

His thoughts still ran on the subject of his first painful experience in London. Even considering over the circumstances under which his wife had left the cottage that morning, and over the want of consideration toward himself implied in the manner of her departure. The longer he thought of his grievance the more he magnified the atrocity of the conduct. He was capable of great tenderness of feeling where any injury to his sense of his own importance was concerned. His head ached little by little on his arms, as they rested on the fence; and, in the deep obscurity of his mortification, he sighed bitterly.

The sigh was answered by a voice close at his side.

"You were happier with me, Sir," said the voice, in accents of tender reproach.

He looked up with a scream—literally with a scream—and confronted Mrs. Lecount.

Was it the specter of his wife, or the woman herself? Her hair was white; her face had fallen away; her eyes looked out large, bright, haggard over her hollow cheeks. She was withered and old. Her dress hung loose round her wasted figure; not a trace of its bygone sensual beauty remained. The quietly impenetrable resolution, the smoothly insinuating voice and manner were the only relics of the past which sickness and suffering had left in Mrs. Lecount.

"Compose yourself, Mr. Noel," she said, gently. "You have no cause to be alarmed at seeing me. Your servant, when I inquired, said you were in the garden, and I came here to find you. I have traced you out, Sir, with no resentment against yourself, with no other desire than to show you by so much as the shadow of a reproach, I came here on what has been, and is still, the business of my life—your service."

He recovered himself a little, but he was still incapable of speech. He held fast by the fence, and stared at her.

"Try to possess your mind, Sir, of what I say," proceeded Mrs. Lecount. "I have not come here as your enemy, but as your friend. I have been ill, and cruelly used by sickness; I have been cruelly used by distress. Nothing remains of me but my heart. My heart forgives you; my heart, in your sore need—Need which you have yet to feel—places me at your service. Take my arm, Mr. Noel. A little turn in the sun will help you to recover yourself."

She put his hand through her arm and marched him slowly up the garden-walk. Before she had been five minutes in his company she had resumed full possession of him in her own right.

"Now down again, Mr. Noel," she said "gently down again in this fine sunlight. I have much to say to you, Sir, which you never have much to say to me. Let me ask a little domestic question first. They told me at the house door Mrs. Noel Vanstone was gone away on a journey. Has she gone for long?"

Her master's hand trembled on her arm as she put that question. Instead of answering it he tried faintly to plead for himself. The first words that escaped him were prompted by his first returning sense—the sense that his housekeeper had taken him into custody. He tried to make his peace with Mrs. Lecount.

"I always meant to do something for you," he said, coaxingly. "You would have heard from me before long—upon my word and honor, Lecount, you would have heard from me before long!"

"I don't doubt it, Sir," replied Mrs. Lecount. "But for the present never mind about me. You and your interests first."

"How did you come here?" he asked, looking at her in astonishment. "How came you to find me out?"

"It is a long story, Sir; I will tell it on some other time. Let it be enough to say now that I have found you. Will Mrs. Noel be back again at the house to-day? A little louder, Sir; I can hardly hear you. So! so! Not back again till the end of the week! And where is she gone? To London, did you say? And what for? I am not inquisitive, Mr. Noel; I am asking serious questions under serious necessity. Why has your wife left you here, and gone to London by herself?"

They were down at the fence again as she made that last inquiry, and they waited, leaning against it, while Noel Vanstone quavered. Her reiterated assurances that she bore him no malice were producing their effect on him: he was beginning to recover himself. The old helpless habit of addressing all his complaints to his housekeeper was returning already with the repugnance of Mrs. Lecount—entertaining insidiously in company with that besetting anxiety to talk about his grievances which had got the better of him at the breakfast-table, and which had shown the wound inflicted on his vanity to his wife's mind.

"I can't answer for Mrs. Noel Vanstone," he said, spitefully. "Mrs. Noel Vanstone has not treated me with the consideration which is my due. She has taken my permission for granted, and she has only thought proper to tell me that the object of her journey is to see her friends in London. She went away this morning without bidding me good-by. She left me in a cool way, as if I was nobody; she treats me like a child. You may not believe it, Lecount; but I don't even know who her friends are. I am left quite in the dark; I am left to guess for myself what her friends in London are Sir, and aunt and aunt."

Mrs. Lecount privately considered the question by the help of her own knowledge obtained in London. She soon reached the obvious conclusion. After writing to her sister in the first instance, Magdalen had now in all probability followed the letter in person. There was little doubt that the friends she had gone to visit in London were her sister and Miss Garth.

"Not her uncle and aunt, Sir," resumed Mrs. Lecount, composedly. "A secret for your private ear! She has no uncle and aunt. Another little turn before I explain myself—another little turn to compose your spirits."

"IF YOU EVER LET HIM PAINT YOU LET HIM DIE."

She took him in custody once more, and marched him back toward the house.

"Mr. Noel!" she said, suddenly stopping in the middle of the walk—"do you know what was the worst mischief you ever did yourself in your life? I will tell you. That worse mischief was sending me to Zurich."

His hand began to tremble on her arm once more.

"I didn't do it!" he cried, piteously. "I was all Mr. Bygrave."

"You acknowledge, Sir, that Mr. Bygrave deceived me?" proceeded Mrs. Lecount. "I am glad to hear that. You will be all the readier to make the next discovery which is waiting for you—the discovery that Mr. Bygrave has deceived you. He is not here to slip through my fingers now, and I am not the dupe I was then, in this place that I was at Aldborough, thank God!"

She uttered that devout exclamation through her set teeth. All her hatred of Captain Wragge broke out of her lips in those few words.

"Oblige me, Sir, by holding one side of my traveling-bag," she resumed, "while I open it and take something out."

The interior of the bag disclosed a series of neatly-folded papers, all laid together in order, and numbered outside. Mrs. Lecount took out one of the papers, and shut up the bag again with a loud snap of the spring that closed it.

"At Aldborough, Mr. Noel, I had only my own opinion to support me," she remarked. "My own opinion was nothing against Miss Bygrave's youth and beauty, and Mr. Bygrave's ready wit. I could only hope to attack your infatuation with proofs, and at that time I had not got them. I have got them now! I am armed at all points with proofs; I bristle from head to foot with proofs: I break my forced silence, and speak with the eloquence of my proofs. Do you know this writing, Sir?"

He shrunk back from the paper which she offered to him.

"I don't understand this," he said, nervously. "I don't know what you want, or what you mean."

Mrs. Lecount forced the paper into his hand. "You shall know what I mean, Sir, if you will give me a moment's attention," she said. "On the day after you went away to St. Crux I obtained admission to Mr. Bygrave's house, and I had some talk in private with Mr. Bygrave's wife. Having already met with the means to convince you, which I had wanted to find for weeks and weeks past. I wrote you a letter to say so: I wrote to tell you that I would forfeit my place in your service, and my expectations from your generosity, if I did not prove to you when I came back from Switzerland that my own private suspicion of Miss Bygrave was the truth. I directed that letter to you at St. Crux, and forced it myself. Now, Mr. Noel, read the paper which I have forced into your hand. It is Anne Silvester's solemn affirmation that my letter came to St. Crux, and that he inclosed it to you, under cover to Mr. Bygrave, at your own request. Did Mr. Bygrave ever give you that letter? Don't agitate yourself, Sir! One word of reply will do—Yes? or No?"

He read the paper, and looked up at her with growing bewilderment and fear. She characteristically waited until he spoke. "No," he said, faintly; "I never got the letter."

"Proof print!" said Mrs. Lecount, taking the paper from him and putting it back in the bag. "One more, with your kind permission, before we come to things more serious still. I gave you a written description, Sir, at Aldborough, of a person not named, and I asked you to compare it with Miss Bygrave the next time you were in her company. After having first shown me the description Mr. Bygrave—it is useless to deny it now, Mr. Noel, your friend at North Shingles is not here to help you!—after having free shown my nose to Mr. Bygrave, you made the comparison, and you found it fair in the the comparison, and you found it fair in the most important particular. There were two long ale noses placed close together on the left side of the neck, in my description of the unknown lady, and there were no little nodes at all when you looked at Miss Bygrave's neck. I am old enough to be your mother, Mr. Neot, if the question is not indelicate, may I ask what the present state of your knowledge is on the subject of your wife's neck?"

She looked at him with a merciless steadiness. He drew back a few steps, cowering under her eye.

"I can't say," he muttered; "I don't know. What do you mean by these questions? I never thought about the nodes or anything; I never looked. She wears her hair low—"

She has excellent reason to wear it low," remarked Mrs. Lecount, severely; "and she will hide her nodes as long as she can."

"Under these circumstances, Mr. Neot, you can not possibly suspect me of conspiring to deceive you, with the assist for my instrument. Go into the house, Sir, while I speak to this lady." The woman who dresses Mrs. Noel Vanstone's hair, moving and night, whether her mistress has a mark on the left side of the neck or not? Is that mark it?"

He walked a few steps toward the house without answering a word—then stopped, and looked back at Mrs. Lecount. His blinking eyes were ready, and his whole face had undergone a change composed. Mrs. Lecount advanced a little and joined him. She saw the change; but with all her experience of him she failed to interpret the true meaning of it.

"Are you in want of a pretense, Sir?" she asked. "Are you at a loss to account to your wife's maid for such a question as I wish you to put to her? Pretenses are trifles with me. I will do for persons in her station of life. Say I was cross-examining her in the legacy for Noel Vanstone, and that there is a question of her identity to settle before she can receive the money."

She pointed to the house. He paid no attention to the sign. His face grew paler and paler. Without another word, he began to walk and looked at her.

"Are you afraid?" asked Mrs. Lecount.

Those words roused him; those words lit a spark of the fire of manhood in him at last. He turned on her like a sheep at bay.

"I won't be questioned and cowered!" he broke out, trembling violently under the excitement of his own courage. "I won't be threatened and worried any longer! How did you find me out at this place? What do you mean by coming here with your hints and your nonsense? What have you got to say against my wife?"

Mrs. Lecount composedly opened the travelling-bag and took out her smelling-bottle, in case of emergency.

"You have spoken to me in plain words," she said. "In plain words, Sir, you shall have your answer. Are you too angry to listen?"

Her looks and tone, stamped with the mastery of herself, had their effect on him. He struggled desperately as he tried to steady it, his voice trembled when he answered her.

"Give me my answer," he said, "and give it at once."

"Your commands shall be obeyed, Sir, to the best," replied Mrs. Lecount. "I have come here with two objects. To open your eyes to your own situation; and to save your fortune, perhaps your life. Your situation is this: Miss Bygrave has married you, under a false character, to find a false name. Can you rouse your memory? Can you call to mind the words that a person who threatened you in Vauxhall Walk? That person—as certainly as I stand here—is now your wife."

He looked at her in breathless silence. His self-willing spirit; his eye to eye with the mystery. The suddenness of the disclosure had overwhelmed him at once and completely. It had stupefied him.

"My wife!" he repeated—almost into an imbecile laugh.

"Your wife!" reiterated Mrs. Lecount.

At the repetition of those two words the strain on his faculties relaxed. A thought dawned on him for the first time. He looked at her once more with a furtive alarm and he drew back hastily.

"Mad!" he said to himself, with a sudden remembrance of what his friend Mr. Bygrave had told him at Aldborough, sharpened by his own sense of haggard changes that he saw in her face.

He spoke in a whisper, but Mrs. Lecount heard him. She was not close at his side, but not at an instant. For the first time her self-possession failed her, and she caught him angrily by the arm.

"Will you put my madness to the proof, Sir?" she asked.

He shook off her hold; he began to gather courage again, in the unconscious security of his disbelief—courage to face the assertion which he resolved in forcing on him.

"Yes," he answered. "What must I do?"

"Do what I told you," said Mrs. Lecount. "Ask the maid that question about the nodes—now on the spot. And if she tells you the mark is there, do one thing more. Take me up into your wife's room, and there withdraw me in my presence with your own hands."

"What do you want with her wardrobe?" he asked.

"You shall know when you open it."

He left her. She had to himself, vacantly. "It's like a scene in a novel—it's like nothing in real life."

He went slowly into the house, and Mrs. Lecount waited for him in the garden.

After an hour's delay, the two ladies only he appeared again on the top of the flight of steps which led into the garden from the house. He held by the iron rail with one hand, while with the other he beckoned to Mrs. Lecount to join him on the steps.

"What does the maid say?" she asked, as she approached him. "Is the mark there?"

He nodded in silence. "Yes," he said; he had heard from the maid and produced a marked confirmation of the fact. The coming discovery had had its paralyzing hold on his mind. He moved mechanically; he looked and spoke like a man in a dream.

"Will you take my arm, Sir?"

He shook his head; and, preceding her along the passage, began to mount, led the way into his wife's room. When she joined him and closed the door, he stood passively waiting for his directions, without making any remark, without showing any external appearance of surprise. His face was almost as pale as Mrs. Lecount. Mrs. Lecount took them off for him. "Walk round to the other side of the bed," she said, in a cool, matter-of-fact tone. "It's like a scene in a novel—it's like nothing in real life."

She spoke to him as if he were a large dog, and the furniture was heavy and old-fashioned. But evidences of Magdalen's natural taste and refinement were scattered over the room in the artist embellishments that graced and enlivened the dreariest of lodgings. The perfume of flowers leaves hung fragrant on the cool air. Mrs. Lecount sniffed the perfume with a disparaging look, and threw the window up to the full height. "Pah!" she said, with a shudder of nervous disgust, "the smell of sweets is detestable!"

She seated herself near the window. The wardrobe stood against the wall opposite, and the bed was at the left hand of the door as you faced it. "Open the wardrobe, Mr. Noel," she said. "I don't go near it, I touch nothing in it myself. I keep my hands on my own hand, and put them on the bed. Take them away one by one, until I tell you to stop."

He obeyed her. "I'll do it as well as I can," he said. "My hands are cold, and my head feels half asleep."

The dresses to be removed were not many, for Magdalen had taken with her some of her best with her. After he had put two dresses on the bed he was obliged to search in the inner recesses of the wardrobe before he could find more. When he produced it, Mrs. Lecount made a sign to him to stop. The end was reached already—he felt sure of it—he could see it.

"Lay it out on the bed, Sir," said Mrs. Lecount, "and then look in the wardrobe again round the bottom of it. Lift up the outer flounce, and pass the inner one through your hands—search it all the way round. Search where there is a morsel of the stuff missing, step, and look at me."

He passed the flounce slowly through his fingers for a minute or more—then stopped and looked up. His face was sterile of color, his pocket book and opened it.

"Very well I have speak, Sir, is of serious consequence to you and to me," she said. "Distress with your closest attention. When the woman calling herself your wife came to you in the Vauxhall Walk, I knelt down behind the chair on which she was sitting and I cut a morsel of stuff from the back of her dress, without letting her me to know that dress if I ever saw it again. I have that morsel of stuff in my pocket-book, and absorbed in talking to you. The morsel of stuff has been kept in my pocket-book from that time to this. Look at the piece that is missing. Look at the gap in that dress which your own hands have just taken from your wife's wardrobe!"

She rose and handed him the fragment of stuff across the bed. He put it into the vacant space in the flounce, and said to Mrs. Lecount what she would let him.

"Does it fit, Sir?" asked Mrs. Lecount.

The dress dropped from his hands, and the deadly bluish pallor—which every doctor who attended him had noticed—began to threaten to dread—overspread his face slowly. Mrs. Lecount did not reckoned on such an answer to her question as he now saw in his cheeks. She hurried round to him, with the smelling-bottle in her hand. "Don't answer me!" she cried, and caught at her dress with the grasp of a drowning man. "Save me!" he gasped, in a hoarse, breathless voice. "Come away from this place—come nearer to the air." She raised him as she spoke, and led him across the room to the window. "Do you feel the chill pain again on your left side?" she asked, with the first signs of alarm that she had ever shown in her face. "Has any one else Cologne, any sal volatile in her pocket? Compose yourself by speaking—point to the place."

He pointed to a little triangular cupboard of old, worm-eaten walnut-wood, fixed high in a corner of the room. Mrs. Lecount tried the door—it was locked.

As she made that discovery she saw his head sink back gradually on the easy-chair in which he had placed him. "Speak—speak of the door in past years—" If you ever let him faint you let him die"—recurred to her memory as if it had been spoken the day before. She looked at the cupboard again. In a recess under it lay some old boots. She placed there apparently for purposes of packing. Without an instant's hesitation she snatched up a morsel of cord, tied one end fast round the knob of the cupboard-door, and seizing the other end in both hands, pulled it suddenly with the exertion of her whole strength. The rotten wood gave way, the cupboard-doors flew open, and a heap of little trifles poured out noisily on the floor. Without stopping to notice the broken china and glass at her feet, she looked into the dark recesses of the cupboard, and saw the gleam of two glass bottles. One was put away at the extreme back on the shelf; the other was a little in advance, almost hiding it. She snatched them both out at once, and took them, one in each hand, to the window, where she could read their labels in the clearer light.

She looked in her right hand was the first bottle she looked at. It was marked—Sal volatile. She instantly laid the other bottle aside on the table without looking at it. The other bottle lay there waiting its turn. It held a dark liquid, and it was labeled—Poison.

MAJOR-GENERAL WILLIAM S. ROSECRANS, COMMANDER OF THE ARMY OF THE OHIO.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

MAJOR-GENERAL ROSECRANS.

We devote the preceding page to a portrait of MAJOR-GENERAL WILLIAM STARKE ROSECRANS, the new commander of the Army of the Ohio, and the hero of the Battle of Corinth.

General Rosecrans was born in Delaware County, Ohio, on 6th November, 1819. His family were of Dutch descent, though of the Roman Catholic faith. In the year 1837 he was appointed a cadet at West Point, and graduated among the highest in 1841. Entering the corps of engineers, he was successively employed in works of construction at Fortress Monroe; Wrayton, North Carolina; New Bedford, Massachusetts, etc., and served four years as Assistant Professor of Engineering at the Military Academy at West Point. In 1854 he left the army, and opened an office as civil engineer at Cincinnati. In 1855 he accepted the Presidency of the Coal Mining Company of Coal River, Kanawha Court House, Virginia; but a couple of years afterward resigned the position to commence, at Cincinnati, the manufacture of coal oil.

At the outbreak of the rebellion General Rosecrans was one of the first men whom General M'Clellan called to his aid. He accepted the post of aid to M'Clellan when the latter entered Western Virginia, and was soon afterward appointed Brigadier-General. In the short but brilliant campaign which cleared the rebels out of Western Virginia Rosecrans took a leading part, and when General M'Clellan was called to Washington he replace M'Dowell he was left in command. He prosecuted the campaign with masterly energy, falling, however, in his great object, which was to bag the "chief fiyer," through some mischance of General Beckham. For some time subsequently to this but little was heard of General Rosecrans. He turned up again at Corinth, and when the steamboat there was the first one attacked by the rebels under Van Dorn on 3d and 4th October, His victory has been thoroughly acknowledged by the rebels.

When the escape of Bragg rendered it incumbent on the President to replace General Buell by some more fortunate if not more energetic commander, General Rosecrans was the man selected by the command. The public have every hope that he will vindicate the wisdom of the choice.

We published a sketch of General Rosecrans a little more than a year ago. The writer remarked that among the papers which he examined in search of materials for his biography, he discovered a testimonial to "Mr. Rosecrans's high abilities, integrity, and energy," signed by Jefferson Davis, and dated 1854.

THE FIFTH ACT OF THE DRAMA.

THE events of this war repeat themselves with uniform regularity. We began the war with a pretty general contempt for our adversary, and a complacent self-assurance of an easy and easy triumph. That delusion was dispelled on 21st July on the field of Bull Run, and there the curtain fell on the first Act of the great Drama. From that ill-omened day till the close of the year 1861 the hand of fate was against us. We lost battles, and we lost territory, and we lost men. Our armies lay idle, seemingly through want of energy on the part of their leaders. People began to despond, and the great Spring flood which had been welded into an integral whole by the attack on Fort Sumter, began to exhibit symptoms of division into parties. The rebels began to boast of holding more territory than they had ever expected to inclose within their military energy. They had blockaded the Potomac, beleaguered Washington, menaced Cairo and Louisville. Our blockade of their ports had forced us by over three hundred miles. The prestige of victory was with them; and the official organ of Jeff Davis's Government at Richmond readers the last independence of the South had been actually achieved, and that henceforth the contest was merely for boundaries. Such was the condition of affairs at New Year 1862; and here we may say the second Act of the Drama ended.

The third Act began with the fulfillment of M'Clellan's famous promise that "when the storm does begin, it will ingulf them along the whole line." It began on the battle-field of Somerset in Kentucky, where, on 19th January, the first great victory won by the war was achieved. The news had scarcely been received in New York before the telegraph flashed the welcome intelligence of the reoccupation of Romney, two days after the fall of Fort Henry. Burnside wrested the island of Roanoke from the rebels, and then achieved the conquest of Albemarle and Pamlico Sounds, and of the whole seaboard of North Carolina. On 10th, General Grant moved upon the enemy's works at Fort Donelson and captured that strong-hold with many thousands of prisoners. The fall of Forts Henry and Donelson compelled the rebels to evacuate their two strong-holds in the West, Columbus and Bowling Green. On 1st March the forces of war abandoned, and on 12th General Mitchell commenced his glorious career by entering the latter. Meanwhile, on 8th March, Curtis with Sigel had enrolled their names in the book of fame, by defeating the enemy under M'Intosh, Price, and Van Dorn at Pea Ridge, in Arkansas. On 11th, the Army of the Potomac moved: Banks occupied Winchester, and M'Clellan obliged the rebels to evacuate Manassas without firing a gun. The two last weeks of March witnessed the capture of Newbern and Beaufort, North Carolina, by Burnside; of Florence, Alabama, and Iuka, Mississippi, by Mitchell; and of the whole coast of Florida, by Commodore Dupont. April began on the 1st, by Pope, on Island No. 10 surrendered to General Pope; on 6th, Commodore Farragut and General Butler took New Orleans—the most important blow of the war. On the same day, General M'Clellan commenced his parallels against Yorktown. On the same day, by Burnside's, of Florence, Alabama, and Iuka, Mississippi, by Mitchell; and of the whole coast of Florida, by Commodore Dupont. April began on the 1st, by Pope, on Island No. 10 surrendered to General Pope; on 6th, Commodore Farragut and General Butler took New Orleans—the most important blow of the war. On the same day, General M'Clellan commenced his parallels against Yorktown. On the same day, by Burnside's capture of Roanoke, at Pittsburg Landing, by far the most bloody of the war, terminated in the victory of the North. The forces, and destroyed General Beauregard's army. On 11th, General Mitchell took, Huntsville, Alabama—thus securing the whole main of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad; and on the same day Fort Pulaski, Georgia, surrendered to General Gilmore.

The next event of importance was the evacuation of Yorktown, on May 4th; and the battle of Williamsburg, in which a portion of M'Clellan's army won a victory on 5th. Then followed in quick succession the battles of Hanover Court House, West Point, and Fair Oaks, and the victories for the North on the 30th May the evacuation of Corinth. This, together with the naval victory of Commodore Foote on 6th June, accomplished the surrender of Memphis on 7th. On 18th June, General Morgan occupied Cumberland Gap. This events appears to us to have closed the third Act of the Drama. For five months our successes had been uninterrupted and substantial. The rebels had concentrated into our old self-confidence, and falling into the errors which this feeling naturally engenders. Enlistments were stopped and the process of reorganizing our armies and regiments even proposed. Politicians were again beginning to discount the future, which they regarded as secured, and to quarrel over the distribution of the honors which seemed so securely won. There was a general relaxation of the energies which had enabled us to win victories. Add to this that the season precluded the operations of our gunboats on the rivers of the South, and we see that the succeeding events will seem less unintelligible than they would otherwise appear.

The fourth Act of the Drama commenced with the operations of Stonewall Jackson in the Shenandoah Valley, which, though depressing to the Northern mind, were insignificant. The battles of the seven days before Richmond, ending July 1, were far more important. However highly we may prise the skill of the rebel leaders and the bravery of his troops, it can not be denied that the substantial fruits of victory on this occasion were with the rebels. Our army was driven in shattered condition to the banks of the James River, and the siege of Richmond was raised. The enemy raised the hopes of the rebels once more. Their conscript Act was enforced with rigor, and their armies throughout the Confederacy strengthened. An aggressive spirit was displayed. Bragg moved northward from Chattanooga, Lee from Richmond, Hindman from Little Rock, Arkansas, while Beauregard and Van Dorn undertook successfully to prevent the reopening of the Mississippi. We failed to take Vicksburg, and were forced to evacuate Baton Rouge. Pope, with a handful of men, strove bravely, but of course ineffectually, to resist the overwhelming advance of Lee upon Washington; the last week of August was almost as disastrous to us as the last week of June. Buell, choosing rather to circumvent Bragg than fight him, operated so as to protect Nashville and Louisville, and succeeded; but he could not prevent the fall of Richmond, Kentucky, the abandonment of Cumberland Gap, the capture of Frankfort and Lexington, and the occupation by the rebels of the whole State of Kentucky, except a few small corners of Tennessee; but rendered the navigation of the Mississippi as dangerous as it ever was. They forced Buell into Louisville, they were dispirited by defeat. Their papers reported, to use their own words, "a succession of triumphs and successes which have again raised the South to the North.

The fifth, and, we hope, the last Act of the Drama, commenced on September 14, when General M'Clellan defeated the rebels at South Mountain under Lee. On 17th he fought them again at Antietam, and drove them out of Maryland. On the same day Kirby Smith's army began to fall back from Florence, Kentucky, abandoning the enterprise against Cincinnati in despair. On 25th, Buell arrived at Louisville, and Bragg began to fall back. On 30th, the new General Rosecrans utterly defeated the rebels at Corinth, as acknowledged at Richmond, paralyzing the armies of Van Dorn and Breckinridge. • On the same day we took Galveston, Texas. On 8th, the battle of Perryville was fought, which, though perhaps not a Union victory, still compelled Bragg to fly rapidly toward the Cumberland mountains, losing the whole fruit of his expedition. On 22d, the rebel army in Arkansas was defeated and scattered at a second battle of Cane Hill. On 23d, General Mitchell attacked the Savannah and Charleston Railroad. On 26th, the Army of the Potomac crossed into Virginia to renew the campaign. On the same day the Army of the Ohio, under instructions from its new commander, General Rosecrans, marched southward toward Tennessee. Events indicate that the tide of fortune has turned once more, and that when the curtain falls on the fifth Act the fate of art will be fulfilled by the denouement of the drama. This hope is encouraged by the fact that our armies are far stronger than they ever were, and that they receiving fresh accessions of strength; that they are perfectly armed and equipped, and that their officers have at length learned how to handle them; and that in the course of a few days we shall have a fleet of Monitors afloat for the reduction of Charleston, Savannah, and Mobile. It is further confirmed by the fact that though during what we have termed the second and fourth Acts of the Drama, successes with the rebels, we lost no important strategic point which we had previously won. Though they seemed to win battle after battle, and were to bear of nothing but reverses, we continued to hold Nashville, Memphis, New Orleans, Corinth, Norfolk, Beaufort, Port Royal, Pensacola, St. Augustine, and to control the Mississippi River, with the exception of a few miles above and below Vicksburg. The difference between them and us appears to be that their triumphs are barren of practical results, while ours have almost invariably resulted in new substantial advantages in point of territory, strategic points, or influential towns.

We have been so often disappointed that it seems rash to risk any more predictions. But if we gain as much in this fifth Act as we did in the third, there will be very little left of the Confederacy by next spring.

THE LOUNGER.

A JOKER UPON THE WAR.

MR. JOHN V. DE BOW is an unseasonable jester. The airy way in which he acts = "Ho, for Fort Lafayette!" shows simply his consciousness of what the Government has done to conciliate him. The Government which he accuses of suppressing free speech does not punish him for uttering a single sentence of his treason. It only declines to imprison the rebel sympathizer, except as indicating the views and policy of others. There was a time when he was the most popular orator of the principles against which the insurrection of the South. There was a time when he was the leader of the party of the future. That future has arrived. That party, with men of all parties and of no party, to the fundamental principle of the Government, is valorously fighting for the existence of the nation, and its old champion stands by with folded arms, the leering and laughing, jesting cheerfully, amidst peals of applause which self-Democrats always excite that excellent but tedious joke, the bloody destruction of the Government of the United States by the mad rage of the people for the sake of the hereafter.

Mr. Seymour himself is too sagacious to unroll his programme. But his friend, the jester, is less wise. The whole story of the desperate effort of the Copperhead Democratic party to secure the control of its legs is told in a few sentences by Mr. Van Buren. "Let us take Missouri," he says to his audience, "and we ask our erring brethren what they want; if we can't agree, let us say," Way-ward sisters, depart in peace!"

"Here's richness!" cried Mr. Squeers, as he sipped the sky-blue skim-milk with which Mrs. Squeers was not all cry as we contemplate this patent Sherman's logorea warranted to cure every thing in one dose? But the joke is serious. If Mr. Van Buren had really enlisted for the war, we could understand that he burned to fight it, and could only wait until he had fretted his doughblade. But as he did not go, and the only war he wages is against the army of his fellow-citizens, why should he send thousands and thousands of citizens, quite as valuable to the country as he, to be slaughtered, mutilated, and maimed in battle? Indeed, when by his own statement it is all to be in vain? If the Government is to surrender to the rebellion, why not surrender before another life is lost? If Mr. Van Buren and the friends for whom he jests are so anxious to let "our erring brethren" do exactly what they choose when they constitutionally control the Government, why when they constitutionally lose control of it, then another is and the country, and all the rights of every man and woman, will be given up to the rebellion? What connection is there between all this and Habeas Corpus? The jester is a little too free. For if he is willing to let them have all they wish when Richmond is taken, he simply gives his consent to the murder of all his fellow-citizens who may be slain in taking it. He may have sons or brothers in the war for all we know; but if he has not there is scarce a true-hearted family in the land but has sent its brave and cherished youth and they may be pardoned if they prefer that, if the wayward sisters are to depart in peace, they may be allowed to depart in peace, without the mercy they have already caused.

Here are our streets and the whole country filled with wounded and maimed soldiers, heroic monuments of the national valor. Thousands sleep in the foul soil of Virginia, slain in battle or dying of slurp torture and lingering disease. But hobbling, pular skips in and capers upon their graves, and shaking his bells, cries = "Pooh, pooh! if a lady's wife wants to leave him, she can make him might comfortable, and he need never let him go!" Let her go? yes, and pack her trunk too."

This is the spy view of our treasonable struggle for the perpetuity of civil order to which Mr. Van Buren invites the fathers and brothers and friends of our soldiers to listen. The Democratic party vote for Horatio Seymour. To be sure a few thousands more, including widows, too, may be killed, but as soon as they are safely dead we'll vote for all up! If that is what you want, don't fail to vote for Seymour. If you think that the best thing to do at this the people of the State of New York should express a preference for Mr. Van Buren's friend who makes the war a joke, by all means vote for Seymour. But if you earnestly mean crushing the rebellion by the blessing of the Wadsworth, who means it just as earnestly as you.

"OUR OWN."

THE NEW YORK correspondent of the London Times is humbled without illness in a recent number of the London journal. On the 29th he writes these letters had declared, after the retreat of Pope: "Brag, bold, brazen, unblushing, unconquered and unabashed, the rebel army, as strives to keep up the spirits of the people... Be that as it may, in one word, it is not permitted to the newspapers of New York to promulgate the fact, but it is known in almost every circle, and it is not the wish of the rebels that we, the never since the disruption of the Union were the fortunes of the North at a lower ebb than at this moment."

The Daily News quotes from New York papers of a date later than that on which this letter, however, perfect appreciation of the position of affairs, will be published, to disguise its absurdity. But our readers think of a gentleman who is capable of sending home, to be read by tens of thousands of his countrymen, a letter which could in such situation to the facts as we see here? What but this? They get a letter home for the purpose of misleading them that of enlightening the mind of England. And it is of such material that public opinion is made.

"It is supposed to be for the advantage if the public that the accredited correspondent of a news paper should be known by name." This is what newspapers, however, lately contained a letter in which Dr. Charles Mackay, LL.D., describes, announced himself as the correspondent of our contemporary in that capital. Some of our readers who remember Dr. Mackay's poem of "The Good Iris Coming' may be surprised to find him working in the capacity of a slave-owning, slavery-at, by his own touching words, 'the great cause of Human Progress has required, at every period of the world, the sacrifice of the blood of martyrs." Could it have been the rise of the Slave Power to the making of when, sixteen years ago, he sang joyously,

> There's a flame about to stream,
> There's a light about to beam,
> There's a warmth about to glow,
> There's a flower about to blow.

"No, for the word was then,

> Onward while a wrong remains
> To be conquered by the Right;
> While an inch of land remains
> Or a serpent graves the heart,
> Or a slave pines for his freedom,
> Action is the wise man's part.

"Then, too, it would have seemed—as we gather from the context—still in the contemplation to use of seeds of hatred and strife between the nations, at the worst errors of that kind were things to be repented of.

> Once we thought it right to feel
> Love between our people's zeal;
> Right to hate another nation
> Formed from a single stock;
> Old opinions! ages and nations!
> Not now, not now, good sirs!

"Dr. Mackay has told us that in writing not poetry as this he was much encouraged by employing and appreciative audience. He is of the Antichrist. But sixteen years bring reflection and experience. These verses were the spontaneous utterance. Their author, then, Dr. Mackay has been to the land of slavery, and having studied the fact with the calm and philosophic temper of New Orleans men with faces as white as his own bought and sold as slaves—he has become convinced to the cause of the South."

RIGHTS AND GUARANTEES.

"IF it is not the duty of the Government," [if] slavery must be abolished to save this Union, for the people of the South should be allowed to withdraw peacefully from the Union, inasmuch as they not give them the protection guaranteed by the terms."

But if the protection of slavery is guaranteed by the terms of the Constitution, it is on the ground that slaves are property. Consequently if fugitives held to service under the laws of one State escape into another, the latter is bound, says Mr. Seymour nor any other American advocate of human slavery will contend that the property of a right claiming to own slaves in a State is merely presly guaranteed than the protection of the right of the same man to his life. If, then, his life of the Constitutional protection of the constitution when it conflicts with the supremacy of the Government, it clearly forfeits the other in the same case, unless his right to his slave be more sacred than that to his life.

The utter absurdity of Mr. Seymour's argument therefore, becomes at once evident, upon what ing the one right for the other. His proposition would deny and thus: "If it is true that the west has taken to save this Union, then the people of the South should be allowed to withdraw themselves from that Government which can not protect them in the protection guaranteed by its terms."

BRETHREN.

The meetings and speeches of the gentlemen whom Mr. Daniel S. Dickinson, a tolerable democratic authority, declares to have been "the leading men, office-seekers, and camp-followers of the old Democratic party—men who have managed it for years and for a time live in the subalurces of the party and attached to its commissariat—have been the source of no small satisfaction to the rebels that no human man can doubt that every vote for Mr. Seymour, the candidate of those meetings, will be hailed with true delight by the same "erring brethren."

Mr. John Van Buren, as we have elsewhere said, has been the speaker of chief importance, because he has spoken explicitly. Mr. Seymour has always been loud lasently to generalities, some safe, some not so safe, as he will find. Upon receipt of the speeches of the rebel journals burst into a chorus of delight. The letter of General Scott, which was read by Mr. Van Buren, and was aimed in the strain of intense opposition to the government and the war, in the opinion of the Richmond Dispatch, "exalts General Scott in the eyes of the abyss into which he has been dragged by Seymour." Mr. Van Buren meant to give the rebels the aid and comfort of knowing that a large and active section of the union party, wanted to let them go. He has succeeded. He has affected the enemy as much as this country. They break into vehement applause.

The Dispatch declares that it appreciates "the superior sincerity and magnanimity of Mr. Van Buren and his friends to the Black Republicans," and says that it agrees with him that the Southern people would not end the war, and therefore does not see why its friend Van Buren suggests talking it.

Meanwhile, will any candidate accept the disfranchise of sentiment between the following from the Richmond Whig and the speech of Mr. Van Buren, the spokesman of Horatio Seymour?

"Nor, after the sacrifices which the South has made at Northern bands," says the Whig, "will she ever, she ever consent, of her own free-will, to live under the same government with them."

Mr. John Van Buren, speaking for Mr. Seymour, says: "And if they won't consent, then I know but I am in favor of so amending the Constitution as to let them go, saying to them, in the language of the gallant Scott, 'Wayward sisters, depart in peace!'"

If there is any practical difference between Seymour and Van Buren accepted by the Richmond Secessionists, as set forth by the Richmond Whig, it can only be discerned by eyes sharp enough to see the decency of reading without authority a pirate letter to a public meeting.

THE FRUIT OF THE OLIVE.

WHEN Mr. Seymour says that the Union may also if it can not be saved without abolishing slavery, and when his followers echo, "Let it go, let the wayward sisters go!" is it because they are really willing the Union should be dissolved and the Government destroyed forever? Are they really insensible to the achievement of the Fast and the Rise of the States? Do they seriously suppose that a Government like this, a nation like this, with the vast complex system of society that depends upon it, and the enormous interests that are involved by its destruction, can be broken up by an easy vote of the South and a light response of the North? Do they something behind? Their war policy is pure. But what do they mean by peace?

Seymour and his party should plainly. Suppose there should be an armistice, a negotiation, and a separation. Then, what? Do they suppose that a political unit upon slavery; and, as an independent power, slavery would be its fundamental law. Mr. Stephens declared. But if the existence of slavery as union among these States is a vital and prime necessity, what would happen at the North? Does Seymour and his friends would insist upon that necessity. Having insisted upon dissolution for peace, by would continue for union for peace? Or, separation from the war would, under the supposition, have brought them into power. The politics of the North would be simply reconstructed upon the question of slavery. But reconstruction would be impossible by any movement to slavery in the Southern States. By the pressure of obvious considerations that movement might be obtained by a majority vote. Then the Union would be reduced to the very situation which would not refuse to admit the doctrine which Jefferson Davis declared that no secession should not admit—the doctrine of property in man.

Nothing but a practical despotism could keep the country quiet under such a Constitution. But the people have been ruled out, and after a brief confederate lull another rebellion would inevitably break out. The political predominance of the slave power would come into irresistible force with the full rights of free labor. Troubles, disaster, blood must follow. We should be entirely Mexicanized, and either heave in tumultuous revolution itself or sink into abject despotism.

Meanwhile, as Mr. Seymour says a white handkerchief to the enemies of his country begging them to be considered, and while this is a plain picture of the results of Seymourism or disheartable peace, it is refreshing to read the clear sentences of Mr. Seward's letter to the West New Jersey Deptist Association:

"You may further rest assured that the President is looking for a restoration of peace on no other basis than that of the unconditional acquiescence by the people of all the States in the Constitutional authority of the National Government.

"Whatever policy will lead to that result will be pursued; whatever interest shall stand in the way of it will be disregarded."

SECESSION SYMPATHY.

MR. SEYMOUR and his friends prefer not to be called sympathizers with the rebellion. They declare that it is a slander to call them so. Now that many persons do make vote for him who really do not wish the Union dissolved is very true. But it will be merely because they do not know the real position. Should any candid man, who expects to vote for Mr. Seymour because he can not see that he sympathizes with the purpose of the rebellion, happen to see this paragraph, let him reflect upon the following facts and then ask himself whether Mr. Seymour and those of the Richmond Examiner.

The Examiner says: "As the war originated, and is carried on under the false and fatal doctrine of the slaveholder in his property, rights, and the perpetuation of his institutions, it is inadmissible to suppose that he ought to to first and foremost in aiding and assisting, by every means in his power, the triumph and perpetuation of his foes."

Horatio Seymour says: "It is a fatal thing that every man who believes that the Union, then the people of the South should be allowed to withdraw themselves from that Government which can not give to them the protection guaranteed by its terms."

The war, says the Examiner, is made to save slavery. If we can not save it, we will vote for Mr. Seymour, without hurting slavery, we ought to give it up.

Every man who vote for Mr. Seymour you vote for this doctrine and all its consequences.

AN INSTRUCTIVE FACT.

IT is an instructive fact that all the newspapers in this City and State which were presented by the Grand Jury as public nuisances because of their sympathy—which were in danger of suppression by the authorities for aiding the rebellion—which were denounced by the indignant people by whose some outward sign of loyalty and obedience to the best Government on earth—are establishing the same press which have continued in every way to paralyze the hand of the authorities in striking the rebellion to its very heart, and are the most unqualified partisans of Mr. Seymour and the most malignant defamers of Abraham Lincoln. All these papers are for a vigorous submission of the Government to the rebels. Were their power equal to their will, they would throw down the weapons of the North at the feet of the rebellion, like a lump of dough, to be moulded into the form that best suits Davis, Wigfall, Toombs, and Shield.

A BLUNDER AND A TRICK.

IT is a favorite device of lawyers, when they see that they hold a hopelessly losing hand, to throw up the cards and cry out that there is cheating. Both are generally transparent tricks in the dodge of the political gamblers who are executing their desire in advance, and confessing that there is danger of violence at the polls.

Violence from whom, pleas? Violence for what, pray? That the people of New Hampshire in unprecedented majority simply because he represents the Union cause and the support of the Administration, and because he has been elected by votes from any party reason whatever. There is not a shade of sympathy with the rebellion in their vote: such men are good-natured. They will insist upon protection to themselves that the full glory of the victory may appear.

Who then is to show violence? Is it the meek and lowly Jew Democrat who is said to be oppressed? Is it the representatives of the Subterranean who have blown? Is it the Copperhead that dreads a fight? Is it the Coal Hole that trembles? When has there ever been any kind, or hint, or suspicion of serious violence at the polls except in fact and sprung from these very genius in whose interest it is now announced that there may be trouble at the polls?

The trick is pleasant but transparent. It is not violence which is feared at the polls, but intensity. It is not the sound of blows, but of bullets, which is to be fearful in anticipation. In a word, the destruction of parties in the country is a natural and complete that the political shysters who have held on as merely to the skirts of a speedy party platform, even when to do so was to give the most open comfort to the rebellion, are now in mortal terror lest those parties should be destroyed by not existing about for any excuse to avoid the annihilation which is their inevitable fate.

Old party issues are gone, and old party names will follow. The organization of such continues, and should continue, for it is a necessary machinery that can be transferred much more easily than reconstructed. While the party of the rebellion will be the only grounds upon which parties are possible. By inevitable laws they will be but two: the party of unconditional Union and the party of conditional, support of the Government. When the war is over there will be a popular reconstruction of parties upon grounds which may be surmised, but which are not yet reached. The nominations of the Democratic party are mere enormous political blunder ever committed in this State. It is to evade the proof of that enormity at on polls that the cry is raised of violence at the election.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

BANKER.—A ludicrous transaction, in which each party thinks he has cheated the other.

The young lady who promises one gentleman and marries another hasn't "the right ring" about her.

A queer old gentleman being asked what he wished for dinner, replied, "An appetite, good company, something to eat, and a napkin."

A lady well advanced in middlehood at her marriage responded that she was "single for convenience."

"This is the way I long have sought,
And mourned because I found it not."

A gentleman from Boston chanced to find himself among a little party of ladies, away down East, this summer, in the enjoyment of some innocent social play. He carelessly placed his arm about the slender waist of as pretty a damsel as Maine can boast, when she started and exclaimed, "Bogens, Sir! don't insult me!" The gentleman instantly apologized for the unwitting rudeness, and assured the half-offended fair one that he did not mean to insult her. "Oh!" she replied, "if you didn't insult, you may do it again."

A soldier glared on his sign the following parody on Goldsmith's familiar lines. "When lovely woman stoops to folly"

"When lovely woman tilts her saucer,
And finds how true that tea will stain,
What ever needs she will not smear
With napkin, but will shirk again?
The only art she uses
To hide the spot from every—
And wear an unsoiled dress where best
Nobody sees it—is to lie."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

ADVANCE OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

GENERAL MCCLELLAN moved his head-quarters on 27th to the Virginia side of the Potomac. At daylight on 28th General Pleasanton's cavalry crossed the river at Berlin and pushed on to Lovettsville, in the direction of Leesburg, which point he occupied by noon—occupied it immediately. General Burnside followed with his corps, and by the evening of the 28th was at Berlin. The army began to move across the river on Monday morning, and by Tuesday was quiet. General Pleasanton was said to be within a few hours' march of the rebel Longstreet's forces.

ANOTHER BATTLE AT PEA RIDGE.

The following dispatch has been published:

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI, Oct. 16, 1862.

Major-General Halleck, General-in-Chief, Washington:

Our arms can entirely successful again in Northwest Arkansas.

General Schofield, finding that the enemy had camped at Pea Ridge, sent General Blunt with the First Division and cavalry, and moved toward Huntsville with the rest of his command.

General Blunt, by making a hard night's march, reached and attacked the rebel force at Maysville, near the northwest corner of Arkansas, at daylight on the morning of the 22d inst.

The enemy were estimated at from five to seven thousand strong.

The engagement lasted about an hour, and resulted in the complete rout of the enemy, with the loss of all his artillery—a battery of 6-pounders—a large number of horses, with equipments, and the destruction of his entire wagon-train.

Our cavalry and light howitzers were still in pursuit of their scattered forces when the messenger left.

The loss is small.

General Schofield pursued General Hindman beyond Huntsville, driving him out upon the Arkansas River, ultimately the enemy crossed the Boston Mountains.

All the organized forces of the enemy have thus been driven back to the South of the Arkansas River and the Army of the Frontier has effectually and completely accomplished its mission.

S. R. CURTIS, Major-General Commanding.

THE RAILWAY IN KENTUCKY.

The Richmond papers admit the complete failure of Gen. and Bragg to accomplish any thing in Kentucky. The Bragg says that his army has been "compelled to subsist on the country," and the Enquirer notices the utter defeat of two of their generals—Van Dorn and Price—in Mississippi by Rosecrans—as unchecked.

BATTLE NEAR CHARLESTON.

The Richmond Dispatch has an official report from General Beauregard, announcing an attack upon the Union troops on the Charleston and Savannah Railroad at Coosawhatchie on Wednesday last. The rebels were repulsed after a brief contest. The enemy, he says, had come in thirteen transports, and left in five. Four hundred Federals are acknowledged as "skedaddlesome" left their dead and wounded on the field.

BATTLE AT WATERVILLY.

The Richmond Enquirer has a letter from Knoxville, in Tennessee, dated the 8th, which says that a rebel force 800 strong attacked a party of Federal cavalry at Watervilly, on the Cumberland Mountains, thirty miles southwest of Fort Donelson. After a severe fight of two hours, though greatly outnumbering the Federals, they made the enemy, killing twenty-four and capturing twenty-three prisoners.

GALVESTON TAKEN.

The city of Galveston, Texas, has been evacuated by the rebels, and was occupied by our troops on the 9th instant.

CONDITION OF THE REBEL ARMY.

General Longstreet, of North Carolina, has a pathetic appeal to the generosity of the people to assist in clothing the destitute soldiers of the army. He says that in addition there so already suffering from want of socks, shoes, and blankets, the approaching winter will add to the burning bides to supply the shoes, the matters of North Carolina have been called upon, and they have given their patriot corpses for blankets.

AN IMPORTANT SIGN.

Brigadier-General Edwin Price, son of Major-General Price, of the rebel service, has taken the oath of allegiance to the United States. He was captured near Memphis, and after a short visitor, and after he has been on parole. He was recently exchanged for General Prentiss, and is now living in the rebel army at Grenada, Mississippi, returned to St. Louis. He gives it as his opinion that the rebellion is nearly broken, and that the Confederacy can not last much more than a short time longer. He visited General Curtis's head-quarters at Keokuk immediately on his release, and expressed himself in the strongest terms of disapprobation of the Richmond government, and gave his consent to Gen. Curtis to publish his opinions through the papers. After subscribing to the oath of allegiance, he announced his determination to return to his home in rural quiet.

THE DRAFT IN PENNSYLVANIA.

Some little difficulty occurred in Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania, in enrolling men (coal diggers, chiefly) in connection with the draft. An immense force of miners turned out, and threatened to make a terrible time of it for the enrolling officers and disturbance. At last accounts, however, the trouble was all over, and the insolent miners had become quiet.

AN ANTI-SLAVERY PAPER IN NEW ORLEANS.

A thoroughly Anti-Slavery paper, in the French language, has just been started in New Orleans. It is called L'Union, and addresses itself, in particular, to the French population of Louisiana. It is a paper of great ability, to judge by Union troops and all them in the establishment of "the Government of the United States, of a democratic Federal Union." The first number reproduces a letter addressed two years ago by Victor Hugo to a Haytien general.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

MR. GLADSTONE IN FAVOR OF NEUTRALITY.

A foreign dispatch dated at Newcastle the 4th says that Chancellor of the Exchequer, said:

"I must confess, for myself, that I need not now explain, that I do not think that England has had any interest in the disruption of the American States; but even granting as that it was rather the interest of England that the Union should be preserved, I do not think that was a reason to say shrug; but at any rate, gentlemen, whatever view we may take of that, I think we all feel that the course which Her Majesty's Ministers have endeavored to pursue in this difficult matter, under the circumstances, under all circumstances, has been the wisest possible—but from a right source, and has been the expression of the general mind of the country.

BUT HIS IS SURE THE SOUTH WILL WIN.

"We may have our own opinions about Slavery—we have our own opinions, as we explained the last time we spoke, I do not, I think, about that—Jefferson Davis and the Confederate States have declared that slavery was the main making it, express a sorry—and they have made what it is the corner-stone of their Confederacy. Well, then, if that be so, I must say that, certainly the success of the Southern States, so far as regards efficiency, so far as regards the power of the Government, does seem to be established, and that event is as certain as any event yet future and contingent can be. But it is from that point of view that I regard it chiefly to arise, and that the North will have to suffer their severest punishment for their conduct in having waged war with the object of forcing the Southern States against their will into a connection with the North."

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON asserted, in Worcestershire, that the time had arrived when her Majesty's Government should step in and offer to the governments of other countries, might be able to reconcile the Northern and Southern States of America, on the basis of a separation of the contending sections of the republic, and with a clear understanding that the non-success of such an effort to stay the horrors of the civil war would be followed immediately by the recognition of the Southern Confederacy.

Equally strong views have been expressed by Mr. Locke King and Mr. Alcock, members for East Surrey.

MR. F. H. BRIGHT, member for Stockport, said: "No disinterested man could doubt that the Union will be broken up, and that the Southern States will be established. The event of Antietam will have established the fact beyond dispute. It is the most extensive, though it is neither the only nor perhaps the most powerful victory.

THE FOREIGN MEN-OF-WAR IN OUR HARBOR.—[See next Page.]

FOREIGN MEN-OF-WAR IN OUR HARBOR.

We publish on page 708 a picture containing portraits of several foreign men-of-war which lay in our harbor last week. Foremost in the group is the old Minerva, a French 90-gun ship, built to sail, but afterward improved by the addition of a screw. As our picture shows, she is a survivor of a species which is rapidly becoming extinct. The opinion of one of our new Monitors could ask no better mark to fire at than the huge bulk of such a monster. The Empress de Andrea, a Spanish frigate, carrying 54 guns, occupies a prominent place in the harbor, and likewise in our picture. She is a fine, handsome vessel, though ill-adapted for modern iron-clad warfare. Other French and English craft complete the picture. While the British have been driving our men-of-war to sea without coal and without repairs, this and every other harbor of the United States have been open to Englishmen, and their every want has been supplied. A day may come, perhaps, when they may regret that they did not trust our ships with equal hospitality.

The pictures we are publishing from time to time representing foreign fleets will by-and-by possess a historical and antiquarian interest. The time is fast approaching when no more wooden men-of-war will be built, and probably no more men-of-war with masts and in the old style of naval architecture. If the new Monitors fulfill their design, and prove entirely capable of standing hard knocks but of making across the ocean, a fleet of men-of-war in the next generation will resemble a crowd of "chimney-boxes on a raft." Perhaps, by that time, our taste may be educated to consider them as beautiful as we now deem our present models of naval architecture.

MRS. LINCOLN.

We publish herewith a portrait of Mrs. LINCOLN, wife of the President of the United States, from a photograph by Brady.

Mrs. Lincoln is a native of Kentucky. Her maiden name was TOD. She has a large number of brothers and sisters, who, like so many other families, have been divided in their allegiance by the war. Two of her brothers entered the rebel army, and one was lately killed at a battle in the Southwest. One of these two was for some time employed at Richmond as jailer of the Union prisoners. His brutality and cruelty were such, however, that Jefferson Davis finally removed him from the post, and sent him to join his regiment. Another brother is in the employ of the United States Government in one of the Northwestern Territories. Mrs. Lincoln's sisters are understood to sympathize rather with the rebels than with the Government. It is probably this division of sentiment which has given rise to the gossip and social misreporting the views of the lady who presides over the White House.

Mrs. Lincoln has lately been spending some time at Chicago, and has been serenaded and visited by many of our leading citizens.

THE LOVES OF OLD LADIES.

THE romance of old ladies' love affairs has yet to be written. They are not a very attractive subject; for no reader could elicit from the perusal of them any thing in the nature of a day-dream. And they would be inadequately described by the name of friendship. They are, of course, platonic, and do not necessarily involve a male object. But they are so extravagant and so foolish that the language used to describe them must be borrowed from the vocabulary of the tender passions. Using the word in their qualified sense, the love-making of old ladies may be divided into three classes, according to the objects of their passion. Under which class they range themselves depends very much upon the subjects to which their minds have been previously turned. The most respectable type of the species, the devout old lady, of course falls in love with her clergyman. Nothing could be better and more suitable in every way than such a choice, if only it were required. There is that analogy of tastes and modes of action and logical processes which guarantees the most perfect compatibility of temper. And the old lady who is in love with the clergyman, and has become—quite, of course, in a proper way—a kind of tame cat about the Rectory-house, is so extremely useful for a number of small parochial jobs. She presides over the Dorcas Association, and makes ladies' society at the dinner which follows the clerical meeting, gives tea and cake to the National School, and makes her fashionable daughters teach there. The only drawback to her position is that the clergyman too often does not reciprocate her attachment. The clergy, as a body, prefer lambs to ewes. Old ladies have no experience, or, at least, if they have, they do not like to tell them for fear of a feel a temptation to turn aside from the old lady, who is happily not exposed to it, in order to secure those who are in real jeopardy. But, whatever the explanation may be, the fact remains one of the special crosses of the class of old ladies who fall in love with their clergymen.

Far happier are those who select their doctors as the objects of the innocent tendresse of their declining years. The clergyman and the doctor stand in a different position to each other in this respect. The clergyman is moved to pay attention to those who are under his charge solely by a sense of duty; whereas the doctor is animated by a desire of fees. Now it is found in practice that the sense of duty invariably prefers the young ladies, while the desire of fees is attracted toward those whose age is likely to predispose to a lavish expenditure in that direction. The old lady, therefore, who values her peace of mind, and who does not wish to meet with any humiliating coldness, will, if she is prudent, set her affections upon the family doctor. It is his business to make himself agreeable, especially to people who are likely to be ill; he never refuses to come when he is sent for, and there is no fear that he will ever look upon invitations as importunate; and as a walking repertory of gossip the world can not show his rival. Moreover, it is the best thing she can do for her family. Old ladies ought on every account to be encouraged to be fond of their doctors; for if they are proof against that tender passion, they almost invariably do a little doctoring on their own account. Such an amusement is one of the most terrible affections that can befall a family. Few messengers of death are more unerring than the science of medicine after it has been subjected to the mysterious processes of the amiable mind. Even in the administration of medicine, a woman's intellect appears to be incapable of vigorous impartibility. As she contemplates her medicine-chest, she has her favorites and her antipathies, and will no more believe harm of the one and good of the other than if they lived and moved in virile form. She looks on all drugs as rival suitors for her favor; and she selects one, and clings to him, for better for worse, with true womanly loyalty. The cause of her preference is often obscure. She may have fallen in love with calomel at first sight, or antimony may have become endeared to her by a long series of well-remembered cures. But whatever its claim to her fidelity, no subsequent maltreatment or misbehavior on its part can alienate her affections from the drug of her choice. And she is not satisfied with her own adoration of it. She likes to be appreciated. She insists that every one within the range of her influence shall acknowledge its merits too. In past times this was not so easy as it is now. The lady of the house always had the pet remedy, which she delighted to administer to sons and daughters, men-servants and maid-servants, and—hardest case of all—to the strangers within her gates. But this was some traditional prescription of simple herbs, from which the most important ingredient had probably fallen out by accident. But the general use of powerful medicines has changed the state of the case. Wielding her blue-pill, or her morphia, the old lady-doctor has become a fearful engine of destruction. And she can only be restrained by raising her mind from the medicine-chest to the doctor, and inspiring her with an attachment to the compounder of blue-pill to which her fondness even for blue-pills itself shall give way. Whenever a lady, advanced in years, is detected in clandestine visits to her medicine-chest, her family should lose no time in getting a fascinating doctor into the neighborhood. It is their only chance of life.

Both these types of the loves of old ladies have their advantages, and, for the sake of avoiding worse, should be rather encouraged than checked. But there is one that has no redeeming point. Sometimes an old lady takes it into her head to conceive a passionate attachment for her servants. Generally it is one particular pet who is specially favored; for diffusive charity is foreign to the female breast, in the matter of domestics as well as drugs. If the favorite be a woman-servant the consequences are very serious. Being perfect, as all ladies' favorites are as a matter of course, she is assumed to possess the virtue of perfect discretion; and under that assumption receives a full account of all family and other secrets in strict confidence, and in strict confidence she imparts it to the other favorites at the other houses in the neighborhood. Old ladies of this type are very much addicted to a style of conversation with the favorite which they call "hearing what So-and-So has got to say," but which really consists in their pouring out their own hearts to So-and-So without reserve. By a confusion of the Ego and the Non-Ego for which a German philosopher might possibly account, the impression which half an hour's uninterrupted stream of their own garrulity leaves upon their memories is that they have been quite silent, and have been receiving a great deal of valuable information. When the favorite is a man-servant the case is less serious for the family, but worse for the object of her attachment. It does not show itself by any of the ordinary signs. She does not seek his conversation or ostracists his society—rather the reverse. It takes the form of an insane fear of separation from him. The sight of any one pulling the bell affects her, as if her own tooth was fastened to the wire. Incessantly she frames excuses for not going to bed, lest he should have to go out. She renounces society, and forces her unsympathizing family to renounce it too, lest he should be out late at night. She throws the males of her family into a state bordering on insanity by substituting heavy tea for dinners, that he may not have to wait. But the mark by which she may be known is the air of unspeakable discomfort which pervades her home on Sundays—a combination of the Turkish Ramadan with the Roman Catholic Good Friday. Dyspepsia is the result of her ingenious contrivances to enable him to have his Sunday to himself. And all the while she is doing her best to ruin him, body and soul.

MRS. LINCOLN, WIFE OF THE PRESIDENT.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

JOHN W. PACKHAM, THE YOUNGEST CORPORAL IN THE ARMY.

A YOUNG HERO.

ON this page we publish the portrait of a young hero, JOHN W. PACKHAM, THE YOUNGEST CORPORAL IN THE UNITED STATES ARMY. The following letter will explain why we give his likeness at this time:

"KANAWHA RIVER, September 30, 1862.

"To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

"Herewith I send you a likeness of the little hero of Company F, 34th Regiment Ohio First Zouaves, and youngest Corporal in the United States Army. He deserves honorable mention for his bravery in refusing to go over to the rebels when threatened with death if he did not comply.

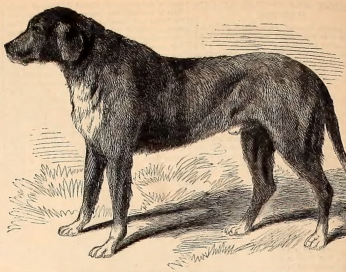
"The incident was as follows: John W. Packham, aged thirteen, regimental marker, and son of Lieutenant Albany Packham, of the 34th Regiment Ohio First Zouaves, was sent on in the rear of the ambulances, from Fayetteville to Gauley River; but upon turning the hill, about five hundred yards from the camp, they came upon two thousand rebels in the woods. A number came to the opening, and one called to our little hero (he being the only one with the ambulances in a Zouave uniform) and said, 'You little red-top devil, come over here, or I'll kill you.' His answered, 'No, I can't come!' Again and again they called to him. One finally stepped forward a few paces, raised his rifle to his shoulder, and said, 'You little fool, come over; we won't hurt you; we want to talk to you.' The little hero still refusing, the rebel fired, the ball striking and shattering his right knee. The rebels then opened a murderous fire into our sick in the ambulances, killing and wounding thirty-two who were lying therein. That rebel volley brought down the Zouaves, and the battle of Fayetteville commenced. Your artist was near the breastworks, coolly sketching the combatants at that point.

"The little hero is now in the hospital at Gallipolis, doing well under the kind nursing of the ladies, who bring him all the delicacies of the season.

"Yours respectfully,

C——."

"UNION JACK,"



THE PET OF OUR RICHMOND PRISONERS.

THE poetic incidents of this war would fill many an interesting volume could they be collected by some able hand; and it would appear that it is not man alone who is being roused to deeds of heroism, but that even the brute creation are catching the contagion.

The distinguished individual who forms the subject of this brief memoir, and whose portrait graces our present number, is the already-famous "UNION JACK," or "JACK"—as he is more briefly and familiarly called among his friends. We are not aware of Jack's entertaining any ambitious desire of being promoted to the rank of a Brigadier-General, nor have we heard of any intention, on his part, to get up a grand bow-wowing demonstration in any of our crowded theatres; but this excessive modesty should not induce us to hide his merits. Although walking upon four legs, he has exhibited far more courage, devotion, trust-worthiness, and other noble human qualities—indeed done more actual good to our army—than many a shoulder-strapped and gold-bedizened animal now walking upon two legs.

The writer of this sketch first had the honor of becoming acquainted with Jack at Fortress Monroe, on the interesting occasion of the arrival there of our liberated prisoners from Richmond—some 160 officers—on the 19th of August last. He seemed to belong to nobody in particular, but followed those officers every where about the Rygeia Hotel, receiving such caresses and marks of deep affection from every officer that we were tempted to inquire into his history.

He is a young dog of the mastiff breed, of medium size and jetty blackness, except a white breast and a dash of white on each of his four paws. His manners are very gentle and even timid among his friends, but he is suspicious and fierce as a lion when among his enemies. Although born in Secessia, and breathing constantly the air of treason, he is intensely loyal to the Union, and betrays a hatred of any thing in the shape of a rebel, which many of our "conservative" and "neutral" loyalists in the North would do well to imitate.

UNION JACK, THE PET OF OUR RICHMOND PRISONERS.

Jack originally belonged to a rebel jailer in Front Royal, Virginia, when Company F and I of the First Maryland regiment were there on provost guard duty. When Jackson made an advance upon the place, these companies fell back to join their regiment in repelling him, and, after a severe action, were surrounded by Jackson, taken prisoners, and brought back to Front Royal. It was on this occasion that Jack's great military, loyal, and social qualities were first brought into conspicuous display.

When Companies F and I left Front Royal to take the field, Jack insisted upon accompanying them, in spite of all his master's efforts to detain him. He proceeded with them to the battle-field—keeping company with the officers as he went along—and his first exploit was trying hard to unearth a cannon-ball which he had seen bury itself near him. Presently the shells began to scream and burst in the air all around him. When Jack saw them coming, instead of running to hide himself—as it is said many a blustering bully does—he ran barking after the fragments and trying to catch them; thinking, no doubt, that it was some pyrotechnic display got up for his especial amusement.

This settled the question of Jack's bravery, and from this time forward he seemed to form an affection for our officers, and they for him, which nothing could alter, and he has accompanied them through all their vicissitudes and changes of prison to Richmond.

The stories told of this dog's sagacity and devotion would seem incredulous had they not come from the most varied and reliable sources. On the road, when our parched men were fainting from thirst, he would always run forward, and whenever he discovered a pool of water would rush back, barking loudly, to tell them of it. When they were supplied with only five crackers to each man for five days—with no meat—and our poor fellows were literally dying from starvation, this noble animal has been known to go and catch chickens for them and to bring them in his mouth! or he would waylay every rebel horse or wagon passing with food, and bark imploringly for them to bring relief. On one occasion, when a sick and exhausted Union soldier had been left behind, Jack staid with him for several hours until a wagon took him up.

But one of the most remarkable features in his character is his utter hatred of the rebels. His actions, in this respect, really seemed to go beyond brute instinct. No kindness, no attempt at caressing could get the "gray-coats" to win him over or even induce him to take food from them; but he growled and snapped at them upon all occasions, until many threatened to shoot him. When they got to the Richmond prison, another large dog was there being fondled by a secesh officer, and Jack stood looking at both, apparently with the greatest hatred and disgust. When the officer left, the secesh dog tried to scrape an acquaintance with Jack, but the latter did not covet any such friendship. He rushed upon the canine rebel, gave him a sound thrashing, and, although larger than himself, fairly tossed him over his head.

Jack is a great disciplinarian. When on duty, he knows the various roll-calls so well that he pays no attention to any of them but one—that of his officers. As soon as he heard this, he used to run about in the greatest excitement, as if to call his friends together, and then, placing himself alongside of the drummer, would put up his nose and commence a long howl—the boys used to say answering to his name. In traveling he seemed to take the whole responsibility upon himself. Whenever the cars stopped he was invariably the first to jump off, and the whistle no sooner sounded than he was the first to jump on again.

But no character is perfect, and we are sorry to say there is a serious blemish in Jack's. He is an aristocrat of the first water; one of the regular out-and-out F.F.V.'s. From first to last—except to help them when in distress—he never would associate with privates, but always stuck fast to where the shoulder-straps were assembled. But, after all, in this respect poor Jack is only following the example of many a human toady and tuft-hunter that can be called to mind; and before we blame this young puppy for cringing to the rich and great, let us remember that he is not the only puppy who does so.

Upon the whole, Jack is an immense favorite with all who know him, but especially the First Maryland regiment, who claim him as their own, and who were tickled at the idea of seeing him handed down to immortality in the pages of Harper. They expressed a determination of having, as soon as they got to Baltimore, a splendid collar made expressly for their favorite; and we shall be surprised if this lucky dog does not become a great lion in the monumental city.

LOIS.

LILY likeness! That is all the word in our cool dictionary that will tell you any thing of Lois Hall; though, to be business-like, I should commence with the cottage, standing on a little brownish rise, with a faint flower-garden, and an ineffectual vegetable patch, from which you are to infer that the soil was stubborn, and likely to prove too much for the little hired boy—sole scrap of masculinity about the premises of Mrs. Hall; and that the only neighbor was the sea, tumbling in disorderly fashion on the desolate beach below them.

Lois's room looked on it, out of one little white-curtained window; the other kept itself informed as to the state of the country, and the probabilities of visitors coming "across-lots." Between them stood a bureau, whose drawers had been rifled by Tory marauders, troubled with an eruption of brass knobs and handles, having a swinging oval mirror, and a small infinity of little drawers, where, doubtless, some belle of the Revolution bestowed her powder and patches, her buckles and ruffles. In a corner was the bed, modeled, as to proportions, after that of the unlucky Canaanitish king of old—one which made getting in peculiar and getting out problematical, and offered you your choice of locality, if you had any fancies about your head and particular points of the compass; grimly carved, and unrelenting, even over Lois, asleep there, her brown hair falling all over the pillow, and a little hand clutching painfully at the coverlet. Lazy child! waking, half an hour after the usual time, with a start and troubled eyes.

"Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil," murmured Lois, as she knelt down to pray. "Does the Father of Lies send such dreams?"

I have said that "lily likeness" was the only word for Lois, yet I wish that I could better define her peculiar charm. Other girls had hair as soft and abundant, brighter color, for Lois was pale, form as lithe; neither was there strength or lofty purpose in the lines of her face: yet she took you always by surprise; she was just what you had not expected to see. Then, too, lived a peculiar charm in Lois's touch; every thing that had been near her blabbed of its happiness: the little collar lying across the toilet cushion; the velvet bow that John Gifford had taken from her hair and kissed the night before he went to join his regiment.

She was thinking now of it and him. When he came back she was to marry him; she had loved—no, not that—she had liked him all her life, from the time that he fought her battles at school till now. He was the son of their nearest neighbor; was taller, stronger, better-looking, kinder, braver, than any one else. It was quite natural. She had been more proud than grieved when he went away, and always calmly certain that he would come back safe, only her dream troubled her. It had been of him, and all pain and confusion; and I doubt if she quite recovered serenity till, on her way down, she had looked out on the piazza, and breathed in the morning peace and freshness before entering the "sitting-room," as it is styled in New England nomenclature.

Her mother turned from the window with a face brighter than the sun pouring in between the muslin curtains, leaving for Lois's view a tall figure with a lieutenant's strap on his broad shoulders, and a face that, however browned and altered by the shading of a mustache and cutting short of curling hair, was still John Gifford's.

Lois stopped short in utter wonder. Her mother quietly stepped from the room, closing the door behind her.

"Well, Apple-blossom!" cried John, "I am not a ghost, you see!"

At sound of the voice Lois remembered herself, and went quickly to him, holding out both hands.

"So it is really you! I am not half awake yet; I thought you were part of my dream. How you have changed!"

"You have not!" said the admiring John. Then suddenly catching her close in his strong arms:

"Oh, Lois, Lois! how can you? Is this your girl's nonsense, or does your still heart really know nothing of what is going on in mine? Child, I have lived in the thought of you as we ought to live to God. Why, I have stopped when the battle was at the maddest to make sure that that bit of ribbon of yours was safe, warming my heart; and all the hateful time in the hospital I had but one prayer, 'O God, come what will, let me see my little Lois again!'—while you—you are so coldly sweet."

Lois looked puzzled and distressed.

"Why I am very glad to see you, dear John, only it is so sudden, and so strange. Did you come last night? I heard nothing of it."

"We made noise enough," holding her fast, and stroking her lovely brown hair.

"We? Who?"

"I have some one with me—Captain Dinwiddie; he is a splendid fellow, got a bad hit in that last affair of ours, and I brought him here for you and mother to nurse up. He hasn't a near relative in the world, and these hotels are so deuced hard on a poor fellow that is half sick and in a hurry to get well."

Lois clouded at once.

"You know I don't like strangers, John."

But, my darling, this is my friend. He saved my life. When we were ordered on our final rush across that confounded slaughter trap of a field, my leg met a ball, and in the thickest of the fight down I went like a baby. Allan—that's the Captain, you understand—saw me tumble, sung out to some of the men, and came on, our fellows say, like a tiger, pitched into half a dozen rebels so they thought the very devil was after them, picked me up (he is not a stout man, but he took nearly all my weight himself), fairly carried me off under the very nose of the battery blazing away at us like Vesuvius or some of those fellows. Is that a stranger! We've stuck together like David and Jonathan. I don't believe there has been a skirmish, or a ticklish reconnoissance, or a hard camping out, that we haven't shared together; and then, Lois," argues this impetuous John, calming a little, "if I took him home you know what the girls are. They couldn't nurse him or talk to him as you can, and your mother is willing. What do you suppose she said last night, bless her!—that she would take a regiment in if they were friends of mine;" and John burst into a somewhat forced laugh, by way of contradicting his eyes.

"This Captain must be a hero. I should like to see him," thought Lois; for John never could enter in her imagination even as candidate for that distinction. He was blundering about women's matters, and not always kind to the queen's English—things impossible to reconcile with heroship.

"Well, pussy?" asked John, a little anxiously.

Born to be hen-pecked was our John evidently, but then so was the Duke of Marlborough.

"I was wrong. I am glad you brought Captain Dinwiddie here," answered Lois, quietly.

The door opened. "He is coming!" whispered John, still trying to hold her fast, but she slipped away from him like snow, and stood expectant. The first look was a disappointment.

Captain Dinwiddie was thirty at least, probably thirty-five, and looked to Lois's inexperienced eyes slightly made. His features were irregular, his only beauty a pair of fine eyes, normally gray, but changing perpetually to blue and even intensest black, and almost feminine softness—owing doubtless to the remarkable length of the lashes, yet interpenetrated every tone and look, that "charm" as subtle and impossible to define when found in man as in woman—and Lois, who had recoiled at first, caught herself, before ten minutes were well over, liking him very much. Came simultaneously with this admission an oppressing sense of being ill at ease, of every thing looking its worst, of John's boorishness, of the mortifying plainness of their housekeeping. Engaged in this profitable thinking, she could hardly have told whether she had eaten breakfast or not. John, however, at the zenith of his happiness, read nothing of this in Lois's downcast face. He was busy with his plans for the day.

"He must make his peace at home," he said, laughingly, "and Lois he dared say would entertain Captain Dinwiddie;" at which Lois held her peace, but inwardly fell into consternation, for what had she in common with this fine Captain? So terrified was she at the thought, that she even came out of her shell of coolness, and eagerly whispered John to stay, holding his coat by one white finger and blushing very much. John wouldn't have given that timid touch for the diamonds of Sinbad; yet there was the fact of mother and sisters unvisited, stubborn as ever, leaving him nothing but to ride away after all.

Lois sat down by her little work-basket with a strip of muslin. Doubtless its hemming was of vital importance, for if it had been the bond of peace or the ties of affection she couldn't have given it more undivided attention. Allan drew up the lounge close by her.

"May I lie down? I have gotten used to self-petting since this troublesome wound."

Lois looked up at him. She had not thought how really pale and suffering he seemed. He "certainly" took a new inflection, for now that she knew what to do with him and could pity him he had lost at once all his terrors.

He lay a while quietly watching her—suddenly broke out,

"It was good in John to bring me here. After our stormy life, you and this little quiet home are veritable Paradise. I think myself there."

Certainly he looked his thought; the hard lines had gone from his face; he might have been ten years younger, but he could never long be quiet. He fidgeted, turned form side to side, drew presently a book from his pocket.

"Lois—I beg pardon, Miss Hall—I am so used to hear John speak of you by that pretty Puritan name of yours."

"Every one calls me so, you need not make the exception."

"Well then, Lois," dwelling lovingly on the word, "let me read to you;" and without waiting for assent, he began the story of Enid.

Lois listened pleased at first, but half way her lips began to curl.

"You don't like it?" he asked, curiously.

"The telling, but not the story."

"You wouldn't so have ridden with the man you loved?"

Lois's eyes rather than her lips flashed out "Never!"

"Then you have never—" He stopped short.

"Never what?"

"Nothing."

"What were you about to say?"

"I have thought better of it, I shall not tell you."

"Please."

"Positively no," and he went on reading.

John came back late and looking anxious.

"Small benefit would he get from his furlough! Mother was over head and ears in a lawsuit, and every one was in trouble, and he must spend at least three days in town, perhaps more, and try to straighten out the tangled skein."

Lois looked grave on hearing this, but then that was only natural.

John staid not three days but a week; wrote then, postponing his return indefinitely. "If he only had the lawyers in proper position before a certain battery that he wot of, he thought that he could bring them to terms; as it was, submission and patience were all that were left."

That morning Allan's wound had troubled him, and he had spent it on the sofa while Lois sat near with her sewing. When lunch time came she would not permit him to stir, but brought up the old-fashioned stand, that spent most of its time in being very much on one side in a corner, and looking like a target, laid thereon a fresh cloth that scented of rose leaves, a silver basket piled with roasted apples, and a pitcher of a quaint stumpiness and solidity filled with cream. Just then came John's letter. Allan watched her read, or rather hurry over it impatiently.

"He says it may be another week before he comes," was her comment, letting the letter slip through her careless fingers to the floor.

Allan picked it up.

"I have no pocket," said Lois, "and it is too much trouble to go up stairs."

"What shall I do with it?"

"What you like."

"You mean that?"

"Yes; why not?"

Allan's eyes were at their intensest, looking into hers with a glance that she could not bear an instant. He rose deliberately, walked to the fireplace, held it over the coals an instant, and dropped it in. At that Lois, who had been sitting like one petrified, exclaimed,

"Oh, Allan!"

"Well?"

His tone was so sharp that she shrank a little.

"Nothing—there is no harm—I have read it; but oh! John would never believe it!"

Allan groaned.

"I wish I were shriveled up, body and soul, like that!" pointing to the black film quivering on the coals.

"Oh no! not without me!" cried the girl who a week before smiled her scorn of Enid's tame constancy.

Allan turned and came hastily toward her—stopped half way—ground out a bitter exclamation, and left the room; and a little after Lois saw him galloping past the window on his way to town. He came back late and went at once to his room. The next day he frequented the kitchen, to Mrs. Hall's discomfiture, and stuck by that lady as though she were his salvation, all the time plainly avoiding Lois. He was fighting Apollyon manfully—fighting as a man will with remorse behind and dishonor in front.

Lois, poor child! understood nothing of this. She had sometimes a dim, painful sense of wrong and danger, but it was forgotten now in the new and overwhelming fear of having in some unimaginable way offended him; and she wearied out memory trying to recall the unhappy word or look that had done this mischief. For the hundredth time she was thinking this over as they were going down to the beach in utter, dreary silence, he with head bent down and lip compressed.

Suddenly the pain grew too intolerable.

"What have I done?" she exclaimed. "Are you angry with me? What is it? You make me so miserable, Allan!"

Captain Dinwiddie shuddered from head to foot, and looked desperately away; but there were the soft, clinging fingers on his arm, and the burning, pitiful face that he had seen with his first unguarded look, and the sudden tremble of the sweet voice, and, above all, the passionate love in his fierce heart; and suddenly honor, conscience, will, whatever chains had bound him, snapped short. Words came like lava:

"Angry, and at you, my darling! my own—" He stopped sharply. They were close on the beach. "Watch that wave," he said, hoarsely. "If it break against this rock it is fate. If not—well, we shall see."

Even as he spoke it was upon them, breaking over the fragment on which they stood, wetting Lois's dainty walking-boots.

"It is fate," he repeated.

"What?"

"I will tell you by-and-by. Let us go back."

The afternoon was a wild one; sun showing fitfully among hurrying clouds, and the wind moaning and shrieking after them as they went up toward the house. Already it was almost dark in the cozy sitting-room, and the fire gleamed and smouldered in twilight fashion. The house was deserted. Kitty had leave of absence; Mrs. Hall had gone to a neighbor's. No better time for Allan Dinwiddie than now. He caught Lois's hand and drew her down beside him.

"Lois," he said, "when, in place of the apple-cheeked, black-eyed girl I had imagined, I first saw you, I said to myself, this poor, blundering John has stumbled on the pearl that I have been uselessly looking for all my life. When you rebelled against Enid I knew that you had never loved. I had guessed it from the first; you had all the calm of a child. When I burned the letter I tried you; but your words called up John; I fancied him amazed, reproachful, incredulous of my villainy. I hated the thought of my perfidy. Child, what evil spirit was it that sent you to me then, with your pleading eyes—as if I could be angry with you? Then, when I felt what a straw I was in the vortex, I said, let chance decide: if the wave strike the rock I will struggle no more; if not, I will leave this place to-night. Yet, after all, Lois, it is you, not the wave, that must decide. Tell me, dear, what is my verdict? Do you love me?"

Lois hid her face, but Allan drew her hands away and held them; and then, her head drooping lower and lower,

"I thought that I loved John—I did, indeed," she said, pitifully. "I was so ignorant. I never once guessed, though I might have known, why I liked you so. Oh! I am a wicked, wicked girl! I hope John will kill me!"

"You should have known John better," cried some one coming out of the shadow, and showing them John himself.

Lois was too utterly appalled to speak; move she could not, for Allan held her fast.

"There were two men in one city," went on the solemn voice, "the one rich, and the other poor. The rich man had exceeding many flocks and herds. But the poor man had nothing, save one little ewe lamb, which he had bought and nourished up—"

The steady tones faltered. Lois cried out,

"Let me go, Allan!—I will go! I tell you this will kill me!"

She writhed herself free, and going over to John tried to kneel before him, but he held her out at arms'-length.

"Kill me!" she said, faintly.

"For what?—to add crime to sorrow? Oh! Lois, it is bitter enough now! I prayed God that I might see you again, come what would, and He heard me; and rather than have had such seeing I would that my lips had stiffened in death while I was praying."

"It is not worth it," said Lois, half proudly. "I am only a silly girl. Some day you will wonder how you could have cared for me."

John took a little case from his pocket and tossed it open on the table.

"See, Lois, these were for you: you were always running in my head. I think your little finger was more precious in my sight than all the women I ever saw. Fool that I was! all the way home I pleased myself thinking how I should clasp them on your pretty wrists. I hid myself when I saw you coming, thinking to surprise you. I never dreamed that you didn't love me; yet I might have known that you were too young to look into your own heart, or to bind yourself by such a solemn promise. But you—oh Allan! my friend—my brother!"

Allan raised his head.

"If it will be any satisfaction to use me for a target."

"No, no!" cried Lois, hurrying between them, "the blame is mine—all mine."

John turned pale at that. To see her looking at Allan with such love in the eyes that had been so cold for him was more than he could bear.

"It is a sore temptation," he said, hurriedly. "I had better go. If I stay here longer I shall have as many devils as the man whose name was Legion."

He went away, avoiding Mrs. Hall, whom he saw coming at a distance. Lois sobbed hysterically, and Allan, who spite of remorse could not help feeling triumph also, set himself to comfort her—an easier matter that than to explain to Mrs. Hall who loved John almost as well as she did Lois. Still the thing was done—could not be undone. Scandal would not help it, so she sighed in secret, shielded and countenanced them outwardly, above all hastened their marriage as fast as possible.

In her happiness Lois has almost forgotten John's sad, stern face, and the solemn words uttered in the twilight; but will sin forget her?

CHAPTER II.

MRS. LECOUNT mixed the oil soluble with water, and administered it immediately. The stimulant had its effect. In a few minutes Noel Vanstone was able to raise himself in the chair without assistance: his color changed again for the better, and his breath came and went more freely.

"How do you feel now, Sir?" asked Mrs. Lecount. "Are you warm again on your left side?"

He paid no attention to that inquiry; his eyes, wandering about the room, turned by chance toward the table. Mrs. Lecount's appearance, instead of answering her he bent forward in his chair, and looked with staring eyes and pointing hand at the second bottle which she had taken from the cupboard, and which she had hastily laid aside, without paying attention to it. Seeing that some new alarm possessed him, she advanced to the table, and looked where he looked. The labeled side of the bottle was full in her view; and there, in the plain handwriting of the chemist at Aldborough, was the one name of the world, confronting them both, "Poison."

Even Mrs. Lecount's self-possession was shaken by that discovery. She was not prepared to see her own darkest forebodings—the unacknowledged offspring of her hatred for Magdalen—realized as she saw them realized now. The suicide-despair in which the poison had been procured, the suicide-purpose for which, in distrust of the future, the poison had been kept, had brought with them their own confirmation. There the bottle lay, in Magdalen's absence, a false witness of treason which had never entered her mind—treason against her husband's son.

With his hand still mechanically pointing at the table, Noel Vanstone raised his head and looked up at Mrs. Lecount.

"I took it from the cupboard," she said, answering the look. "I took both bottles out together, not knowing which might be the bottle I wanted. I am as much shocked, as much frightened, as you are."

"Poison!" he said to himself, slowly. "Poison locked up by my wife, in the cupboard in her own room." He stopped, and looked at Mrs. Lecount once more. "For me?" he asked, in a vacant, inquiring tone.

"We will not talk of it, Sir, until your mind is better at ease," said Mrs. Lecount. "Let us try to forget this dreadful discovery for the present—let us go down stairs at once. All that I have now to say to you can be said in another room."

She helped him to rise from the chair, and took his arm in her own. "It is well for him, it is well for me," she thought, as they went down stairs together, "that I came when I did."

On crossing the passage she stepped to the front door, which the carriage was waiting which had brought her from Dumfries, and instructed the coachman to put up his horses at the nearest inn, and to call again for her in two hours' time. This done she accompanied Noel Vanstone into the sitting-room, stirred up the fire, and placed him before it comfortably in an easy-chair. He sat for a few minutes, warming his hands fretfully like an old man, and staring straight into the flame. Then he spoke.

"When the woman came and threatened me in Vauxhall Walk," he began, still staring into the fire, "you came back to the parlor, after she was gone; and you told me—" He stopped, shivered a little, and lost the thread of his recollections at that point.

"I told you, Sir," said Mrs. Lecount, "that the woman was, in my opinion, Miss Vanstone herself. Don't start, Mr. Noel! I say this is so, to yourself, if you feel frightened. 'Lecount is here: Lecount will take care of me.' The truth must be told, Sir, however hard to us the truth may be. Miss Magdalen Vanstone was the woman who came to you in disguise; and the woman who came to you in disguise is the woman you have married. The conspiracy which she threatened you with in London is the conspiracy which has made her your wife. That is the plain truth. You have seen the dress-up stairs. If that dress had been no longer in existence, I should still have had my proofs to convince you. Thanks to my own resources, and to Providence, I have discovered the house your wife lodged at in London—it was opposite our house in Vauxhall Walk. I have laid my hand on one of the landlady's daughters, who watched your wife from room to room on her part; on the dress-maker who can speak to her identity, and to the identity of her companion, Mrs. Bygrave; and who has furnished me, at my own request, with a written statement of facts, which she is ready to affirm on oath, if any question arises on the subject. Shall I read the statement, Mr. Noel, if you like, when you are fitter to understand it? You shall also read a letter in the handwriting of Miss Garth—who will repeat to you personally, if you like, what she has written to me—a letter generally denying that she was ever in Vauxhall Walk, and formally asserting that those letters on your wife's neck are marks peculiar to Miss Magdalen Vanstone, whom she has known from childhood. I say it with a just pride—she will find no weak place anywhere in the evidence which I bring you. If Mr. Bygrave had not stolen off in the night, you would have had your warning before I was cruelly deceived into going to Zurich; and the proofs which I now bring you after your marriage I should then have offered to you before it. Don't hold me responsible, Sir, for the bad management of affairs in England. Blame your uncle's bastard daughter, and blame that villain with the brown eye and the green!"

She spoke low last venomous words as slowly and distinctly as she had spoken the first. Noel Vanstone made no answer—he still sat cowering over the fire. She looked round into his face. "Are you not ashamed, Mr. Noel, to so fond of her?" said the miserable little creature. "And I thought she was so fond of you!"

Mrs. Lecount turned back on him in disdainful silence. "Fond of her?" As she repeated those words to herself, the hatred that had become almost handsome again in the magnificent intensity of its contempt.

She walked to the window at the lower end of the room and began examining the volumes in the Bellevue library. Her own cagerness to see the way she was startled by the sound of his voice affrightedly calling her back. The tears were streaming down his face: it was in misery with terror when he now turned it toward her.

"Lecount!" he said, piteously, with both hands. "Can an egg be poisoned? I had an egg for breakfast this morning and a little toast."

"Make your mind easy, Sir," said Mrs. Lecount. "The poison of your wife's deceit is the only poison you have taken yet. I shall have solved nothing on making sure by the price of your folly with your life, she would not be absent from the house at the time when I expect her. It dismiss the thought from your mind. It is in the middle of the day; you want refreshment. I have nothing to say to you, and nothing can your own safety—I have something for you to do, which needs all your self-command, all your strength and you will do it. I will set you the example of eating if you still distrust the food in your hands. Are you sufficiently recovered to give the servant her orders if I ring the bell? It is a question of time. If you are not sure for you, that nobody should think you ill in body, or troubled in mind. Try first with me before the servant comes in. And I will see how you can speak when you say, 'Bring up the lunch.'"

After twenty minutes Mrs. Lecount considered him fit to give the order without betraying himself.

The bell was answered by Louisa—Louisa looked hard at Mrs. Lecount. The luncheon was brought up by the housemaid—the housemaid looked hard at Mrs. Lecount. When luncheon was over, the table was cleared by the cook —the cook looked hard at Mrs. Lecount. All three servants were plainly suspicious that something extraordinary was going on in the house. It was hardly possible to doubt that the orders arranged to share among themselves the three opportunities which the service of the table afforded them of entering the room.

The curiosity of which she was object did not escape the penetration of Mrs. Lecount. "I did well," she thought, "to arm myself in good time with the means of recalling him to me. If I let the grass grow under my feet, one or other of those women might get in my way." Round this considerations she built her instructions to the boy from a corner, as soon as the last of the dishes was taken away. She had carefully calculated the quantity of wine which he had taken at lunch, and knew that it was not enough to fortify without confusing him—and she now examined his face critically, like an artist examining his picture, before she gave the boy's work. The result appeared to satisfy her; and she opened the serious business of the interview on the spot.

"Will you look at the written evidence I mentioned to you, Mr. Noel, before I say any more?" she inquired. "Or are you sufficiently persuaded of the truth to proceed at once to the suggestion which I have now to make to you?"

"Let me hear your suggestion," he said, sullenly turning his elbow on the table, and leaning his head on his hands.

Mrs. Lecount took from her traveling-bag the written evidence to which she had just alluded, and carefully placed the papers on one side of him, within easy reach if he wished to refer to them. Far from being daunted, she was visibly encouraged by the ungraciousness of his manner. Her experience of him informed her that the spy was a promising one. On more than one occasions when the little resolution that he possessed was roused in him, it invariably asserted itself—like the resolution of most other weak men—aggressively. At such times in proportion as he was essentially reckless and discourteous to those about him his resolution rose; and in proportion as he was considerate and polite it fell. The tone of the answer he had just given, and the attitude he assumed at the table, convinced Mrs. Lecount that Spanish wine and Scotch mutton had done their duty, and had rallied his sinking courage.

"I will put the question to you for form's sake, Sir, if you wish it," she proceeded. "But I am already certain, without any question at all, that you have made your will?"

He nodded his head without looking at her. "You have made it in your wife's favor?"

He nodded again.

"You have left her every thing you possess?"

"No."

Mrs. Lecount looked surprised.

"Have you made a provision for her, Mr. Noel, of your own accord?" she inquired, "or is it possible that your wife put her own limits to her interest in your will?"

He was uneasily silent—he was plainly ashamed to answer the question. Mrs. Lecount repeated it in a less direct form.

"How much have you left your widow, Mr. Noel, in the event of your death?"

"Eighty thousand pounds."

That reply answered the question. Eighty thousand pounds was exactly the fortune which Michael Vanstone had taken from his brother's orphan children at his brother's death—exactly the fortune of which Michael Vanstone's son had kept possession, in his turn, so pitilessly as his father before him. Noel Vanstone's silence was eloquent of the confession which he was ashamed to make. His cowering weakness had, beyond all doubt, placed his whole property at the feet of his wife. And this girl, whose vindictive daring had defied all restraints—this girl, who had not shrunk from her desperate determination even at the church door—and, in the very hour of her triumph, taken part only from the man who would willingly have given all—had rigorously exacted her father's fortune from him to the last farthing, and had then turned her back on the hand that was trembling her with tens of thousands more! For the moment Mrs. Lecount was fairly silenced by her own surprise; Magdalen had found an astonishment from her which is akin to admiration, the astonishment which her enemy would also have refused. She hated Magdalen with a tenfold hatred from that time.

"I have no doubt, Sir," she resumed, after a momentary silence, "that Mrs. Noel gave you excellent reasons why the provision for her at your death should be no more, and no less, than eighty thousand pounds. And, on the other hand, I am sure that you, in your own innocence of all suspicion, found those reasons conclusive at the time. That time has now gone by. Your eyes are opened, Sir; and you will not fail to remark (as I remark) that the Combe-Raven property happens to reach the same sum exactly as the legacy which your wife's own instructions directed you to leave her. If you are still in any doubt of the motive for which she married you, look in your own will, and there the motive is!"

He raised his head from his hands, and became closely attentive to what she was saying to him for the first time since they had faced each other at the table. The Combe-Raven property had never been classed by itself in his estimation. It had come to him merged in his father's other possessions at his father's death. The discovery which had now opened before him was one to which his ordinary habits of thought, as well as his innocence of suspicion, had hitherto closed his eyes. He said nothing, but he looked less sullenly at Mrs. Lecount. His manner was more ingratiating; the high tide of his courage was already on the ebb.

"Your position, Sir, must be made safe by this time as it is to me," said Mrs. Lecount. "There is only one obstacle now left between Miss Vanstone and the attainment of her ends. That obstacle is your life. After the discovery we have made up stairs, I leave you to consider for yourself what your life is worth."

At those terrible words the ebbing resolution in him ran out to the last drop. "I say, Lecount—tell me!" he pleaded; "I have been frightened enough already." He rose, and dragged his chair after him round the table to Mrs. Lecount's side. He sat down, and carelessly kissed her hand. "You good creature!" he said, in a sinking voice. "You excellent Lecount! Tell me what to do. I'm full of resolution—I'll do any thing to save my life!"

"Have you got writing materials in the room, Sir?" asked Mrs. Lecount. "Will you put pen, ink, and paper before me, if you please?"

While the writing materials were in process of collection Mrs. Lecount made a new demand on the resources of her traveling-bag. She took two papers from it, each indorsed in the same clear commercial handwriting. One was described as "Draft for proposed Will;" and the other as "Draft for proposed Letter." When she placed them before her on the table her hand shook a little; and she applied the smelling-salts, which she had brought with her in Noel Vanstone's interests, to her own nostrils.

"I had hoped, when I came here, Mr. Noel," she proceeded, "to have given you more time for consideration than it seems safe to give you now. When you first told me of your wife's absence in London I thought it probable that the object of her journey was to see her sister and Miss Garth. Since the horrible discovery we have made up stairs I am inclined to alter that opinion. Your wife's determination was to kill you who the friends are whom she has gone to see fills me with alarm. She may have accomplices in London—accomplices for any thing we know to the contrary, in this house. All three of your servants, Sir, have taken the opportunity in your of coming into the room and looking at me. I don't like their looks! Neither you nor I know what may happen from day to day, or even from hour to hour. If you take my advice you will get the start at once of all possible revelations, and arm the law against the attack you will leave this house with me."

"Yes, yes," he said, eagerly; "I'll leave the house with you. I wouldn't stop here by myself for any sum of money that could be offered me. What do you want the pen and ink for? Are you to write, or am I?"

"You are to write, Sir," said Mrs. Lecount. "The means taken for promoting your own safety are to be means set in motion, from beginning to end, by yourself. I suggest, Mr. Noel —and you decide. Recognize your own position, Sir. What is your first and foremost necessity? It is plainly that. You must destroy your wife's interest in your death by making another will."

He vehemently nodded his approval; his color rose, and his blinking eyes brightened in audacious triumph. "She shan't have a farthing," he said to himself, in a whisper—"she shan't see me a farthing!"

"When your will is made, Sir," proceeded Mrs. Lecount, "you must place it in the hands of a trustworthy person—not my hands, Mr.

"MRS. LECOUNT MOVED WITH IMPENETRABLE DIGNITY FROM THE TABLE TO THE DOOR."

Noel! I am only your servant! Then, when the will is safe, and when you are safe, write to your wife at this house. Tell her her infamous imposture is discovered—tell her you have made a new will, which leaves her penniless at your death—tell her, in your righteous indignation, that she enters your doors no more. Place yourself in that strong position, and it is no longer you who are at your wife's mercy, but she at yours. Be firm with her. Assert your own power, Sir, with the law to help you, and crush this woman into submission to any terms for the future that you please to impose."

He eagerly took up the pen. "Yes," he said, with a vindictive self-importance, "any terms I please to impose." He suddenly checked himself, and laid the pen down again, and perplexed. "How can I do it now?" he asked, throwing down the pen as quickly as he had taken it up. "How can I do it?" he repeated Mrs. Lecount.

"How can I make my will, with Mr. Loscombe away in London and no lawyer here to help me?"

Mrs. Lecount gently tapped the papers before her on the table with her forefinger.

"All the help you need, Sir, is waiting for you here," she said. "I considered the matter carefully before I came to you, and I provided myself with the confidential assistance of a friend, to guide me through these difficulties which I could not penetrate for myself. The friend to whom I refer is a gentleman of Swiss extraction, but born and bred in England. He is not a lawyer by profession, but he has had his own sufficient experience of the law (as gentlemen have); and he has supplied me, not only with a model by which you may make your will, but with the written sketch of a letter which it is all important for us to have as the model of the will itself. There is another matter, Sir, which you, Mr. Noel, which I have not mentioned yet, but which is no less urgent, in its way, than the necessity of the will."

"What is it?" he asked, with roused curiosity.

"We will take it in its turn, Sir," answered Mrs. Lecount. "Its turn has not come yet. The will, if you please, Mr. Noel, will dictate from the model in my possession, and you will write. Unless I greatly mistake your present distress, the sketch will be completed, will be short enough and simple enough for a child to understand, in half an hour. Compose your own your mind, by all means compose those doubts by showing your will to a lawyer by profession. In the mean time, let me be the amanuensis. I can trust you, Sir, to read that you are all mortal, and that the best opportunity of making a will is the called. While your time is your own, Sir, and while your enemies are unsuspicious of you, make your will!"

She opened a sheet of note-paper and smoothed it out before him; she dipped the pen in ink and placed it in his hands. He took it from her without speaking; he was, to all appearance, suffering under some overwhelming agitation of mind. But the main point was gained. There he sat, with the paper before him and the pen in his hand, ready at last, in right earnest, to make his will.

"The first question for you to decide, Sir," said Mrs. Lecount, after a preliminary glance at her Draft, "is your choice of an executor. I have no doubt that you will appoint your lawyer; but I may, without impropriety, remind you that a wise choice, in other cases, often falls to those of an old and tried friend whom you know that you can trust.

"I mean the admiral, I suppose?" said Noel Vanstone.

Mrs. Lecount bowed.

"Very well," he continued. "The admiral let it be."

There was plainly some oppression still weighing on his mind. Even under the trying circumstances in which he was now placed it was not in his nature to take Mr. Clarkson's perfectly sensible and disinterested advice without a word of cavil, as he had taken it now.

"Are you ready, Sir?"

"Yes."

Mrs. Lecount dictated the first paragraph from the Draft as follows:

"This is the last Will and Testament of me, Noel Vanstone, now living at Beliol Cottage, near Dumfries. I revoke, absolutely and in every particular, my former will, executed on the fourth day of September, eighteen hundred and forty-seven; and I hereby appoint Rear-Admiral Arthur Everard Bartram, R.N., my Cross-the-Marsh, Essex, sole executor of this my will."

"Have you written those words, Sir?"

"Yes."

Mrs. Lecount laid down the Draft; Noel Vanstone laid down the pen. They neither of them looked at each other. There was a long silence.

"I am waiting, Mr. Noel," said Mrs. Lecount, at last, "to hear what your wishes are in respect to the disposal of your fortune. Your large fortune," she added, with merciless emphasis.

He took up the pen again, and began picking the feathers from the quill in dead silence.

"Perhaps your decision will not keep you to instruct me, Sir," pursued Mrs. Lecount. "May I inquire to whom you will add the surplus money after leaving the eighty thousand pounds to your wife?"

If he had answered that question plainly he must have said, "I have left the whole surplus to my cousin, George Bartram," and the implied acknowledgment that Mrs. Lecount's name was not mentioned in the will must then have followed in Mrs. Lecount's presence. A much bolder man, in his situation, might have shrunk from the torture of making that confession—to which he was feeling now. He picked the last morsel of feather from the quill, and, desperately leaping the pitfall under his feet, advanced to meet Mrs. Lecount's claims on him of his own accord.

"I would rather not talk of any will but the will I am making now," he said, uneasily. "The first thing, Lecount—"

He hesitated—put the last feather on the quill into his mouth—gnawed at it thoughtfully—and said no more.

"Yes, Sir?" prompted Mrs. Lecount.

"The first thing is—"

"Yes, Sir?"

"The first thing is, to—to make some provision for You?"

He spoke his last words in a tone of plaintive interrogation—as if all hope of being met by a magnanimous refusal had not deserted him even yet. Mrs. Lecount enlightened him in cruel on this point without a moment's lost of time.

"Thank you, Mr. Noel," she said, with the tone and manner of a woman who was not acknowledging a favor but receiving a right.

He took out his left arm and gulped. The perspiration began to appear on his face.

"The difficulty is," he remarked, "to say how much."

"Your benefactress, Sir," rejoined Mrs. Lecount, "is not that difficulty (if you remember at the time of his last illness?"

"I don't remember," said Noel Vanstone doggedly.

"You were on one side of his bed, Sir, and I was on the other, when I have put to you, deliberately, the question of his will. After telling us he would wait and make his will when he was well again—after telling us that we could send some kind and feeling words which my memorandum-book will help me to supply. Have you forgotten those words, Mr. Noel?"

"Yes," said Mr. Noel, without hesitation.

"In my memorandum-book, Sir," resumed Mrs. Lecount, "delicacy forbids me to improve your memory."

She looked at her watch and relapsed into silence. He clenched his hands and writhed from side to side in his chair. He got out of it, at last, to decision. Mrs. Lecount passively refused to take the slightest notice of him.

"What shall I say—?" he began, and suddenly stopped again.

"Yes, Sir?"

"What should you say to—a thousand pounds?"

Mrs. Lecount rose from her chair and looked him full in the face with the majestic indignation of an outraged woman.

"After the service I have rendered you today, Mr. Noel," she said, "I have at least earned a right to be spared insult. I have received nothing more. I will you good-morning."

"Two thousand," cried Noel Vanstone, with the courage of despair.

Mrs. Lecount folded up her papers and hung her trembling hands over her arm in contemptuous silence.

"Five thousand!"

Mrs. Lecount moved with impenetrable dignity from the table to the door.

"Four thousand!"

Mrs. Lecount gathered her shawl round her with a shudder and opened the door.

"Five thousand!"

He clasped his hands and wrung them at her in the frenzy of rage and suspense. "Five thousand!" was the death-cry of his pecuniary suicide.

Mrs. Lecount softly shut the door again and came back to him.

"Free of legacy duty, Sir?" she inquired.

"Oh!"

Mrs. Lecount turned on her heel and opened the door again.

"Yes!"

Mrs. Lecount came back and resumed her place at the table as if nothing had happened.

Five thousand pounds, free of legacy duty, was the sum, Sir, which your father's grateful regard pointed out to me that I ought to receive.

"If you choose to exert your memory, as you have not chosen to exert it yet, your memory will tell you that I was right. I accept your filial performance of your father's promise, Mr. Noel—and there it ends. It seems to take a mean advantage of my position toward you; I scorn to grasp my thing from your fears. I am above all by my respect for myself and for the illustrious Name I bear. You are welcome to all the help I have done and to all the care I have suffered in your service. The widow of Professor Lecompte, Sir, takes what is justly her own, and takes no more."

As she spoke there words the traces of sickness seemed to have begun to disappear from her face; her eyes shone with a steady inner light; all the woman warmed and brightened in the radiance of her own self-approval. Stretched, trebly won, of carrying her point, of vindicating her integrity, and of matching Magdalen's cruel triumph with a triumph of her own, she looked every inch a commanding woman.

"When you are yourself again, Sir, we will resume. Until then no more!"

She gave him time to compose himself; and then, after first looking at her Draft, dictated the second paragraph in these words:

"I give and bequeath to Madame Virginie Lecompte (widow of Professor Lecompte, late of Zurich), the sum of Five Thousand Pounds, free of Legacy Duty, in testimony of the high sense I wish to piece it on record that I am not only expressing my own sense of Madame Lecompte's attachment and fidelity in the capacity of my housekeeper, but that I also believe myself to be executing the intentions of my deceased father, who, but for the circumstance of his dying intestate, would have left Madame Lecompte, in his will, the same token of grateful regard for her services which I now leave her in mine."

"Have you written the last words, Sir?"

"Yes."

Mrs. Lecount leaned across the table and offered Noel Vanstone her hand.

"Thank you, Mr. Noel," she said. "The five thousand pounds is the acknowledgment on your father's side of what I have done for him. The words in the will are the acknowledgment on yours."

A faint smile flickered over his face for the first time. He comforted him, on reflection, to think that matters might have been worse. There was still room for a kindred spirit in paying the debt of gratitude by a sentence not negotiable at his banker's. Whatever his father might have said, he had got Lecount a bargain after all!

While more writing, Mr. Noel?" inquired Mrs. Lecount, "and your painful but necessary duty will be performed. The trifling matter of my legacy being settled, we shall come to the important question that is left. The future direction of a large fortune is now waiting your word of command. What is to be done with it?"

He began to writhe again in his chair. Even under the first powerful fascination of his wife the parting with his money on paper had not been accomplished without a pang. He had endured the pang; he had resigned himself to the sacrifice. And now here was the dreaded ordeal again awaiting him mercilessly for the second time!

"Perhaps it may assist your decision, Sir, if I repeat the suggestion which I have put to you already," observed Mrs. Lecount. "In the will which you are now making, the residuary legatee to whom did you leave the surplus money which remained at your own disposal?"

There was no help in answering the question now. He acknowledged that he had left the money to his cousin George.

"You cannot have done nothing better, Mr. Noel, and you can do nothing better now," said Mrs. Lecount. "Mr. George and his two sisters are your only relations left. One of those sisters is an incurable invalid, with more than money enough for all she wants while she lives; her affliction allows her to feel. The other is rich, and will be even richer than yourself. To leave the money to these sisters is to waste it. To leave the money to their brother George is to give your property exactly the assistance which he will want, when he one day inherits his uncle's fortune, to complete the ruin of that unfortunate estate. A will which names the admiral your executor, and Mr. George your heir, is the right will for you to make. It does honor to the claims of friendship, and it does justice to the claims of blood."

She spoke warmly, for she spoke with a grateful remembrance of all that she herself owed to the hospitality of Mr. Crux. Noel Vanstone took up another pen and began to strip the second quill of its feathers as he had stripped the first.

"Yes," he said, reluctantly: I suppose George must have it—I suppose George has the principles of a gentleman, and I can trust him." He looked at the door, he looked at the window, as if he longed to make his escape by one way or the other. "Will that do?" he cried, piteously. "it's such a large fortune! Let me wait a little before I leave it to my wife!"

To his surprise, Mrs. Lecount at once complied with this characteristic request.

"I shall do right to wait, Sir," she replied. "I have something important to say before you add another line to your will. Pray excuse me while I fold you there was a second necessity connected with your present situation, which had not occurred to me before, but which must be provided for when the time came. The time has come now. I am under a serious difficulty to meet and conquer before you can leave your fortune to your cousin George."

"What difficulty?" he asked.

Mrs. Lecount rose from her chair without answering, stole to the door, and suddenly threw it open. No one was listening outside: the passage was a solitude from one end to the other.

"Mr. Bygrave's clerk," she said, returning to her place—"your servants particularly. Sir closer, Mr. Noel. What I have now to say to you must be heard by no living creature but ourselves."

A LETTER FROM THE COUNTRY.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

DEAR MR. EDITER—Sarah Blue is a woman, and I bein' a person on the same socks, ya see it's natural we shouldn't always agree.

I call myself a thorough aiminstratrix—I go for law and administration, for the present one. None ov yure shan demockrays for me!

Sarah says the same; but, between you and me and the post, Sarah is a good administratrix just as long as affares go on ta suit her, but jest the eyedentical minit things go against the grain, she's off on the other side like a shot.

But I don't wunder at her ideas bein' unwhat fulled with politics, for her father was the first turn-out yve ever did see. He was brut up a methodis—then turned dissenyer, and was sent to prison for it—then turned infidle, and eny one said that he intered inter political life for the sake ov gittin' into office. Perhaps the only one ov the folks (as has also cold ewff then, in all kossheuce!), and putty soon arter that he got ournsiet and died like a dog. Sarah's father's only offense he was expelled from the methodists, on the charge of perviritin' the Scripture, which says, thee canot not make to thy hair white or black. Then he bort a small farm (he was a blacksmith before), and settled down near us, and has voted reggularly on the dissyplanetic ticket ever sense, but twice—once in Harrison's time, and again in Taylor's; and at sour State elecshun had come befour Pensulvany, so he'd a known old Ate was bounud to win, he'd have voted for him.

Sense the war broke avut ho's jined the Quakers, and every time he hears ov a draft bein' spoken of he quakes like a piece of crab-apple jelly when ya fust turn it ker long ways aut of the mold.

Nowr there's one thing where Sarah is as like her father as two peas. She is fond ev politics. She reeds the New York Herald reggerlarly, so's tu be on all sides to once; and don't hardly touch a navel, except the hysterical novels in the Sunday papers. She don't reed messy works of fickshun, because she constantly sees sich by the reliable correspondents of some of the newspapers. She never plays whist, because her father was a methodist. She never goes to a ball, for the same reason. Sarah, and sumtimes tells fokkes fortunes with the kards. But they don't many—for we have no fokkes. Once she told Sam Jennings that he would be choked to death sum day eating flap-jacks; and sure enuff, one day, jest after supper, when his mouth was full of cakes and molasses, he slipped down the sollar and nearly broke his neck. That's all the acknowsaw's jury on the body, and the verdick was he died from flap-jacks, as he had so mennny in his mouth that they removed the sollar entirely, and made him top-bewry, which caused him to fall down sumtimes.

Wa'al, as I was goin' in reware, the last conversashun I had with Sarah was almost pollytics. I was a-sittin' in the evenin'—we don't keep no kind ov cool, and I do the work mostly—when in rushed Sarah Blue, as red as a navel bug, and throwin' a shawl on my pile ov bankerchefs, that I'd put on the settle bench after ironing of 'em till they war as slick as a whistle.

"Charley! what do you think?" says she, at last as a pant.

"Why, for the land's sake, what's the matter?" says I.

"Matter enuff!" she anserred, looking the very picture of skorn. "Old Abe Lincon has made a new appointment!"

"Wa'al now," says I, "I'm glad on't!—is it good?"

Ha, ha! I didn't know exackly what it was—I didn't know but it was sum nu kind of cake he'd made. Ya know we live Washington Cake, and Lemon Cake, and why shouldn't we have Lincon Cake? Reserver, I didn't tell Sarah what I thort at the time, and I don't tell her now.

"Good! there ain't no good to it," she replyed; "don't ya think he's gone and told all the niggers to set their wives free from their master's reign, but spare, oh! spare them pockets! Skin 'em alive, but don't tetch their wives and kids!"

"Don't ya mind a navel sin says?" cried I, enthusiastikly. "She don't know what she's a-saying!

"Ez Farther Abraham, and I will be—"

"Grimes and liberty!" "Glory hallelujah!"

Don't ya think, Mister Editer, that's better gut? so now I'll stop and cook one of my own flat koss and knue at me like a wild-cat!

I immegine I see the look of the tenags, and we fit there in the kitchen till her face looked as if she'd had the smellopx, and mine was pulled up a bit when I let her shake, and all my klaws clene that I'd lend but to put inter the wash agin.

I larv'ed and sed ov the honner ov it.

But I had my revenge, for I sit a point—a narkastical point, ov course—about the delishus ov bigger apple sass, and Sarah Blue, she sed, sed she, and sed she, and sed she, and sed it Troath, so she'd know who rit it. She hasn't spoke tu me sins ov that. Here it is, deer reeder:

POEM.

Abram, spair the Sassiti!
Tetch not a single nigger!
They'll be dear to the Sassiti
If ye cut each a figger!

The Sassiti are a people
Ez ain't to be trifled with;
When they're with a pickaxiny
They're with a pick or tin!

Then, good ez gold the Sassiti
A fust-rate piece they'd win,
Ef they could git the nigger
Without the nigger skin.

But ef ye run it fer hell
Ye gits them critters in hull!

Who fired rite on your flagg—
Dragged freemen to their graves?
Who lov to bend the knee
Thet we shall bow them slaves?
Who sez the word, and
Thet's said and done with strength?
And ef ye kin defie both,
For pity's sake, do it!

Yes! By our martyred dead,
We'll follow Abram's star!
Ef he dare not set them free,
And hit we shave we kin!

THE NINTH INDIANA AT DANVILLE.

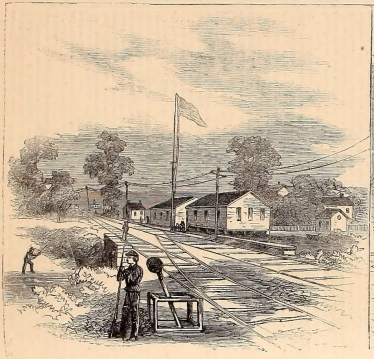
WE publish on page 710 a picture of the RECEPTION OF THE NINTH INDIANA REGIMENT AT DANVILLE, CAPTURED from a sketch by Mr. Mosler. Mr. M. writes:

DANVILLE, October 14, 1862.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

I herewith send you a sketch of the reception of the Ninth Indiana Regiment at Danville, Kentucky, on the 8th inst., which nearly five miles, Col. John Morgan and his force, which was held by the Rebel guerrilla, commanded by of cavalry, and Gen. W. H. Hains. We captured, including the brave Colonel W. H. Hains. We captured, including the wounded in hospitals, about 500, who were all paroled. The Union feeling and exhilaration of joy when we entered was never equaled. This is also the residence of General Speed Smith, who has 3000 Rebel troops and 3000 Infantrymen. The Ninth Indiana was greatly complimented by the Commanding General, W. T. Sherman, in General Schultz's Division.

Yours respectfully,



HENRY MOSLER.

RUNNING NEGROES SOUTH.

On pages 712 and 713 we publish an illustration of an event of very frequent occurrence at the present time in Virginia: namely, the DRIVING OF NEGROES SOUTH in order to escape the approach of our army. The poor creatures are collected in gangs, handcuffed or chained together, and driven off under the lash or at the point of the bayonet. One authority says:

A refugee from the vicinity of Leesburg states that a rebel cavalry force appeared in that place on Monday last and ordered every negro within all the squads that previously been collected together there, and placed in two detachments, by order of General Lee.

The Times correspondent says:

While at Aldie, on Thursday last, two colts my master and Moore and Bell, were stolen from me and were detained as prisoners. The first named is a son of Mr. Gilpin's fine Morgan stallion, Gilpin, and of the old Goose Creek, and the latter is a large pleasure horse. Moore and Bell, who had been my fellow-slaves, and were neither bridled nor shod, were much surprised at being detained with us. Some days when to tear their homes, from which they had been absent some time. Upon being questioned closely, they admitted that they had just come from the James River, and finally owned up that they had been running off "niggers," having just taken a large gang, including two themselves and neighbors, estimated in value to avoid being them under the emancipation proclamation. I understand, from various sources, that the owners of this species of property, throughout the section of the State, are moving off toward Richmond as fast as it can be spared from the plantations, and the slaveholders boast that there will not be a negro left on this part of the State by the 1st of January next.

Another correspondent says:

The rebels in Secessia are busily engaged just now in running off the Richmond and Secessia Railroad rolling stock. A Union man, just from below Culpeper, says that in the course of a day's journey he saw no less than seven at different points—all strongly guarded. He does not recently know which control his pity most, the white or black men.

THE WAR IN UPPER MARYLAND.

WE publish on page 716 a view of the DESTRUCTION OF THE BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD by the rebels, as from Fair View Mountain; and on page 717 several pictures taken at HANCOCK. All are from sketches by our special artist, Mr. Theodore R. Davis. He writes:

FAIR VIEW.

The rebels are completing as fast as possible the destruction of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad by burning the ties. This they do by placing fence rails upon them, and on firing them at both ends; for not only the ties, but completely ruins the iron. When I made my sketch from the signal-station on Fair View Mountain, the sight was magnificent. The burning road showed a snake-like trail of smoke for miles, the distance showing both hills and blue lakes, and the thousands of little tents gave a charming contrast to the changing forest. It is, we are told, the intention of the rebels to destroy the road as far as it is within their reach. They say that it is "unfortunate" the country through which it ran—meaning that it civilized it.

HANCOCK.

Hancock, an exceedingly picturesque town of 4000 inhabitants, situated on the bank of the Potomac, is now the theatre of considerable military activity, being occupied by a portion of the right wing of the Army of the Potomac. Lieutenant Eggleston, Provost Marshal of Conch's division, having ordered me hereto arrest the editor of the city, all the hotels and restaurants to cease from selling liquor while the troops remained, destroyed all he found upon the premises of those who disobeyed the order, and by doing so preserved order and discipline among the soldiers and citizens. Hancock is now the eastern terminus of the western portion of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. Each train is in front of it as it moves eastward, and in the rear, and the engineers and firemen are furnished with rifles and pistol-revolvers from the ranks of the guerrillas. The Chesapeake and Ohio Canal is on this side of the river, and the sketch represents a regiment passing through a culvert under the canal on their way to the ford.

A LEAF FROM A SUMMER.

FATES ripen fast in these days, and all that was required and best for me is over and done. I have room to have passed since June, and yet I can count the months on the fingers of one hand. Life had always run in an even current with me. Small griefs no one could see; useless agonies, none the less keen because sometimes fantastic. At first the world looked awkwardly to me: I was long in harmonizing. But as I grew older and gained confidence and composure, a degree of harmony was mine. Perhaps if I had kept in my corner I might have crystalized into the placid maiden, unmixing, serene specimen of ladyhood I was fast becoming at twenty-one. But Time's whirligig soon placed me in the midst of the practical and the dramatic.

There was Morrison Deane, whom I had long known with the indifference of friendship, now to find him of kindred. He told me how long he had watched me, how he understood me and admired my powers. I felt that out of all he knew he confided only in me. His sympathy made me eloquent. Now natures sometimes kindle in a moment to steady flame; and if I had been slowly educating myself to the appreciation of this man, I was ready for him. I need to dwell on it, I loved him.

Do you know the mystery? The subtle, indefinite uplifting of the whole nature, the abandonment of the first rapture, the slow and hard control of a new being. I was changed out of my own understanding. For the first time I apprehended the unutterable beauty of that attribute of Divinity. Then I first truly worshiped God.

The future lay thus in mary, shifting colors; in no dangerous dell I sank to find it. Lovers, I think, are prone to deceive themselves, and fancy the friendship of their friend turning love-color; but I did not falter but once, it was so easy. Aunt Felix and I had lived on in our country home without a thought of change. We two were alone in the world, and were contented as two women ever can be. Suddenly the ancient maiden, a hundred times more youthful in her feelings than I, consented to enliven the solitude of a solemn, respectable widower, a man I should always have respected. Then my friends took counsel on my affairs and decided I should be tortured no longer, but take up my abode henceforth with my guardian and cousin James. So the house was dismantled, all my books and furniture packed, and I was to commence my new life with was packed in three great trunks before me. The night of the last night came to Mermont Deane was that afternoon, when he walked in swinging his straw-hat and looking so cool and contented as he entered a room. "I am," he said, in a few moments, "you are cross. Come, take a walk. I desire to go over the river, and you are to go over." Who knows how sure, like knight and maid, we may track these old ways again !"

The bustle of the day brought us out of ourselves. Morrison was true to himself. He was still a he sang the little ballad of Lovelace's, and as he ended—

"I could not love thee, dear, so much, Loved I not honor more."

stooped forward, and clasped her hands. She did not understand, but half read some baleful fate in his passionate glance, say startled air.

"What is it, Morry?" chimed the silver voice.

"I am out and about Fredericksburg. I am severed, gravely, and changed to tender soothing; which must have proved successful, for I found Felix cold and unsympathetic with a kind of vanity I shared.

Morrison went, and the struggle of months brought him out unscathed. When I saw him fresh, brown, and writhe my courage rose.

The first hour in all this summer's pandemonium he bestowed on me. Moved out of all reserve, he acknowledged that I was dying a martyr to Margie? You are working too hard for the soldiers, and giving drop by drop your blood to these bandages."

"No," I told him. It was new life. I had found my vein. There is no rest but in work, easily and of Elsie. He had parted from her at Saratoga.

"His will watch over her for my sake, the one dear thing I own?"

I promised, and he shook hands warmly and waved away. I looked gravely after him. How knew the manichaean another month might hold? He caught my look, and came back, muttering it over good-by, and for the first time kissed me. When the door fairly closed the only tears I ever shed Elsie could not sympathize with a kind of vanity I shared.

When the door fairly closed the only tears I ever shed Elsie could not sympathize with a kind of vanity I shared.

The wounded came pouring in. The gloomy little hall was thronged with them. I was there one when I read his name in the long, confused column; I only thought of what must be done. But what must be done? There was only one at home; I could not hurry to the battle-field. It was not my right to leave him even for Margie. But when Morrison wrote me he was in New Haven—that haven of good nursing and devoted care—and not a word nor heart from Elsie, I felt my responsibility and took my sober old Louisa and started for Connecticut. The thought of the pistol-shot haunted me.

"Pooh," said I—"the women are too busy to comment on me, and have I not some gray hairs?" It was a relief to have some plain reason for my certain. It was night before we reached our journey's end. That night was the hardest I ever passed.

As early in the morning as I dared we walked to the hospital. At the entrance stood some young girls smiling under their round hats. Their silver chatter ceased as we entered. A few remembered days and journeys, and I walked slowly down the room to his bedside.

"Ah me, Morrison Deane!"

He smiled, and said, "You are here, thank God!" I was speechless; but nothing could have prevented my coming. I am glad I came.

He seemed to fall rapidly, and the physicians looked dreadful sheets at each other—and then sorrowfully at me. They could not bear to lose so loyal, so obedient a soul.

I bore him nothing braver than the rock, gentle as a girl, yet fighting with a steadfast sternness, and urging me to rest. A resolution was taken which should be no failure. That is the soldier—that was he.

After a long consultation the surgeon told him by how uncertain a thread he held on life. The amputation of his arm might save him; but in his enfeebled state it was a great risk, and yet the only hope.

A letter from Elsie lay next his heart, as he answered cheerfully, "Let it be done. I shall not die of that. She loves me!" he whispered to me. "Let me remain here to her shadow."

So I fastened down a sheet of paper to the portable writing-desk, and gave him a pencil. He had fought himself to write with his left hand, but achieved the epistle with no little difficulty.

"Much as I am grieved for her," said he, while I folded it, "I am thankful she accepts my will as authority. Not for all the comfort she could bring would I have her exposed to these scenes for an hour. If I die," turning his eyes full on my face, "she will not know why she left me, without the added anguish of detail, for she has not your undaunted soul."

After the operation, contrary to all their fears, he began to rally; daily he grew better till my blood began to bound again. Hour after hour sat I sat and fanned him, trying to create a coolness in the heated air, his eyes met mine with unclouded courage.

"I can never fight again!" was the only despond, and thing he said.

"But then you can be a tax-gatherer," the doctor suggested.

A few mornings later and this watchful attendant said,

"This is unaccountable! Captain Deane was so well yesterday that I began to think of sending him home to-day in the weakest yet, his pulse is absolutely nothing."

"Is the arm painful?" walking to him.

"Not much," he answered. The doctor made his examinations and went away unsatisfied. I watched him in melancholy silence, while, only a quiet breath or weary movement showing him alive. There was no change for the better as the days passed he sunk under an invisible hand.

Then it came to pass that I said, as I leaned over him, "Shall I write for Elsie?"

He turned his face to the wall as he answered, "She will not marry a cripple, Margie; she has changed her mind."

That letter, like the anecdote's case and poison, was on his breast. I gave it to him, but could read her communication? I could not see. It dropped unheeded as I put my arms over him and touched his cheek with mine. I could not help it. His enemy had struck him unarmed and unaware.

He turned his face to me.

"Is it so, poor child?" said he, faintly. "Am I all wrong? Be faithful! Get well for Elsie!"

The hour came when they lowered him into the earth, and fixed their volleys over him.

I wished that I could have dug a grave for me, but I have to live.

WOLVES.

AFTER visiting the White Village, I had agreed to accompany Saunderson to a place called the Black Village, which belonged to a farmer of the name, who had obtained from the white villagers mercy for being somewhat merciful. Instead of this estate, including a large saw-mill, corn-mill, and sugar-mill, was under the control of the intelligent Saunderson who equivalent to a lord made at the hunt. The distance was about thirty miles, and, although we could not go at a very great rate and safe route, we decided on the forest track, as the nearest, and as affording the best chance of sport on the way. In the evening the preceding day the frost had sharpened, until the snow was crisp and hard, and covered in any direction through the wood a magnificent hard road, without a track on it. Instead of shunning the wolves, which abounded in the forest, we resolved to court their company, and for this purpose carried with us a decoy, in the shape of a young pig carefully tied up in a strong canvas sack. Our sledge, horses, ammunition, breadsacks, and sandwiches, having been put into our well-appointed sledge, we started in the early church, crossed the bridge, went up the hill a little, and then striking into the forest, were soon in its labyrinths. Our first object was the finding of a train of about five-and-thirty, who had established himself as herdsman on all my excursions. Two of Saunderson's well-hounds and the count's Newfoundland dog, by at our feet, perfectly alive to the prospect of sport.

Before we had quite left all evidences of traffic we heard the report of a gun, followed by laughing at some distance. Determined to see what was going on, we left the sledge, and taking our rifles, made toward the noise. Soon before us in a wood through clear cold air, and we had further to go than we expected before we found several men, one in fellow's trees had unearthed a bear. There he stood on his hind-legs, in front of what had been his hibernating den—a hole in the mountain-ash which had been just pulled down. He stood with his back against the trunk, and his fore-feet beating the air, and his jaws were amazingly expressive with his antics. As he seemed to want something to hug, they offered him a bundle of straw and bits of wood covered with mat between his arms. He closed them with a growl, and gave it a hug, and tore the bundle to pieces in a moment—to be in a moment—to see his colossus in turns, but without any fear for themselves. There was no cause for astonishment; poor brain had not yet come to his senses. He was quite blind, thinking the giant, his foe, was hanging on to the gun-present, and his for his fact that of a mangy dog in the beginning of the fight, and prepared his bite, and crept into it. There he had lain on one side, sucking one paw. There he had turned on at once, and, with a single foot-grasping, had seen that when his dwelling was broken open by an evil chance, and he was forced to get up and called his tormentor and chief assistant Saunderson, which right seemed slow to return. He had a dismal and hopeless aspect, as he stood on his hind-legs a little way from his support, and retreated to it growling and angry. To prevent the bears from reaching the great creature's back, we got a bullet into the right place, and left the men and the cart to finish the job. Saunderson has run a more cruel death; which is our only excuse for having shot that poor, blind, sleepy, bewildered bear.

Just then the driver said: "We shall soon get among the wolves. I shall look out for sport."

"Shall we try the pig, as a decoy?" I said to Saunderson.

By all means, let us have a shot at something that is not blind and helpless. I can not get the poor blind bear out of my mind's eye."

The pig was dragged from under the seat, where he had lain very quiet, and, by dint of pinching his tail, was set to squeal. He was not slow to do with variations, which resounded for miles through the stillness of the forest. Then a large piece of cheese we wolves, but at length we caught sight of two, skulking among the underwood, in a parallel line with our path, but at a respectful distance. Although we kept up the decoy music they were shy of approaching within shot. One end of a long white cotton rope was then attached to the mouth of the pig's bag, the other end to the back of the sledge, and as we slowly turned a bend in the track the bag was dropped behind. We slackened pace, and, as the rope ran out, the pig proceeded of his own accord. When the rope was all run out we stopped and got out of the sleigh to watch the result, taking our station about two hundred yards from the pig, behind a tree, with our eyes on the place where we had last seen the two wolves. The pig, meantime, finding himself in a new position, put new zeal into his music. The wolves left the cover with springs and jumps, and soon approached the poor pig, who was in no greater danger than ourselves. As they were on the point of springing on the hog—in fact, one of them had made the jump —I gave round the driver to move on with his horses, thus pulling the prey out of their reach, and setting them to wonder what had become of it. The wonder did not last long, for the wolves distinctly had smelled pork, and meant to dine on it.

They again approached the hog, and the big again received, while the vest worshippers of the sounding whistle proceeded from the pig inside. The wolves made a furious run, and again the driver gave the signal to advance till he had brought the pig nearly on a line with the place where Saunderson and I were standing; the wolves followed us with fangues and glaring eyes. Both rifles went off at the same moment, and, strange to say, only one wolf rolled over. We had both fired into one. The other wolf sprang for cover, but was stopped and brought to bay by the three dogs, who very soon made an end of him, retiring in the struggle a few sharp lifes from his ugly teeth.

The next object of devering the wolves was some in that part of the country, and it is not unattended with danger, for, in case of a large pack being attracted, nothing but their horses are safe from the hunters. We had this pleasure among the riders and dogs, and were prepared for as many wolves as might show themselves.

"Do you hear that?" said Saunderson, as an unmistakable howling of the wolves came to us on the wind. "We have only killed the advance-guard; the pack is in full cry. Be quick, fetch in the pig, and let us drag these two behind the sleigh."

We tied the rope round the neck of each wolf, and dragged them as fast as possible, followed by the dogs in the sleigh, and jumped in ourselves. Then off we sped again, wolves by this time within an inch of us and behind us. We had determined we could sustain a pace of three feet to their two, and this cleared us of risk. All we had to do was to prevent their getting ahead of us.

Having reloaded our empty barrels and lighted our cigars, we kept watch on either side for a good shot; but it is not easy to get a good shot in a running sleigh, unless the object be stationary, large, and near.

"Mattvie, go slower, keep your eye on the horses, and pull up very gradually when I cry 'stop.'"

"I hear."

A detachment behind were now coming up in five wolves.

"Slower, Mattvie."

"I hear."

We got on our knees on the seat of the sleigh with our faces to the approaching wolves, about fifteen in number; we rested our rifles on the back, and as the wolves came up Saunderson cried—

"Now, take one on the left, and I'll take one on the right, and as soon as you see their teeth fire."

"Stop, Mattvie."

"I hear."

Gradually the sleigh came to a stand. The wolves were by this time within twenty yards of us, and we could see their grinning teeth, their grinders, their tongues lapping and the light in their fiery eyes.

"Are you ready? Fire! Two down. Again! The other barrel. Ready? Fire! Other two down. Drive on, Mattvie, slowly: it will take them some time to consider of that."

The wolves all stopped, and seemed to gather round their fallen friends. A turn in the wood hid them from view. Even our enemies on the right and left flanks passed at the unexpected report of the guns, and allowed us to proceed without molestation. We went another mile and a half, and length stopped altogether and waited; but no more wolves came up.

"I am afraid," said Saunderson, "our wolfhunting is over for to-day. Drive on, Mattvie, we can't help it."

"Listen, horses," said Mattvie. "We can trap them all. I'll be the pig."

"Trap them. How?"

"It is easily done. About three versts from this is Timofey Evenofige, the woodman's hut. You have only to make one turn to the right, and keep straight on, and you will reach it. He has a wolf-trap, for I saw it, and I will keep on the wolves. Never fear. Only you must give me the little horse; he is swift and sure; I have hunted all winter before with him."

After a slight hesitation about the man's safety, which he thought in no peril of any sort, his plan was adopted. The little horse was got out and given to Mattvie; Saunderson mounted the driving, and on we went alone. Our man, mounted like a pig, rode back to invite the wolves to follow him into the trap. Around Timofey's dwelling-house was a strong, high palisade; through this there was only one entrance, by a door opposing inward, and hung by a pulley and heavy balance-weight so that when a wolf pushed himself through this door it closed, and shut him into the space between the house and palisade. This space was again divided off by strong cross-partitions round the premises, to each of which was fixed a sliding panel in the roof of panel, that could be pulled up or let down from within the house. By these means the inmate could separate the wolves, and kill them with dogs, guns, or hatchets, at their leisure. I had heard of one man trapping in this manner as many as fifty wolves in a winter, besides other game, the skins of which were worth to him at least one hundred and fifty rubles.

As we approached the hut we found it of larger dimensions than we had expected, and that it appeared to take in a larger circumference than one hut required. We shouted, but no one answered; all was as still and quiet as if the place were uninhabited. On our entering the door through the palisade it closed with a bang, and we found ourselves in a small inclosure with a gateway opposite, leading to the back premises; but it was made fast. After thundering at it for a minute or two a small door in the gateway opened, and there emerged, cautiously, the figure of a man rubbing his eyes and starting through his hair. He reminded me of the blind bear. His hair, like a great mass of tangled tow, was matted over his face, and his beard was of the same. He was dressed coat over a gray cotton or sackin shirt and trowsers, and long felt boots completed his costume. He made many curious signs and uttered many times for keeping us waiting, but seemed to be in no hurry to open the door. He had had a pack of wolves might be expected, and that our horses and conveyances must be put in a place of safety. He understood nothing of the wolf-trap business, and he was off into the house with a spring, through a window inside the gateway. He followed, stopping all the time, and we in his house. It was a man-kennel, twenty or thirty feet square, a great stove in the centre, dogs of a variety lying on the floor, and men snoring on the top of the pack. The heat was suffocating, the stench was poisonous. Our host pushed the dogs right and left from them off their perch by the legs, pouring water on the heads of those who would not move, and the dogs. "Wolves! wolves! you pigs, and you all sleeping! Be quiet, dogs. No barking. Evan, take the horses' horses and pigs, and bring in the entrance to the sled. Quick! Andrea, stand by the big gate and open it after the pig has passed, and gets through. Put the dogs in the third division, and get out the guns! Ah, thank God and there is daylight for bringing it in!"

We had no intention of being cooped up in the hut while the wolves were in the neighborhood of station beside the man at the gateway, which now stood wide open for the admission of Mattvie and the pig, which, by the bye, was all on end, and every necessary preparation made. Then came the howling of wolves and the screaming as of a child, and Mattvie, with the pig, was discovered in the rush of many small feet. The outer door in the palisade was opened, and Mattvie, with the pig, bowed in half a minute by the whole pack, rushed in. That half-minute was just sufficient to enable the wolves to vanish through the bars of the trap. Then, as the last pressure on the door was removed, it closed with a loud sharp noise, and some five-and-twenty wolves were inured in a space not larger than twelve feet by twenty. We did not at first close the door entirely, but, mounting our pieces at the mass of wolves now huddling one above up in a corner, we fired into the brown in rapid succession, then closed the gate, and reloaded for another charge. The change from the late ferocious yelping during which they had displayed in pursuit of a single horseman, to abject fear and they found themselves caught in the narrow trap, was instantaneous. Not one wolf like sheep in a pen, crushing up in a corner, riding on the top of another, biting and tearing in their lies, crouching and shivering with fear. It is not necessary to describe the scene of mere slaughter. Two stays were dropped out of the gates so that we might get through. The drop panels were opened, and two of the wolves rushed out, one to the next division; there dogs were let in on them through the adjoining trap, or they were killed by men with great knives, axes, and at length, when only six or seven remained, three of the men went in. Some, dying with perfect safety dispatched them. They say that a worm will turn on the best that treads on it, but wolves caught in a trap like this are perfectly harmless. In escape, have less courage than a worm. They crouch, shiver, and die, at last without one effort at self-defence, or one snap of retaliation.

HIGHLY IMPORTANT TO THE SOLDIERS OF THE UNION ARMY.

"AN OUNCE OF PREVENTION IS WORTH A POUND OF CURE."

Nearly all the diseases incident to camp life originate with derangement and irregularity of the bowels; they being the weakest and most susceptible part of the human system, first feel the effects of the exposure which all soldiers have to submit to during their term of active service. The best weapon of defence you can have against all such diseases is

DR. DANIEL EVANS' PATENT
ABDOMINAL SUPPORTER AND MEDICAL SAFEGUARD COMBINED.

The Surgeon General and the principal Physicians and Surgeons, who have examined the formula of its medicinal qualities, have recommended its use by the Union soldiers.

Messrs. G. G. EVANS & CO. secured the right to sell the SAFEGUARD in the United States, and they are now being manufactured under the superintendence of an able physician, and arrangements have been made to place them in the hands of every Sutler in the service. An Agency has been established in Philadelphia, New York and Boston, where soldiers in this vicinity about to depart for the war can be supplied.

No more appropriate present can be made to a

CONVALESCENT SOLDIERS PASSING THROUGH WASHINGTON TO JOIN THEIR REGIMENTS.—SKETCHED BY MR. A. ORRIEL.—[SEE PAGE 738.]

"WHAT DO I DREAM OF?"

BY VICTOR HUGO.

WHAT do I dream of? Far from the low roof
Whose new ye who, children, I dream of you;
Of you, young heads that are the hope and crown
Of my old manor, ripening to its fall.
Branches whose bodies grows along my wall.
Sweet souls nearer upon to the breath of age,
Still dazzled with the brightness of your dawn.
I dream of these two little ones at play,
Making the threshold vocal with their cries,
Half tears, half laughter, mingled sport and strife.
Like two flowers knocked together by the wind.
Or of the other two—mere actions thought
Standing already broader waves of life,
A conscious innocence and shy curious boy,
A pensive daughter and my curious boy.
This do I dream, while the light settles o'ing.
At evening's quiet beneath some steepy shore,
While the wave spending all their nutrity, breathe
A thousand sounds to the wonderful night,
And the whole air is full of wondrous sounds,
From sea to land, from land to sea, from rock—
Alcies and nut, thus do I dream of you.
Children, and home, and home, the ashes set,
The glowing hearth and all the pious care
Of tender mother, and of grandsire kind.
And while before me, overall with white sails,
The languid ocean mirrors all the stars,
And while the pilot, from the infinite sea,
Looks with calm eyes into the infinite heaven,
I, dreaming of you only, seek to sing
And fathom all my soul's deep love for you—
Love sweet, and powerful, and overflowing—
And find that the great ocean is small beside it.

THE MONEY QUESTION.

THE great argument of our enemies, at home and abroad, has been that the United States could not afford to pay the expenses of so great a war as we are waging, and that a day of compromise was approaching simply through the inevitable collapse of the financial system of the North. Let us test this question by figures, without noticing the blunders or the misrepresentation of the enemy.

On 1st October last the total debt of the United States, including some $75,000,000 inherited from the Buchanan Administration, amounted, in round numbers, to $620,000,000. Since then there is reason to believe that the aggregate expenditures of Government have not exceeded $1,200,000 a day. We are probably, therefore, not far wrong when we say that at the time this paper reaches its readers the public debt will fall short of $670,000,000, at an annual charge for interest of something under $28,000,000. As the great expenditures of the Government for arms and equipments have already been incurred, we take for granted, without much fear of being mistaken, that $1,200,000 a day, or $36,000,000 a month, or $432,000,000 a year will enable us to carry on this war for several years to come. Assuming, unjustly enjoined with finance, like Mr. Thaddeus Stevens of Pennsylvania, have talked loosely on the subject of the public expenditures, and encouraged many vague notions on the subject. The event will correct these idle estimates, and will vindicate the calculations of reason.

On 1st July, 1863, supposing the war to continue so long, and every dollar of our expenditures to be borrowed of the public, the aggregate national debt will fall considerably short of nine hundred millions of dollars.

To meet the interest on this sum the Government has the revenue from taxes and from customs duties. It was the intention of Congress, in passing the new tariff and internal revenue measures, to secure an aggregate revenue of $175,000,000—that is to say, enough to defray, 1st, the interest on the debt; 2dly, the civil expenditures of Government; and, 3dly, the annual charge for a sinking fund to extinguish the principal of our national debt within a given time. Contrary to the expectation of almost every financial authority, the revenue from taxes and customs proves larger than the most sanguine estimate of the Committee of Ways and Means. The tariff will probably yield $80,000,000 instead of $60,000,000, and while there be a fair prospect of an early termination of the war even more: the Internal Revenue Act will yield very much more than the $115,000,000, which it was calculated to produce, how much more it is now difficult to say. At the Treasury Department it is understood that $160,000,000 is becoming a favorite estimate with Mr. Commissioner Boutwell is said to expect to receive $250,000,000; and when those who look for a revenue of 35,000,000 a month or 500,000,000 a year. If the tax-law yields $200,000,000 a year, while the tariff yields $75,000,000, it is clear that after paying the civil expenses of Government and the interest on the debt, and a contribution of 5 per cent to the Sinking Fund, Mr. Chase will have nearly a hundred millions of dollars toward the current expenses of the war.

The distinctive feature of Mr. Chase's financial policy is the emission of irredeemable but convertible paper-money. That the issue of irredeemable paper, or, in other words, the attempt to make that money by law which is not money in fact, is bad, of course admits of no debate. But even the most bitter opponents of Mr. Chase now admit that, in the circumstances in which he was placed, he had no alternative. It would have been utterly impossible to have borrowed in the past year at any rate of interest whatsoever, or under any conditions whatsoever, either at home or abroad, five hundred millions of dollars, which is the sum we have expended. By the exercise of extraordinary, and through them the return of the bankers of this and other cities, a sum of $250,000,000 or thereabouts has been borrowed at a reasonable rate of interest. That sum has been obtained—be it also here it could have been obtained—by the issue of irredeemable paper. But this paper, like the old Continental money or the French assignats, to which it has been ignorantly compared, derives an intrinsic value from its convertibility into the bonds stock of the United States bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable at the end of twenty years and redeemable after five. The responsibility effectually prevents the new United States currency from declining to a nominal value as the coming worthless, as the paper money of old times so frequently did, unless, indeed, we are to assume that the bonds of this great Government, with interest payable in gold, are likewise to become worthless. Of this paper money Mr. Chase has now issued about $275,000,000. He has power to issue $150,000,000 more, besides postal currency, of which some $2,500,000 have been issued, and some $5,000,000 more will be issued before New Year.

The question is often asked, how much paper will Mr. Chase issue? Where will the limit be? The answer to these questions depends on financial but military events. If by the time Congress meets the work of suppressing the rebellion seems nearly complete, the Government will proceed so rapidly that, with the aid of the revenue from taxes and customs, and the use of certain sales of indebtedness, the necessity of issue may be defrayed without further issues of paper. If, on the contrary, the end of the war seems as distant in December as in January, Congress, Mr. Chase will probably apply to Congress for power to issue say $250,000,000 more legal tender money; confiding, perhaps, in the recommendation to Congress to provide for the gradual withdrawal from circulation of all existing bank-notes. We have little doubt that Congress, with the receipts from taxes and customs, would probably make Mr. Chase easy till December, 1863; for, as the paper currency was abundant, holders would at once convert it into stock, thus in effect taking a United States 6 per cent. bond at par. The power to issue paper-money of the legal tender paper constitutes a check against its being issued in excess. The moment there is more currency than the business of the country requires, United States stocks will advance, and holders will convert their currency into the "five-twenties." In fact, the financial crisis complaint has been not of a superabundance but of a scarcity of currency.

Thus far, the general working of Mr. Chase's convertible paper money system, and the success of the direct tax law, justify the belief that, if the rebellion ceases in the war might be carried on for four or five years more without any danger of "financial exhaustion."

THE LOUNGER.

CONSERVATISM.

TWO weeks since we spoke of the amusing ignorance of the meaning of words which is the most common use. Graves, respectable people consent to be hunted down by a bad voice, and because a certain policy is stigmatized as radical, believe that they are conservative when they oppose it. A conservative party is properly a party which aims to secure the guarantees of permanent social order upon which life and property depend. It is, of course, divided into two parts—the sensible and the foolish: the part which holds to the state quo, without regard to the value of that which it defends, which accommodates itself to the eternally changing circumstances of human affairs. The first condition of human society is change. The second hope is in the conduct of that movement forward, and not backward. As with a boat which one will walk, the point is that he shall walk forward without falling, instead of stepping backward and probably tumbling over.

Conservatism is not stagnation. It is not fear of what will be evil. It is not the clinging to what by upright. It does not insist that the growing man shall wear the child's clothes, not only because it is ridiculous but because they are, be cause he will surely split them by a growth which he can not control. Conservatism only takes care that the clothes shall neither be too large nor in the extreme of the fashion.

Thus a conservative of conduct is not conservative merely because it is the old way. "The ancient landmarks" are beacons that guide upon a journey; they are not tent-pegs to which we are to make the camp in to be pitched. The old way is good in the old time, but it is bad in the present time. In '76 conservatism was revolution, because there was no other way to secure the essential guarantees of civil society but by fighting for them. Our civil fighter is the chief conservative of our history. So in these days conservatism is again war, because by war only can the same guarantees, threatened by bloody parricidal hands, be maintained. And again at this day our chief fighters are our chief conservatives; and the men who are known as demagogues and radicals in the dangerous sense are they who are endeavoring to betray the fighters.

The country is convulsed by terrible war. It can end only in one of two ways: either by maintaining absolutely the authority of the Government, or by surrendering and limiting that authority. What is the true conservatism of the situation? Is it to have a momentary peace, at any price—even that of dismemberment, humiliation, and disgrace, with the endless wars and confusions sure to follow, in which there can be no security whatever for life and property—or is it to vindicate the supreme authority of the Government over every part of its citizens and every inch of its domain? Is Mexico a conservative nation? Is the principle that wins and holds a discontented party to take up arms to gain its ends and be sure to gain them a conservative principle? Is that the flag in these days—the flag of national unity, peace, splendor, and honor—does conservatism hasten and cry to the dishonored flag, and the dismembering gentlemen "! and tear the flag into two or twenty tatters, as the rebellion may dictate? No, no. In the moment of supreme national responsibility is the stoutest, staunchest, most heroic standard-bearer. It points with mighty hand and hands to the sky; hails it as consecrated by the Past and illuminated by the Future; and declares, with threefold earnestness, that whatever else whatever would degrade or rend it shall be utterly confounded and destroyed. It is Conservatism, for it is the conservative, and not Benedict Arnold.

Viewed by the light of a truth as evident, who were the conservatives in the country to-day? With whom will men who really wish the salvation of all the fundamental guarantees of life, liberty, and property take their stand? Will it be with those who declare openly for yielding to arms, or with those who say that they will support the Government can not maintain itself? that the effort to do so is despotic effort? that there can be but one end of the war, and that is the humiliation of the Government, and the ruin of the country in the dissolution of the Union? Is it conservatism to declare that you will not support the lawful authorities of the country, as Mr. Fernando Wood says now that he will not? Was Fernando Wood who endeavored to resist the lawful authorities of the State, and who brawled his inability to read Treason in the Georgia, that a conservative man. There are but two methods of conduct. You must either support the Government or oppose it. If you oppose it, is there any salvation for us? Do those who oppose it mean that there shall be any salvation for the national Government?

There is now, there always will be, a conservative party in the country. It is the party whose like this you can split hairs. You must either act with your whole soul one way or the other. To believe is to be ready to die for it. There is a conservative party. Who are its representatives? Let every man honestly answer. Are they the President and the constituted authorities? Are they such men as Daniel S. Dickinson, Dennis M'Carthy, Horatio S. Randall, Erastus Brooks, Joseph Holt, Andrew Johnson, Parson Brownlow, A. J. Hamilton, or are they such men as Fernando Wood, Vallandigham, Isaiah Rynders, Jefferson Davis, James Brooks, Robert Toombs, John Van Buren, and Mayor Gunther? All these men are either for the United States Government unconditionally against all rebellion, or they are not. If they are not, the shadowy differences of their opposition to it are of no importance. Whether they profess it by arms, or morally support armed resistance, their enmity is the same. They are the foes of the country, its government, its unity, and its life. And to deny that they are the great hope of civil liberty and equal rights for all mankind, these men are conservative of anarchy, of rebellion, and of treason.

Is that the conservative party to which any patriot belongs?

WHICH IS WHICH?

It is a favorite saying with those who are most anxious to save a slavery than the Union, that the war is waged for black men. The harlequin Train, one of the chief orators of the new party of slavery, stands on the Union, and cries, "Down with the nigger," says Mr. Cox, in substance. "We hate the nigger." Evidently, evidently, the entire party that sympathizes with the rebellion are rushes to white.
